This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

PREFACE.

In the forty-first volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains, as usual, a summary of all the cases published during the past year in the WEEKLY REPORTER and in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports, besides those given in the Irish Law Reports.

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER.

1892-93.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Lopes, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — July 27, 28; Aug. 10, 1892.

In re SOVEREIGN LIFE ASSURANCE CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Purchase by company of its own shares—Extinguishment—Contributories.

Reduction of capital is a necessary consequence of a statutory power enabling a company to invest its assets in the purchase of its own shares. Shares so purchased are, by the purchase, ipso facto extinguished; and, in a winding up of the company, neither can the company be put on the list of its own contributories, nor can any call be made upon the other shareholders in respect of such shares.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

The question was whether the purchase, under a statutory power, by a company of certain of its own shares extinguished those shares, thereby effecting a reduction of capital, or whether the shares were kept alive, with the effect of increasing proportionately the liability of the other shareholders.

The facts appear in the judgment of Lindley, L.J.

Chitty, J., held that the shares purchased were extinguished, and that no further call in respect of the amount unpaid-up upon them could be made upon the other shareholders.

The official liquidator appealed.

Farwell, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the official liquidator.—The company had express statutory power to purchase its own shares, and they are not extinguished. To hold that they are is to do an injustice by the merest technicality.

They cited In re Imperial Credit Association, Chapman and Barker's case, 15 W. R., at p. 336, L. R. 3 Eq., at p. 366; Cree v. Somervail, 28 W. R. 34, 4 App. Cas. 648; Lindley on Company Law, 5th ed., 805 (where the cases as to indemnity of trustees for a company are summed up); Saunder's case, 12 W. R. 502; Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R., at p. 149, 12 App. Cas., at p. 424.

Byrne, Q.C., and Lemon, for contributories.—There was a merger of the shares by the purchase. A company cannot be a member of itself.

They referred to sections 38, 74, and 196 (sub-section 5) of the Companies Act, 1862, and In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 29 W. R. 768, 17 Ch. D. 76 (at p. 83).

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.—The Act of Parliament has said that the company may purchase its own shares, but the respondent's argument comes to this, that they must say that that cannot be done.

Cur. adv. vult.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

August 10.—LINDLEY, L.J., delivered a written judgment as follows:—The object of this appeal is to obtain an order for a call upon shareholders, who have paid up their own shares in full since the company was ordered to be wound up, but who are said to be liable to make good a large portion of the capital of the company, which ought to be forthcoming for the payment of policies granted by the company. The company was formed in 1845, and was completely registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Regulation Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110). Being completely registered, it became an incorporated company, but the liability of its shareholders was unlimited. It was governed by a deed of settlement, Its capital was £500,000, divided into 50,000 shares of £10 each, and £2 10s. per share was called up long ago, but no more had been called up by the directors before the company was ordered to be wound up. There was power to increase the capital, but no express power to reduce it. Nor was there any power enabling shareholders to surrender their shares. There was, however, power to forfeit shares, and power to alter the regulations. The directors were required to insert in every policy a declaration that the capital, stock, and funds of the company should alone be liable to answer and make good claims in respect of the policy, and that no director or proprietor should be in any case personally liable or subject to any such claims or demands or be in any wise charged by reason of such policy beyond the amount of his share of such capital stock or funds.

The directors were also required to keep three funds—viz. (1) the proprietors' guarantee fund, which represented paid-up capital; (2) the life assurance fund, which represented premiums on policies on which no advances were due to the company; (3) the general fund, which represented premiums on policies on which advances were due to the company, and other moneys. There were provisions for apportioning the profits accruing on the two last funds between the policy-holders participating in profits and the proprietors. The funds of the company not required to answer immediate claims and demands were to be invested, but the investment clause did not authorize the purchase of shares in the company itself. Life policies on which no advances were due were made payable (1) out of the life assurance fund, and (2) out of the proprietors' guarantee fund, to the exclusion of the general fund; whilst life policies on which advances were due to the company were made payable (1) out of the general fund, and (2) out of the proprietors' guarantee fund, to the exclusion of the life assurance fund. In 1861 a supplemental deed was executed altering the deed of 1845 in some respects, but there is nothing in the supplemental deed which requires notice on the present occasion. Such being the constitution of the company, it issued policies in the forms usually adopted by insurance companies formed under the Act of 1844, limiting the liability of the shareholders to the funds of the company. In 1860 the company obtained a private Act of Parliament (23 & 24 Vict.

c. cxvii.) enabling it (amongst other things) to invest its own moneys in the purchase of its own shares. The company did, accordingly, at various times between 1860 and 1876, buy up 8,781 of its own shares. At first they were transferred to and were registered in the names of trustees for the company; but in 1881 they were transferred into the name of the company itself, and that is their position at the present time. Only £2 10s. has been paid up upon these shares. In July, 1889, the company was ordered to be wound up. Calls have been made on the shareholders beyond the amount of the shares held by them. But, the policy-holders being still unpaid, they have taken out a summons in the name of the liquidator to have a call of £7 10s. made upon the company in respect of the above-mentioned 8,781 shares, and to compel the members of the company who are on the list of contributories to pay that call, amounting in the whole to £65,857 10s. Chitty, J., dismissed the summons. Hence this appeal.

The appeal raises the following legal questions—viz., (1) What would be the rights of the policy-holders against the funds of the company and against its members if the Act of 1860 had not been passed? (2) How are these rights affected by that Act?

In order to answer the first of these questions it is necessary to read the policies and to ascertain how they have been construed by the courts. The policy was this (leaving out immaterial parts):—"If the assured shall die on or before a particular day or shall survive that day, and he or his assigns shall pay the premiums, then the funds or other property of the company shall be subject and liable, according to the provisions of the deed or deeds of settlement of the company, to pay to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the said assured, within three calendar months after satisfactory proof of the death of the said assured shall have been received at the office of the company, the sum of . . . and such further sum or sums as shall . . . be appropriated as a bonus or as bonuses or as an addition or as additions to this policy: provided also, that the capital stock of the company, or as much thereof as for the time being shall have been subscribed, and other the stocks, funds, securities, and property of the company remaining at the time of any claim or demand made, unapplied and undisposed of, and not absorbed by or required to answer or meet any prior claim or demand, or claims or demands, in pursuance of the trusts, powers, and authorities contained in the said deed or deeds of settlement, shall alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands upon the company in respect of this policy and all other policies granted by the company, and that no director or other proprietor of the company, his or her heirs, executors, or administrators, shall, by reason of any policy of assurance or instrument securing annuities . . . which any director has signed or may sign, or upon any other account, be in anywise individually liable or subject to any claim or demand, or claims or demands, against the company beyond the amount of the unpaid part of his particular share or shares in the said capital stock, or in such parts of the said capital stock as for the time being shall have been subscribed."

The true construction and legal effect of policies in this form are no longer open to doubt. They were settled thirty or forty years ago after much litigation both at law and in equity. The settled law upon the subject, so far as it bears on the present case, may be thus expressed—viz., (1) the policy-holders acquire no charge at law or in equity upon the funds of the company; (2) their right (when their policies become payable or provable against the company) is to be paid out of the then existing funds of the company, including its then uncalled-up capital; (3) they have no right to call upon any shareholder to pay more than the full amount of the shares held by him and unpaid up when the demand is made upon him.

These propositions will be found to be the net result of the following well-known decisions—viz., at law, Halket v. Merchant Traders' Loan Association, 13 Q. B. 960; Hallett v. Dowdall, 18 Q. B. 2; and King v. Accumulative Assurance Co., 6 W. R. 12, 3 C. B. N. S. 151; and in equity, Lord Talbot's case, 5 De G. & S. 386; Law v. London Indisputable Life Policy Co., 3 W. R. 154, 1 K. & J. 223; Durham's case, 4 K. & J. 517, sub nom. In re Athenæum Assurance Co., Ex parte Prince of Wales Assurance Co., 6 W. R. 765; and In re Albert Life Assurance Co., Bell's case, 18 W. R. 688, 784, L. R. 9 Eq. 706.

For the purposes of this decision the first proposition is the more important. The non-existence of any charge on the funds of the company was finally determined by In re State Fire Insurance Co., 11 W. R. 746, 1011, 1 Hem. & M. 457, 1 De G. J. & S. 634, and since Bell's case has never, I believe, been questioned. In Bell's case Lord Hatherley (then Wood, V.C.) said: "It has been settled in these cases that there is no equitable charge upon the assets. It is a mere debt. . . . The words of the policy, no doubt, furnish a very plausible argument, but the rational conclusion is that they did not make the assured the mortgagee of any particular part so as to entitle him to take the assets. It merely indicates a mode by which he is to be paid."

Bearing that in mind I pass on to the second question, viz., the effect of the special Act.

The important section is the 21st, but the 37th has also to be considered.

By section 21, "It shall be lawful for the directors of the company to lay out and invest, in the name of the company or otherwise, all or any part of the money, funds, or property of the company in and upon such real or Government securities, or debentures of any chartered or incorporated companies or bodies, which at the time of making the purchase shall be in course of payment of dividends upon their paid-up capital originally subscribed, or in the purchase of the stock of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England or the shares or policies of the company or the bonuses declared thereon either together with or separately from the sum assured by the policy, or in the purchase of policies of any other assurance society or company, or annuities for years or for the life or lives of any person or persons or for any shorter period, whether depending on a life or lives or not, or in the purchase of all or any of the above stocks, funds, securities, shares, policies, or annuities, and of any reversionary or other interests in any of them respectively, at or for such price or prices and in all respects as the directors of the company shall think fit; and also to lend and advance in the name of the company or otherwise all or any part or parts of the money, funds, or property of the company upon all or any of the securities aforesaid . . ."

It is impossible to read this section without coming to the conclusion that the company was authorized to buy its own shares. But what does that necessarily involve? It involves the purchase of part of the capital for the benefit of the holders of the rest of the capital, i.e., it involves a reduction of capital.

That again alters the relative proportion of profits to be divided, and of the number of shares amongst which they are to be apportioned. It is impossible to read the section in such a way as to increase the liability of those members who were to be benefited by the investment or purchase; and yet this would be the result if the appellant's construction is right. According to that construction, the shares bought by the company ought to be treated as subsisting and as held by a trustee for the company. But if this were so the trustee would be liable in the event of a winding-up to a call of £7 10s. per share, and the members of the company would be liable to indemnify him, and their liability in that respect would be unlimited. So that the result would be that, instead of benefitting them, a most serious burden would be imposed upon them. Such a construction of section 21 is quite inadmissible. A reduction of capital is a necessary consequence of a statutory power enabling a company to invest its assets in the purchase of its own shares.

But then reliance is placed on section 37, which provides that "nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to incorporate the company, or to relieve or discharge the company, or any of the members thereof, from any responsibility, contract, duty, or obligation whatsoever to which by law they or any of them now are, or at any time hereafter may be, subject or liable as between the company and others; and all contracts, either express or implied, and made or to be made, and all present and future liabilities of any person being, or who shall hereafter be, a member of the company, with or to the company, or any person in trust for the company, or for the use or benefit thereof, shall have such and the same operation and effect, and be attended with such and the same legal consequences in every respect, as if such person had not been such member."

The object of this section is plain enough; it was to preserve the unlimited liability of the shareholders. The section confers no new rights. It saves rights which, but for the Act, would exist, and it is so worded as to apply, not only to the holders of policies issued before the Act passed, but also to the holders of policies issued afterwards. What effect, then, has it on the holders of policies issued by the company? If they had had, independently of the Act, an equitable charge on the uncalled up capital of the company, that charge would, I think, have been preserved, and the appellant would have been right, and machinery would have had to be found for giving effect to their rights. But there was no such charge, and that is the short and conclusive answer to the appellant's case. The policy-holders remain what they always were—viz., unsecured creditors of the company with the funds of the company applicable to their payment. But these funds do not include capital extinguished by statutory authority. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment which has just been delivered, and I entirely agree with it.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I also agree.

In re GREY.

Solicitor—Disciplinary jurisdiction—Order for payment of money—Judgment debt.

A solicitor received a sum of money for and on behalf of a client, but claimed to retain the whole, on the ground that his bill of costs amounted to a larger sum. The client sued the solicitor for the balance which he alleged to be due to him after making a proper deduction for costs, and obtained judgment. The judgment being ineffective, the client applied to the court for a summary order on the solicitor to pay over the money.

Held (reversing the decision of Grantham and Charles, JJ.), that the fact of a judgment having been obtained by the client against the solicitor did not prevent the court from exercising its disciplinary jurisdiction.

In re Corbet Davies, 15 W. R. 46, not followed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of a divisional court (Grantham and Charles, JJ.).

H. A. Grey was retained as a solicitor to act for the plaintiff in an action for the price of goods sold and delivered. Judgment was obtained for £268, and that sum was received by the solicitor on behalf of his client. The client applied to the solicitor to pay the money over, but he refused to do so, on the ground that his bill of costs amounted to a larger sum. The client then commenced an action against the solicitor, alleging that there had been a special agreement between them that the solicitor should only charge costs out of pocket and a commission of five per cent., and claiming the sum of £156 as the balance due to him. The client obtained a verdict and judgment for £156, and issued a writ of fi. fa. It appeared that the solicitor had given a bill of sale of his goods, and the judgment remained unsatisfied.

The client then applied to the Queen's Bench Division for an order compelling the solicitor to pay the money.

The Divisional Court refused to make an order, on the ground that the client, having obtained a judgment against the solicitor, was precluded from resorting to a disciplinary remedy.

The client appealed.

French, Q.C. (Avory with him), for the appellant.—This is a case in which the court ought to exercise its disciplinary jurisdiction by ordering the solicitor to pay the sum which is due from him. The money has not ceased to be due from him as a solicitor, although it is also due from him as a judgment debtor.

They referred to In re Freston, 31 W. R. 804, 11 Q. B. D. 545; In re Dudley, 32 W. R. 264, 12 Q. B. D. 44; and In re Corbet Davies, 15 W. R. 46.

Beddall, for the solicitor.—The original debt has been converted into a judgment debt, and the judgment debt is not due from the solicitor in his capacity as an officer of the court. The court may punish him, but it may not order him to pay this sum of money: In re Corbet Davies.

He also cited In re Ball, L. R. 8 C. P. 104, 21 W. R. Dig. 243.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The proper way of dealing with this case is to deal with it on the principle laid down in the case of In re Freston, which was recognized and approved of in the case of In re Dudley. The principle is this. The court has a peculiar jurisdiction over solicitors, as officers of the court, which it has not over anyone else. It is given because solicitors have great powers and privileges, and the object of it is to enforce honourable conduct towards clients. The power exercised under this jurisdiction is a disciplinary power, not one for the purpose of enforcing legal rights. If a solicitor, as a solicitor, obtains money by process of law for a client, then, quite irrespective of legal liability, he is bound to hand it over to the client; and if he spends it, or refuses to hand it over, he commits an offence against the honour of his profession, and comes within the court's disciplinary jurisdiction. When this solicitor kept back this money, he must have known he had no right to it. No doubt the client had a legal claim to it. But the breach of duty of which the solicitor was guilty was an entirely separate thing from the legal right of the client. The client brought an action and recovered judgment. The effect of this was that the debt due to him ceased to be a debt for money had and received, and became a judgment debt. But the conduct of the solicitor was not altered. The client's legal remedy is altered; but the disciplinary power of the court over the solicitor is not taken away. We were referred to In re Corbet Davies. It certainly looks as if the court there thought that under such circumstances the punitive jurisdiction of the court was taken away. But that was decided before the other cases which have been cited. If it is inconsistent with them, I think it must be taken to be overruled. We were also referred to In re Ball. But that case decided that, where there is a judgment, so long as that judgment stands the court will not exercise its disciplinary jurisdiction, if there is nothing to show that execution will not be effective. But it was not held that the court would hold their hands where judgment is ineffective. I am, therefore, of opinion that the court had jurisdiction to make an order against this solicitor. The court having jurisdiction, it is a matter of discretion how it should be exercised. In determining this question, the fact of a judgment having been obtained may well be taken into consideration as one of the circumstances of the case; for the court will not allow a solicitor to be oppressed. I am of opinion that the proper order to make is that the solicitor do pay the money within a month, but that the client in the meantime shall not proceed on his judgment without further order.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

In August, 1887, a petition was presented for the winding up of the plaintiff company. In May, 1888, two policies held by the defendant in the plaintiff company matured, and the amount insured thereby became payable by the plaintiff company to the defendant. These policies had been previously assigned by the defendant to the plaintiff company as security for loans to him, which loans had not been repaid. In July, 1889, a winding-up order was made, and in April, 1890, a deed of arrangement was entered into, under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1870, between the plaintiff company and the Sun Life Assurance Co., whereby it was provided that the policies of the plaintiff company should be transferred to the Sun Co., and that the holders of policies in the plaintiff company should, in full satisfaction of all claims upon the plaintiffs, accept certain reduced payments from the Sun Co. This deed of arrangement was agreed to by a statutory majority of policy-holders; but the defendant, whose policies had matured before the date of the deed of arrangement, did not assent to it. The plaintiff company, by its liquidator, in December, 1890, sued the defendant for the sums lent to him.

Held (affirming the decision of Charles, J., 40 *W. Ex parte Price, In re Lankester, 23 W. R. 844, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 648, distinguished.

Appeal of the plaintiff company from the judgment of Charles, J., 40 W. R. 443, at the trial without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the amount of two loans of £570 and £600, with interest. The facts, which were not in dispute, were as follows:—On the 5th of February, 1879, the defendant effected with the plaintiffs, who were a life insurance company, two policies of £1,000 each upon his own life, whereby the amount insured was to be payable to him if he was living on the 7th of May, 1888, or to his executors if he died before that date. In 1880 and 1887 he obtained from the plaintiff company loans amounting altogether to £1,170, and, by way of security, he mortgaged to the plaintiff's secretary his two policies of insurance.

On the 5th of August, 1887, a petition to wind up the plaintiff company was presented, and on the 2nd of September, 1887, a provisional liquidator was appointed. The defendant continued to pay his premiums, and on the 7th of May, 1888, the money insured by his two policies became due to him.

On the 30th of July, 1889, a winding-up order was made, and in September of that year a liquidator was appointed.

On the 11th of April, 1890, a deed of arrangement was made under the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, and sanctioned by the court. The defendant did not assent to the arrangement. The deed of arrangement provided that the policies in the plaintiff company on the 4th of August, 1887, were to be transferred on agreed terms to the Sun Life Assurance Co. Clause 1 provided that the Sun Co. should issue new policies to holders of policies which, if subsisting, would not have matured by the 4th of August, 1890, guaranteeing, first, the payment on death or other time specified in the policy of the reduced sum set against the policy-holder's name in the second schedule to the deed; and, secondly, the payment at such times as aforesaid of a certain dividend payable out of the assets of the plaintiff company. Clause 2 provided that, "as to the policies of the Sovereign Co. which, but for the said winding-up order, would have matured between the 4th of August, 1887, and the 4th of August, 1890, the Sun Co. will, within one month after proof of death and of title, make the said reduced payments to the representatives of such policy-holders or their assigns, and on the same terms and conditions as if such policy had been a subsisting policy, and had matured after the 4th of August, 1890." By clause 7 it was provided that the liquidator would from time to time pay over or transfer to the Sun Co. all such parts of the assets of the plaintiff company as would be properly applicable to meet the claims of the policy-holders of the plaintiff company who were such on the 4th of August, 1887, and by clause 11 it was provided that all such last-mentioned policy-holders should accept the provisions of this deed of arrangement in full satisfaction of all claims on the plaintiff company and the assets thereof. The deed further provided that the winding up should be continued so far as might be necessary to settle the rights of all parties.

In December, 1890, the plaintiff company, by the liquidator, brought this action to recover the sum of £1,345 19s. 5d., being the amount of the above-mentioned loans and interest thereon.

The defendant pleaded a set-off of the money which was payable to him by the plaintiff company in respect of his two policies.

Charles, J., gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Buckley, Q.C., and Hull (H. Tindal Atkinson with them), for the plaintiffs, contended that the deed of arrangement, which was binding on the defendant, having been sanctioned by the court, released the plaintiffs from all liability on the defendant's policies, and that, therefore, the defendant had no right of set-off; secondly, that the defendant could not prove on his policies until he had redeemed them by the payment of the loans.

They cited Ex parte Price, In re Lankester, 23 W. R. 844, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 648; In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., Lee and Chapman's case, 33 W. R. 513, 30 Ch. Crump, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the defendant, were not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case an insurance company which is in liquidation has brought an action by its liquidator for money lent to the defendant before the company went into liquidation. The defendant sets up as a defence that he has a right of set-off against the company, or against the liquidator, or against both. On that defence it has been contended for the company, first, that the defendant has no right of set-off; and, secondly, that his claim against the company has been released.

The first point to consider is, what will destroy the right of set-off; when an action is brought for a debt, will the fact that the plaintiff is in liquidation, and that the action is brought by the trustee in bankruptcy, destroy the right of set-off and compel the defendant to prove his debt in the bankruptcy? What would have been the rights of the parties under the old law in such a case? A trustee brings an action to recover a debt due; a set-off is pleaded, and it is suggested that it would have been a good replication that the bankrupt could only pay one shilling in the pound, thus wiping out the set-off or reducing it to one shilling in the pound. It is enough to say that such a thing was never heard of. The right of set-off, being the right of a defendant, can only arise when an action has been brought, and is the right of a defendant to set off a debt due to him from the plaintiff, and it, therefore, assumes the existence of a debt from the plaintiff to the defendant. The fact of the plaintiff's bankruptcy cannot do away with a debt due to the defendant; the defendant proves in the bankruptcy for the whole debt though he is prevented from getting more than a certain share of the assets. Therefore, when the trustee in bankruptcy brings an action against the bankrupt's creditor, the latter is within the very terms of the rule as to set-off. The right of set-off is a plea in bar, and although it may be true that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff. yet as the plaintiff is also the debtor of the defendant to the same or a larger amount, that bars the plaintiff's right of action. Bankruptcy, therefore, does not affect the right of set-off.

Formerly the kinds of debts which could be set off were limited, but section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has enlarged the subject-matter of the plea, although it has not altered the incidents of the right. In the present case we have to consider whether the defendant had a right of set-off when this action was brought. The company are suing for money lent by them to the defendant. The defendant admits that the money was lent, but says that at the time when the action was brought the company were indebted to him in an amount greater than his debt to the company, and that, therefore, he has a right of set-off. Were the company indebted to the defendant at that moment? Under the defendant's policy of insurance the company agreed to pay the defendant a sum of money at a date which had arrived at the time the action was brought, therefore the company were indebted to the defendant. His was not a future claim, but was a claim at that time for a definite ascertained amount. The company and the defendant were mutually indebted to one another. The bankruptcy of the company would prevent the defendant from getting the whole £2,000 due on his policies, but it does not affect the defendant's right of set-off. It is said that our decision is contrary to the case of Ex parte Price, In re Lankester, but the distinguishing feature of that case, as was pointed out in In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., is that there was no action at all, and the only rights considered were the rights of proof in bankruptcy. It is not necessary to consider what this defendant's rights would have been if there had been no action, and if the proceedings had been in bankruptcy; but we have to consider what are his rights in this action only, and, in my opinion, he has a right of set-off, which is a bar to the plaintiff's claim. That is in accordance with the case of In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., and is not in conflict with Ex parte Price, In re Lankester.

The defendant is, therefore, entitled to the benefit of his set-off unless the plaintiffs can show that the debt which the defendant wishes to set up has been released as against them. That depends on what happened at the meeting of the policy-holders, and on whether it can be said that that binds the defendant and prevents him from saying that he has released the plaintiff company. With regard to the meeting we must consider the persons who are to be summoned to it and who are to be dealt with as different classes, and we must consider the state of affairs at the date of the meeting. The Act of 1870 says that the persons to be summoned to the meeting are creditors, and are persons who can be divided into different classes, though the Act itself does not define the classes. But the reason of this division into classes is because the different classes of creditors have different interests, and therefore, if a different state of facts exists amongst different creditors, which difference may affect their minds and judgment, they must be divided into different classes. In the present case the persons who were summoned to the meeting were policy-holders whose policies were to be dealt with, no money was at that time due to them on their policies and they had no cause of action against the company. But the defendant was not then a policy-holder, because his policy had been fulfilled, and he was a creditor of the company for the amount of the policy; he had a vested cause of action, and the policy-holders had none, and it is obvious, therefore, that his interest was different from that of persons whose policies were still unfulfilled, and he cannot be said to have been in the same class as those who were summoned to the meeting. Consequently he is not bound by what took place at that meeting.

The judgment of Charles, J., must be affirmed. I think that he was right in holding that section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, does enlarge the subject-matter of the right of set-off. I think that in this case there might possibly have been a set-off apart from the statute, but if the right depends upon the statute, I agree with the judgment of Charles, J., that the defence is available to the defendant, and is a bar to the action.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an action for money lent. The defendant, by way of defence, says that he is entitled as against the plaintiff company to treat as a set-off money due from the company to him on his policies, which policies accrued due on the 7th of May, 1888. At that date there had already been a petition to wind up the company. The defendant had paid all the premiums on the policies, both before and after the date of the presentation of the winding-up petition, and on the day when the policies matured there was a large sum of money owing to him by the company. What was the defendant's position on that day? The company was being wound up, for the winding-up order, though subsequently made, dated back to the time of the presentation of the petition. The defendant was in the position of a person who on the one hand had effected a policy with the company and had assigned it to the company as security for a loan; on the other hand, he was entitled to say that the sum of £2,000 was due to him from the company on his policies. It is true that the winding up prevented his bringing an action against the company for the £2,000, but he was entitled to prove against the company for the value of his claim. His case is distinguished from that of the other policy-holders, whose rights had not matured; he had gone on paying his premiums after the winding up until his policies became due, and his claim had, therefore, a fixed and ascertained value.

The case closely resembles Macfarlane's claim, In re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co., 17 Ch. D. 337, 29 W. R. Dig. 47, and In re Bridges, Hill v. Bridges, 17 Ch. D. 342, 29 W. R. Dig. 7. The defendant was also in this position, that he had the company's money in his pocket, and was entitled to make use of a counter-claim or set-off against any action which the company might bring against him; he could not sue the company or counter-claim against them in the strict sense of the term because of the liquidation, but he could say that the transactions had resulted in mutual debts, and that he had a right to set off the debt of the company due to him against his own debt to the company. That was his position when his policies matured, and he could be in no worse position when the company brought their action. He was entitled to set up his defence of set-off, which is so large in amount as to be a bar to the company's claim. The winding up, which has not altered the rights of the parties in this respect, cannot prevent the defendant's right of set-off. I think this is a good set-off at law, but if it were not a good set-off at law, by reason of the assignment of the policies to the secretary of the company, it would at all events be a good set-off in equity. The effect of section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been to enlarge, not the effect of a set-off, but the meaning of the term. That is clear from the decision in In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co. I do not agree with the contention that Ex parte Price, In re Lankester is inconsistent with that case and governs the present one. Ex parte Price, In re Lankester, only dealt with the question of the right of set-off in a winding up, and does not affect the question of set-off or mutual dealings when action has been brought. Further, in that case, the court was dealing with policies which were still subsisting at the time the right of set-off accrued, but in this case the policy has matured. There is, therefore, in the present case, either a mutual debt or a mutual dealing, and unless there has been a release of the defendant's claim against the plaintiffs, the latter are out of court. The question of release depends on the construction of the deed of arrangement, and the effect of the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. I doubt whether the term "policy-holders" includes those who have been policy-holders, but whose policies have matured by the happening of the stipulated event. It is, however, unnecessary to decide that unless we think that the deed binds the dissentient creditors.

The Act of 1870 enables the majority of the creditors or of a class of creditors to bind the minority. It is legistation of a most compulsory character, and must therefore be construed carefully. If we are to construe the Act as was suggested on behalf of the plaintiffs, we should be holding that a class of creditors composed of policy-holders whose interests are uncertain may overrule the interests of those who have nothing to do with futurity and whose rights have already been ascertained.

It is obvious that the interests of the two classes are inconsistent, and that those whose policies are still subsisting are deeply interested in sacrificing the interests of those whose policies have matured. Ought we to construe the Act so as to include these persons in one class? In order to ascertain what is meant by "class" we must look at the scope of the section, which is a section enabling the court to order a meeting of a class of creditors to be called. It seems plain that the word "class" must have such a meaning as will prevent the section being so worked as to cause injustice, and that it must be confined to those whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest. If that be so, then, for the purpose of considering the deed of arrangement made with the company which took over the business of the plaintiff company, it was surely necessary, in order to constitute a class, not to group together those whose policies had already matured and those whose policies were still subsisting. The position of persons like the defendant, who had an ascertained sum of £2,000 due to him from the company, was entirely different from that of those policy-holders whose future was uncertain.

It was, therefore, not right to summon as members of the same class those who had an absolute bar against any claim of the company and those who had not. There was, in my opinion, no release of the defendant's claim against the plaintiffs, and the appeal must be dismissed.

I am not sorry to have had the opportunity of considering section 2 of the Act of 1870, which is often utilized, and sometimes in such a manner as to be liable to cause injustice.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. My judgment depends upon the facts, which are very peculiar and may possibly not occur again. [His lordship stated the facts.] The company has brought this action to recover the moneys lent, and the defendant claims to be entitled to a set-off for the moneys due on the policies, basing his claim chiefly upon the fact of the transaction amounting to a mutual credit or dealing within section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It is not denied that when the policies matured the company had sufficient funds to pay them. They were therefore then indebted to the defendant in the full amount of these policies. The only case which has been cited to us as throwing any difficulty in the way of the defendant's set-off is Ex parte Price, In re

Lankester; but there is a very broad distinction between the two cases. In that case a proof was tendered by the company in the bankruptcy of the assured, and the trustee in the bankruptcy attempted to avail himself of the mutual credit clause because at the date of the bankruptcy the bankrupt was entitled to a current policy which had not matured. But in the present case the claim which the defendant seeks to set off had already accrued due; it was a sum ascertained and liquidated. I do not dissent from Ex parte Price, In re Lankester, but for the reasons I have given it is distinguishable from the present case, which more nearly approaches the case of In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co. There was a clear debt due upon these policies when the present action was brought; and I think we may discard the argument founded upon the assignment of the policies to the company, because there will be a right of set-off in equity in cases where, but for some such circumstances as this assignment, there would have been a legal set-off. But I think that in this case the defendant probably had a set-off apart from the section, and even if he had not, there was clearly a mutual dealing between the company and the defendant, which entitled the defendant to have an account stated between them, and to bring in his claim under the mutual credit clause. As to the deed of arangement, I agree that the defendant is not bound by it; I do not think that clause 11 of that deed operates to deprive a man of an existing right of set-off, such as the defendant had, and I also think it doubtful whether the deed relates at all to policy-holders in the position of defendant, who belonged to quite a different class from those whose policies had not matured. I think, therefore, that the deed of arrangement cannot be treated as a release by the defendant of the debt due from the company.

Appeal dismissed.

DOBBS v. BRAIN AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Probate — Administration bond — Legacy to infant— Failure to provide for payment—Condition to well and truly administer—Breach—Sureties—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 81.

An administration bond was executed by administratrixes with the will annexed, and by two sureties, by which the administratrixes were to "well and truly administer" the personal estate of the deceased—"(that is to say) do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration so to them committed, as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charge them." The testator left a legacy of £50 to a person who was then, and at the time the action was brought, an infant. The administratrixes paid the debts and legacies, except this legacy of £50, and distributed the residue to those entitled under the will, at the same time handing over £50 to their brother-in-law to pay the legacy to the infant. The brother-in-law did not pay the £50, and had disappeared. In an action against the sureties by an assignee of the bond, suing on behalf of the infant, to recover the legacy of £50,

Held, that there had been a breach of the bond on the part of the administratrixes in distributing the whole of the estate without retaining sufficient to pay the legacy to the infant upon its attaining twenty-one, and that the sureties were, therefore, liable.

Appeal from the judgment of Pollock, B., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought against the defendants, as sureties, upon an administration bond, to recover a legacy of £50, or to have the £50 paid into the Bank of England, under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 32.

Jacob Curtis by his will bequeathed a legacy of £50 to Florence Emily Propert, a minor. No executors were appointed by the will, and letters of administration with the will annexed were granted to his daughters, Lucina Wellington and Hannah Maria Tingle, the residuary legatees, who executed an administration bond with the defendants as sureties. The condition of the bond was that if Lucina Wellington and Hannah Maria Tingle "do, when lawfully called on in that behalf, make or cause to be made, a true and perfect inventory of the personal estate and effects of the said deceased which have or shall have come to their hands, possession, or knowledge . . . and the same personal estate and effects do well and truly administer—(that is to say) do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration, so to them committed, as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charge them; and, further, do make, or cause to be made, a true and just account of their said administration when they shall be thereunto lawfully required, and all the rest and residue of the said personal estate and effects shall deliver and pay unto such person or persons as shall be by law entitled thereto, then this obligation to be void and of none effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue."

The administratrixes paid the money belonging to the estate into an account in their joint names at a bank, and after paying the debts and legacies, with the exception of the legacy now sued for, paid a sum of £50 to their brother-in-law, John Allen, who undertook to pay the legacy to Florence Emily Propert, and distributed the residue of the estate to those entitled to it under the will. Allen did not pay the £50 to the infant, nor was there any evidence where Allen was, or what he had done with the money. By order of the Probate Court the bond was assigned to the plaintiff under section 83 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, for the purpose of recovering the legacy of £50, the legatee being still an infant at the time the action was brought.

Pollock, B., held that, as the legacy was not payable until the infant came of age, there had been no breach of the bond, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Danckwerts and W. E. Hume Williams for the plaintiff.—First, the administratrixes could have paid the legacy to the infant. The only difficulty is that they could not have got a good discharge from the infant, and so the administratrixes might, instead of paying the infant, have paid the sum of £50 into the Bank of England, under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 32. [Bilson v. Saunders, Bunb. 240; Dagley v. Tolferry, 1 P. Wms. 285; Cooper v. Thornton, 3 Bro. Ch. 96 and 186, were referred to.] Secondly, the administratrixes did not well and truly administer the estate, or make a true and just account of their administration. They ought to have retained in their hands, or in some way secured out of the testator's estate, sufficient to pay the legacy. To pay the legacy out of other moneys would not satisfy the bond. The account must show that the money is safe. A wrongful paying away of the money is a wasting of the estate and a breach of the bond: Sandrey v. Michell, 11 W. R. 363, 3 B. & S. 405; Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson, 1 Cr. & M. 690; Archbishop of Canterbury v. Tappen, 8 B. & C. 151. The words "that is to say" do not cut down the obligation to well and truly administer.

They also referred to Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 81.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and J. A. Foote, for the defendants.—There has been no breach of the bond, as the administratrixes were not bound in law to pay the legacy to the infant. Payment before the legatee attains twenty-one would be null and void. The obligation to well and truly administer is explained by the following words, "that is to say," to mean payment of debts and legacies "so far as the law charge them," and rendering an account. The law only charges them to pay when the legatee comes of age, and there can be no breach until that time arrives. Payment of the legacy at that time out of any moneys would satisfy the bond.

They referred to Bolton v. Powell, 2 De G. M. & G. 1.

Danckwerts replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an action upon an administration bond against the sureties, the ground of action being that the administratrixes have committed a breach of the bond, and that consequently the sureties are liable. The administratrixes did what was only natural, they intrusted the administration of the estate to their brother-in-law, Allen, though by doing so they may render themselves liable at law. Allen received £50 for the infant legatee, and the evidence is clear that he has not paid it over. Allen went to America with the money, and it is not known where he is. Therefore these administratrixes have intrusted their agent with a part of the estate, and he has gone away with it. This money is lost to the estate. All the rest of the estate has been distributed, and none of it is left in the hands of the administratrixes. The bond having been assigned to the present plaintiff under section 83 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, for the purpose of suing upon it, the question is whether the action is maintainable. That depends upon the true construction of the bond. The bond is in common form settled under the provisions of section 81 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857. The bond so drawn up is intended to carry out the provisions of that section—that is to say, the bond is to be "conditioned for duly collecting, getting in, and administering the personal estate of the deceased." Taking those words alone, it seems to me that they include the duty of keeping the estate, after it has been collected and got in, until it is duly administered. Therefore section 81 recognizes the duty of the administrator to keep the estate until it is duly administered, and the intention of the bond is to enforce that duty upon the administrator, and by means of sureties to compel that duty to be performed. When we come to the bond we ought to construe it as far as possible so as to carry out the objects of the statute.

The first condition of the bond is that the administratrixes shall, when lawfully called on in that behalf, make or cause to be made a true and perfect inventory of the personal estate and effects of the deceased. If that condition were broken the administratrixes would commit a breach of the bond, and the sureties would be liable. The bond then proceeds:—"And the same personal estate and effects do well and truly administer." That assumes that the estate has been collected and got in. I apprehend that those words include the duty of keeping the estate until it has been duly administered. "That is to say, do pay the debts of the deceased which he did owe at his decease, and then the legacies contained in the said will annexed to the said letters of administration so to them committed, as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charge them." That seems to indicate the order in which the estate is to be administered, and the necessary meaning is that the administratrixes do pay out of the personal estate of the deceased the debts and legacies in the order there set out. The words are not intended to limit the duty of well and truly administering the estate, but merely to show the order in which it is to be done. If it is true to say that part of the duty of well and truly administering is to keep the personal estate until it is duly administered, then the true meaning is that the administratrixes are to keep the personal estate so as to be in a position to pay the debts and legacies. If the administratrixes have paid away the personal estate without keeping sufficient to pay the debts and legacies, then they have committed a breach of the obligation to well and truly administer. That seems to me to be the true construction of the bond when read so as to carry out the intention of the statute. Is there any authority dealing with this matter? The case of the Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson, 1 Cr. & M. 690, is an authority for the proposition that paying away the personal estate without retaining sufficient to pay the debts and legacies is a breach of the bond. It is true that in that case there is a statement of fact that after paying away the estate the administrator became bankrupt. That fact, however, is merely stated as evidence to show that the estate was entirely gone. In the present case the whole estate has been distributed, and nothing has been retained wherewith to pay the legacy when it becomes payable. Robertson's case is an authority for saying that when the estate is paid away so as to leave nothing wherewith to pay the legacies that become payable in the future, a breach of the bond has been committed, and the assignee of the bond may immediately sue the administrators and sureties. Any other decision would place persons having interests under a will in the greatest danger. It cannot be the law that an executor or administrator may speculate on the Stock Exchange or elsewhere with the deceased's personal estate, and lose the money, and then say that no breach of the bond has been committed because the legacy was not payable until the end of the year or until the legatee came of age. There has, therefore, been a breach of this bond on the part of the administratrixes, and the sureties are liable. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

FRY, L.J.—This bond is conditioned for the carrying out of four things. The first is the making a true and perfect inventory of the personal estate of the deceased. The second is the due administration of the estate. The third is the making a true and just account of the administration when lawfully required. The fourth is the paying over the residue to those entitled thereto. Now it is only with the second that we are concerned. The words of the bond are: "And the same personal estate do well and truly administer—(that is to say) do pay the debts of the deceased . . . and the legacies, &c., as far as the personal estate and effects will thereto extend, and the law charge them." The meaning seems to me to be that the administratrixes will pay the debts and legacies out of the personal estate in due course of administration. I come to this conclusion because payment of legacies is part of the due administration of the personal estate and effects, and consequently it follows that they must be paid out of the personal estate. The facts in the present case are that the two daughters of the deceased were appointed administratrixes, and as such they collected and got in the whole personal estate. They set aside £50 to meet the legacy of this infant, and handed it to Allen. They paid the debts and the other legacies, and distributed the residue. The whole of the estate is therefore gone, and the legacy to the infant has not been secured. There is no fund forthcoming out of which the legacy can be paid upon the infant coming of age. Can that be called a due course of administration of the estate? Is it the due course of administration to distribute the whole estate without first securing the payment of the legacy? Certainly not. Would payment of this sum of £50 by the administratrixes out of their own money be a due administration? Again I answer—No. Therefore there has been a breach of the administration bond. It is said that the law knows no distinction between the estate of the deceased and the private property of the administratrixes. That is not so. Both classes of property belong equally to the administratrixes, but they hold the deceased's estate in autre droit, and if they convert it they commit a legal wrong. The case of the Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson strongly confirms this view, for Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., says:—"When the administrator applies and converts to his own use the effects of the intestate, so that those effects are entirely lost to the estate of the intestate, that is such a breach of the condition of the bond by which the administrator undertakes 'well and truly to administer according to law,' as will entitle the next of kin to have the bond put in suit at their instance." The administratrixes here have applied the deceased's estate so that a part of that estate is entirely lost. That gives a right of action on the bond. It may be said that this reasoning is defective, because the infant may die before she attains it, and therefore the legacy may not become payable. The answer to any such argument is that the legacy vests at once, though it is not payable until the infant attains twenty-one. But even if the legacy were contingent the right to have the bond carried out would vest in the infant's next of kin, and their interests must be protected.

LOPES, L.J.—The question turns upon the meaning of the words in the administration bond, "well and truly administer" the personal estate of the deceased. The facts are that the administratrixes handed over the £50 to Allen, who has not paid it to the infant. This £50 is lost to the testator's estate. It was placed out of the control of the administratrixes. The whole of the estate has been distributed. There has, therefore, been a misapplication of the assets of the testator. That being so, there has been a breach of the condition to well and truly administer the estate, and out of that estate to pay this legacy. The decision in Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson is applicable here. The bond in that case was not in the same form as this, but the language of Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., is in point. He says: "The main question under these circumstances is this: Was the conduct of the administrator a breach of that part of the condition of the bond by which he undertook 'well and truly to administer the effects of the intestate'? Now, looking at the language of the bond, nothing can be more distinct and precise than those terms of the condition. . . . It would be difficult to entertain any doubt upon the natural construction of these words, and nothing would be a more direct infringement of the terms of the condition than the application of the effects of the intestate to his own use, and the converting them to his own purposes, so that they should be entirely lost to the estate of the intestate." In that case the administrator became bankrupt, but that fact was not material to the decision. It was said that no breach of the bond could be committed until this legacy was payable. That contention cannot be supported, because, under the condition to well and truly administer, it was the duty of the administratrixes to keep the amount of the legacy until the time of payment arrived. It was then said that the words "that is to say," &c., cut down the preceding general words. In my opinion that is not so. Those words and the following words are merely illustrations of what a due administration should be. It was further contended that, if the administratrixes provided money aliunde to satisfy this legacy when the time of payment arrived, that would be a compliance with the condition in the bond. In my opinion that would not be so. That would not be a payment out of the personal estate of the testator. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

HARRIS v. JUDGE. (a.)

County court — Practice — Costs — Action commenced in High Court — Transfer before trial to county court—Jurisdiction of High Court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), Part III., s. 65; Part IV., s. 116.

In an action commenced in the High Court, and transferred to the county court before trial, there is no jurisdiction in the High Court to make any order after the transfer. Every proceeding in the action must be taken in the county court, as if the action had been originally commenced therein.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Day and Charles, JJ., reported 40 W. R. 461) affirmed.

This was an appeal of the plaintiff from an order of a divisional court, consisting of Day and Charles, JJ., reversing an order made by Pollock, B., in chambers (reported 40 W. R. 461).

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgments and from the report in the court below.

Sills, for the plaintiff, and Ernest Pollock, for the defendant, used the same arguments as in the court below.

They cited Bazett v. Morgan, 38 W. R. 108, 24 Q. B. D. 48; Wilson v. Statham, 39 W. R. 686, [1891] 2 Q. B. 261; Moody v. Steward, 19 W. R. 161, L. R. 6 Ex. 35; Bowles v. Drake, 30 W. R. 333, 8 Q. B. D. 325; Barker v. Hempstead, 37 W. R. 685, 23 Q. B. D. 8.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the Divisional Court, reversing an order made by Pollock, B., in chambers, and dated the 1st of April, 1892. By that order the plaintiff was to be at liberty to tax his costs of the action on the High Court scale. This order was reversed upon the ground that Pollock, B., had no jurisdiction to make it. The action was commenced in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. It was for work and labour and materials. The amount claimed by the writ was less than £50—viz., £34 5s. 4d. The defendant pleaded (1) as to £7 14s., that the work was done for a society, and had been paid for since the writ was issued; (2) as to £1 11s. 9d., that the work was not done for the defendant; (3) as to £24 19s. 7d.—i.e., the residue—that the plaintiff's charges were unreasonable, and that £15 was enough to satisfy his claim, and the defendant paid this sum into court.

By an order dated the 16th of January, 1892, the action was transferred to the county court. It was tried there, and the result was that the plaintiff recovered more than £20, but less than £50. After the trial in the county court the plaintiff applied, by summons, in the High Court for, and obtained, the order of the 1st of April, which entitled him to the whole costs of the action on the High Court scale. The power of the learned judge to make this order is the question which this court has now to decide. The question is not whether the plaintiff is entitled to his costs of the action, nor whether, if he is, those costs ought to be taxed on the county court scale or on the High Court scale. The question is whether a judge of the High Court has any jurisdiction to make any order in an action commenced in the High Court which has been transferred to the county court before the matter comes before him. This question depends entirely on the County Courts Act, 1888. That Act is divided into parts, and Part III. relates to jurisdiction. Amongst the sections grouped under this head are some relating to actions commenced in the High Court, but remitted by a judge of that court to the county court. These sections are 65, 66, and 69. Section 65 is the section applicable to this case. [His lordship then read the section and proceeded:—] This section expressly says that after the action has been transferred to the county court "the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein." I cannot myself read these words in any sense which leaves any jurisdiction in the High Court. Every application which can properly be regarded as a proceeding in the action must be taken in the county court, as if the action had been originally commenced therein. An application for the costs of the action, or for an order to tax them, is in my opinion a "proceeding in the action," and must, therefore, be made to the county court, and not to the High Court. This was the view taken by the Divisional Court, and this, in my opinion, is the correct view. This was the course of procedure before 1888, and I see no indication of any intention on the part of the Legislature to alter the practice: Moody v. Steward; Bowles v. Drake.

But then it is contended that this view, though warranted by section 65, is not in conformity with section 116. This section is in Part IV., which is headed "Procedure and Trial," and runs as follows:—[His lordship having read the section proceeded:—] This section is addressed to costs, and to costs only, and does not relate to jurisdiction, which has been dealt with in Part III. of the Act. Nor can I find in section 116 any language which qualifies that part of section 65 to which I have already alluded as deciding the question of jurisdiction after a transfer. I cannot read the words "unless," &c., in section 116 as applicable to an action tried in the county court, and the merits of which a judge of the High Court must master before he can properly make any certificate or order respecting the costs of it. In a transferred action the rules contained in section 116 must, in my opinion, be applied by the judge of the county court to which the action has been transferred and not by the judge of the High Court, out of which the action has been removed. In an action not transferred the rules laid down in section 116 will of course have to be applied by the High Court. This construction appears to me to give full effect to both sections, and to be in conformity with the general scheme of the Act.

Upon the question of costs the two sections certainly create a difficulty. Section 65 says that the plaintiff's costs of a transferred action are to bear the High Court scale. Section 116 does not in terms refer to transferred actions, but is so worded as possibly to include them, and the section makes the plaintiff's costs depend on the amount he recovers. It is not necessary on the present occasion to decide the joint effect of these two sections, and I say no more about them.

My decision is based solely on the point of jurisdiction, and upon this point the Divisional Court was, in my opinion, right, and the appeal ought, therefore, to be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion after much reflection. The first view that I took during the argument was in favour of the opposite contention, and if I give a judgment of my own it is only to point out where I think the opposite view fails, and why I came to the same conclusion as my brothers. This action was brought in the High Court and was transferred to a county court. Section 65 is the section which deals with the question of jurisdiction. It provides that where an action has been transferred to a county court the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein. All proceedings in the High Court are to cease after the transfer, and the action must be taken to be a county court action. As to the costs down to the time of the transfer, the section is imperative. They are to be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the Supreme Court. After the transfer they are to be allowed according to the scale of costs in the county court. That is not quite clear. It leaves open the question, what jurisdiction the county court judge has. It may be that the construction must be put on it that it gives the county court judge jurisdiction as to some costs, though the greater part are to be according to a scale. I do not, however, give any decision upon that point as it was not gone into in argument and is not necessary for the determination of the case. The plaintiff has come to the High Court for a certificate under section 116, sub-section 2. Has the judge of the High Court jurisdiction to make it? Section 116 does not deal with that. It seems to me to apply to all actions including those transferred to a county court, and sub-section 1, in the case of certain actions commenced in the High Court, deprives the parties of their costs in certain events. Then can the plaintiff come to a judge of the High Court for a certificate under sub-section 2? If such a judge has any jurisdiction under the sub-section at all, it must be under the words introducing the exception "unless in any such action . . . a judge of the High Court certifies that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court, or unless the High Court or a judge thereof at chambers shall, by order, allow costs." It seems to me that those words do not add to the jurisdiction of the judge of the High Court where he has not already got jurisdiction. They receive an adequate meaning if they are held not to cover so much ground as the section itself. There may be cases in which the judge cannot bring the case within his beneficial jurisdiction. In certain cases the plaintiff is not to have any costs at all, and in certain others he is only to have them on the county court scale unless the judge otherwise orders; that is when he has power to do it: when he has not, it does not apply. The words of the exception do not operate to increase the jurisdiction, and I decide the case on the short ground that the words of the exception do not confer any jurisdiction, but simply provide for the making of an order by a judge of the High Court in a case in which he had jurisdiction, which he would have in an action which remained in the High Court.

I may add that it is a misfortune that Acts of Parliament should be printed in the way this Act is. The words of the exception to which I have referred must obviously apply, and were intended to apply, to sub-section 1 of section 116 as well as to sub-section 2, and yet these are printed as part of sub-section 2. As the section is printed it is misleading, and it is only by reason of the necessary form of the words that they must be construed as applying to both sub-sections. It might be worth while to refer to the Parliament roll to see whether as originally passed there was a break to separate the clause from the 2nd sub-section.

I think the judgment appealed against, is right. The judge in chambers had no jurisdiction, and the appeal must be dismissed. Our judgment does, I am aware, interfere with the practice hitherto accepted at chambers. I have made inquiries as to that and have ascertained that Pollock, B., in making his order, only followed the usual course. It is, however, satisfactory to find that this court does not by itself reverse the practice, but is affirming the judgment of the Divisional Court consisting of two experienced judges.

KAY, L.J.—The plaintiff in this case brought his action in the High Court on the 16th of December, 1891. The action was founded on contract. By an order dated the 16th of January, 1892, at his own instance it was transferred to the county court. The amount recovered in it was more than £20 but less than £50.

Pollock, B., by an order in chambers dated the 1st of April, 1892, directed that the costs of the action should be taxed on the High Court scale, including the costs of that application. On the 30th of April, 1892, the Divisional Court set aside that order and directed the plaintiff to pay the costs before them and in chambers. The present appeal is from this order of the Divisional Court.

By section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, if a plaintiff in an action founded on contract brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court recovers less than £20 he shall not be entitled to any costs, and if £20 or upwards but less than £50, "he shall not be entitled to any more costs than he would have been entitled to if the action had been brought in a county court."

I particularly observe that this section only applies to actions which could have been commenced in a county court.

The provision is absolute so far, and applies whether the action has been tranferred to the county court or not, but it continues: "Unless . . . a judge of the High Court certifies that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court, or unless the High Court or a judge thereof at chambers shall by order allow costs." That clearly applies to the case where the action remains in the High Court and is tried there. The certificate would be given at or after the trial; and so, I presume, would the order for costs which that section contemplates. Then comes a proviso, that if the plaintiff obtained judgment under order 14 for £20 or upwards he is to have costs on the High Court scale; that is because in the county court there is no power of making a summary order for judgment such as may be made in the High Court under order 14.

Does this section empower a judge of the High Court to give such a certificate or make such an order for costs after the whole action has been tranferred to a county court? In my opinion it does not. I think that after the transfer the High Court can make no order in the action except in case of an appeal under Part V. of the Act, and that the words are completely satisfied by reading them as applicable only when the action is tried out, in the High Court, and not after it has been transferred.

Section 65 empowers a judge at chambers to transfer any action, in which not more than £100 is claimed, to a county court; and provides that when the order is made "the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein," the costs subsequent to the transfer to be on the county court scale, "and the costs of the order and all proceedings previously thereto shall be allowed" on the High Court scale.

After such transfer, therefore, the judge of the High Court has no further jurisdiction in the action.

And as to costs, if less than £50 is recovered, in my opinion section 116 applies, and not section 65; and only county court costs can be given as to any part of the action.

I for these reasons think, with deference, that the order of Pollock, B., was without jurisdiction, and that the Divisional Court was right in setting it aside.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Action.

The plaintiffs were contractors for the erection of the Free Public Library, Preston. The principal defendants were a committee duly appointed to carry out this scheme, for which a certain fund had been bequeathed, the architect and a subsequent contractor for special parts of the work being also joined.

The contract between the plaintiffs and the committee provided in effect that no payment should be due until the amount was certified by the architect, that all disputes should be referred to him as sole arbitrator, and that his certificate, orders, or awards "should be final and binding upon the committee and the contractors respectively, and should not be set aside or attempted to be set aside by reason or on account of any informality, omission, or delay, or error of proceeding in or about the same, or any of them, or in relation thereto, or on any other ground, or for any other reason, or for any pretence, suggestion, charge, or insinuation of fraud, collusion, or confederacy."

The architect having made a certificate for a smaller amount than the plaintiffs considered themselves entitled to, they brought this action against the committee for the larger amount, alleging that the architect had not bonâ fide certified the amount due to them, but had knowingly certified for a smaller sum in order to leave a larger sum for payment of his own claims. The fund was in fact insufficient to satisfy all the claims in full.

All imputations of fraud or complicity against the committee were fully withdrawn at the bar.

The committee relied on the architect's certificate and the above clause.

Levett, Q.C., and T. R. Hughes, for the plaintiffs.—The above clause is against public policy, and cannot stand in our way; Kemp v. Rose, 1 Giff. 258, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 12; Kimberley v. Dick, 20 W. R. 49, L. R. 13 Eq. 1; Stevenson v. Watson, 27 W. R. 682, 4 C. P. D. 148.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Church, for the committee.—No fraud is now charged against us. The rules avoiding contracts on the ground of public policy will not be arbitrarily extended.

Farwell, Q.C., and Geo. Henderson, for the architect.

T. B. Napier, for the subsequent contractor.

CHITTY, J., read the above clause and continued: Whenever public policy is mentioned it is the duty of the court to look carefully into the matter, and not arbitrarily extend the rules upon which certain decisions have turned in regard thereto. It is said that the clause in question is void as being against public policy, because in substance it is an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs and the committee not to set up fraud, and the argument proceeds in this way, "The court will not listen to any such stipulation to be found in any contract, however solemn." To some portion of this argument I accede. If a contract were obtained by fraud, and in the contract itself there were the term inserted that neither party should impeach the contract on the ground of fraud, it may be that such a term would not stand. The reason is obvious. The court would probably set aside that contract because it was obtained by fraud, and in so doing it would set aside the stipulation. That would be a case of fraud in the inception of the contract. It may be also that if there were a stipulation in an executory contract pointing to future fraud on the part of either of the contracting parties such a clause as that would not hold. But the case I have to deal with is an entirely different one. Those who frame clauses in building contracts have by degrees kept on making them more and more stringent by reason of the consequences that follow from opening a certificate and the enormous cost and litigation that arises when the work is a large work, like a railway or a large public building, from any court of justice endeavouring to take the account. A litigation of that kind it is almost impossible to bring to a conclusion in a court of justice, and it appears to me that those who deal in matters of this kind are wise in making the clauses more and more stringent. It is, of course, for the contractor, when he enters into a contract of this kind, to consider whether he will accept it or not. I have no doubt contractors do accept clauses which to the lawyer look terrific, but they do it as business men: they do it for better or worse, and they think on the whole it is very unlikely that any arbitrator selected would act unjustly towards them, and they are content to take him as the person whose award is to be final on the subject. The policy of the law does not require that I should hold in the case I am now dealing with a clause like the present to be void. To put an illustration—suppose a gentleman who is going to have a house built for him, on entering into a complex agreement with the contractor, in the performance of which innumerable questions may arise, says, "Will you agree with me that nothing on earth shall upset the certificate that is given?" Why is that unfair? I can see no reason why grown-up men should not be allowed to contract in these terms, saying, "Neither of us will ever raise the charge of fraud."

I fully adopt the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in Printing and Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, 23 W. R. 463, L. R. 19 Eq. 462, where he says (p. 465): "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because, if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts when entered into freely and voluntarily shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore you have this paramount public policy to consider: that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract."

Persons will often shrink from having charges of fraud made against them, and those who are persistent will, by making such charges, induce persons to come to terms of compromise. The clause is intended to obviate this evil, and therefore stands thus: "Both of us agree that every certificate given by the gentleman named shall stand firm and good, and shall not be questioned, even for fraud." That that is the meaning of the clause I have no doubt. Mr. Levett argued that the word "charge" must mean unfounded charge, because he found it in company with the words "pretence" (which, he says, means something not done), "suggestion" (something that you dare not state openly), and "insinuation" (something else that you dare not state, and will not state, and have not the courage to state), and he said the word "charge" is coloured by the other three words. But the answer, I think, is plain. "Charge" is a word which has been inserted here deliberately, because to read it as meaning an unfounded charge is almost to make nonsense of it. Any man who makes an unfounded charge of fraud fails in it, and no protection is required. Consequently, if that were the meaning of the clause, it would have no operation whatever. The parties say, "We will have no question of this kind raised as against the certificate." If the case had been that the committee themselves had been party in any way to the fraud it would have been very different, and it may be that Mr. Levett's argument (and as at present advised I think it would have been so) would have succeeded.

That disposes of the main point in the action, and it shows that the action is not justified as against the committee, and, as no relief is claimed against the architect, the charge of fraud cannot be entered upon as against him.

Action dismissed, with costs.

In re DAVIES.
DAVIES v. DAVIES. (a.)

Insurance—Policy of life insurance—Power of nomination—Disposition or charge—Will—Residuary bequest.

Testator effected a policy of insurance upon his life. The rules of the insurance society provided that, in default of any nomination by the assurer, the sum insured should be paid to his assigns under any disposition or charge made by the assurer specifically affecting the said sum, either by express reference thereto or by reference generally to sums due upon assurance, and, in default of any nomination or disposition, the sum should be paid to the assurer's widow if she survived him, and, if not, to his children living at his death. Testator, by his will, gave three-fourths of his residue to his three daughters, and the remaining one-fourth to the widow and children of his deceased son. Testator made no nomination or disposition of the sum unless by the above residuary bequest. Testator's wife predeceased him. Three daughters were living at his death.

Held, that testator had not by his will disposed of the policy-money, and that the contract was legal by which, in the events which happened, the policy-moneys should go to his three daughters.

This was a special case to determine whether certain moneys received under a policy of insurance taken out in the Clergy Mutual Insurance Society on March 9, 1847, by the testator, the Rev. E. Davies, on his own life, constituted part of the residuary estate of the testator, or whether the plaintiffs, his three daughters, were alone entitled.

Rule 20 of the society provided as follows:—"In case there shall not be any nomination duly registered existing in respect of the sum assured when due, or so far as no such nomination shall extend, such sum shall be paid to the assigns (if any) of the assurer so far as the claims of such assigns shall extend in every case where such claims shall have arisen under any disposition or charge made by the assurer specifically affecting such sum or any part thereof, either by express reference thereto or by reference generally to sums due upon assurances, whether such disposition or charge shall have been made by deed, will, or codicil, or by any other instrument in writing." "And in case there shall not be any nomination duly registered, nor any such disposition or charge as aforesaid existing in respect of the sum assured when due, or so far as no such nomination and no such disposition or charge shall extend, such sum shall be paid to the widow of the assurer, the assurer being a male . . . or if he shall not leave a widow, then to the child or children of the assurer living at his death, if more than one in equal shares, and if only one the whole to such one; and if there shall be no such child . . . then to the executors, administrators, or assigns of the assurer."

By his will, dated October 4, 1889, the testator, under certain powers contained in his marriage settlements, appointed all the funds subject thereto, and devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate upon trust, as to one-fourth part for each of his three daughters, and as to the remaining fourth part, except so much thereof as should form part of the property subject to the said marriage settlements, for the widow and children of his deceased son as therein mentioned; and as to the remaining unappointed fourth share of the property subject to the marriage settlements, for the children of his deceased son as therein mentioned.

The testator survived his wife, and died in July, 1890, having never made any nomination, disposition, or charge affecting the said policy, unless the disposition of his residuary estate by his will, as above set out, was such a disposition.

The plaintiffs were the testator's three daughters, who were the only children who survived him, and who were the trustees and executors of his will. The defendants were the widow and children of the testator's deceased son.

A sum of £982 had been paid to the plaintiffs as representing the policy-moneys.

Eve, for the plaintiffs, cited Phillips v. Cayley, 38 W. R. 241, 43 Ch. D. 222, and referred to the Wills Act, 1837, s. 27.

Bardswell, for the widow and children of the deceased son.—The provision that the policy-moneys shall be paid to the widow and children of the assurer is illegal, as tending to defeat creditors. The testator had a general power of appointment by will which he intended to, and did, exercise.

He cited Ashby v. Costin, 37 W. R. 140, 21 Q. B. D. 401; Murray v. Favell, 32 W. R. 102, 25 Ch. D. 89; In re Marsh, Mason v. Thorne, 38 Ch. D. 630, 36 W. R. Dig. 151.

NORTH, J.—No doubt this case is covered by authority, were authority necessary. If the assured had left no widow or child then the policy-moneys would have been his own and would have belonged to his executors, and so far as he had not disposed of it himself would have belonged to his estate. But here it is clear he has made a legal contract that it should belong to his widow, or in default to his children, if he did not resort to modes of disposition to which he has not resorted. It is said that the contract is illegal, that it is against public policy as tending to defeat creditors, but it does not do so. He might have charged it with the payment of his debts in his lifetime, or by will have given it to his executors, or made a residuary bequest, adding words referring to the policy or words having a general reference to sums due upon assurances. But even if the contract were illegal the present claim is not made by creditors, but by persons who derive title under the will. Phillips v. Cayley is a clear authority that the will does not operate as a disposition of the policy-moneys. Murray v. Flavell and Ashby v. Costin are also authorities to the same effect. The contract is, therefore, effective to make the three daughters entitled to the policy-moneys.

will not be registered here unless it is a mark otherwise capable of registration under the law of this country.

This was a motion on the part of a company incorporated under the law of the State of New York for an order directing the Comptroller-General to proceed with the registration of a trade-mark that had been refused.

The applicants were manufacturers of pills. The trade-mark sought to be registered consisted of the words "Carter's Little Liver Pills" in three lines, surrounded by upright and horizontal lines. The application to register contained the following disclaimer:—"The essential particulars are the following, the words 'Little Liver,' and the applicants disclaim any right to the exclusive use of the word 'pills.'" The applicants had registered their trade-mark in New York. The application in that country contained the following:—"The said words 'Carter's' and 'Pills' do not, however, form an essential part of our trade-mark, the essential feature of which resides in the fanciful title or designation 'Little Liver,' which term indicates to the public the origin and ownership of goods of our manufacture."

The present application was made under section 103 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. The material parts of that section, as corrected by the amending Act of 1885, are as follows:—

"(1) If her Majesty is pleased to make any arrangement with the Government or Governments of any foreign State or States for mutual protection of any inventions, designs, or trade-marks, or any of them, then any person who has applied for protection for any invention, design, or trade-mark in any such State shall be entitled to a patent for his invention or to registration of his design or trade-mark (as the case may be) under this Act, in priority to other applicants; and such patent or registration shall have the same date as the date of the protection obtained in such foreign State.

"Provided that his application is made, in the case of a patent within seven months, and in the case of a design or trade-mark within four months, from his applying for protection in the foreign State with which the arrangement is in force.

"Provided that nothing in this section contained shall entitle the patentee or proprietor of the design or trade-mark to recover damages for infringements happening prior to the date of the actual acceptance of his complete specification, or the actual registration of his design or trade-mark in this country, as the case may be.

"(3) The application for the grant of a patent, or the registration of a design, or the registration of a trade-mark under this section must be made in the same manner as an ordinary application under this Act.

"Provided that in the case of trade-marks, any trade-mark the registration of which has been duly applied for in the country of origin may be registered under this Act.

"(4) The provisions of this section shall apply only in the case of those foreign States with respect to which her Majesty shall from time to time by Order in Council declare them to be applicable, and so long only in the case of each State as the Order in Council shall continue in force with respect to that State."

The treaty rights under which the application was made were an Industrial Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property and a protocol. The convention was signed in March, 1883, at Paris, on behalf of France and other States, neither Great Britain nor the United States being original parties. It contained a provision that other States should be permitted to adhere to the convention at their request.

The convention also contained, among others, the following provisions:—

"II. The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting States shall, in all other States of the Union, as regards patents, industrial designs or models, trade-marks and trade-names, enjoy the advantages that their respective laws now grant or shall hereafter grant to their own subjects or citizens. Consequently they shall have the same protection as the latter, and the same legal recourse on any infringement of their rights, provided they observe the formalities and conditions imposed on subjects or citizens by the internal legislation of each State.

"IV. Any person who has duly registered an application for a patent, industrial design or model, or trade-mark, in one of the contracting States shall enjoy, as regards registration in the other States, and reserving the rights of third parties, a right of priority during the periods hereinafter stated. Consequently subsequent registration in any of the other States of the Union before the expiration of these periods shall not be invalidated through any acts accomplished in the interval, either, for instance, by registration, by publication of the invention, or by the working of it by a third party. The above-mentioned terms of priority shall be six months for patents and three months for designs, models, and trade-marks. A month longer is allowed for countries beyond the sea.

"VI. Every trade-mark duly registered in the country of origin shall be admitted for registration and protected in the form originally registered in all the other countries of the Union. That country shall be deemed the country of origin where the applicant has his chief seat of business. If this chief seat of business is not situated in one of the countries of the Union, the country to which the applicant belongs shall be deemed the country of origin. Registration may be refused if the object for which it is solicited is contrary to morality or public order."

The plenipotentiaries of the contracting States signed also a protocol, which, it was declared, should have the same force and validity as the convention itself. The fourth paragraph of the protocol contains the following:—

"Paragraph I. of Article VI. is to be understood as meaning that no trade-mark shall be excluded from protection in any State of the Union, because it does not satisfy, in regard to the signs composing it, the conditions of the legislation of that State, provided that on this point it comply with the legal requirements of the country of origin and that it has been properly registered in the said country of origin. With this exception, which relates only to the form of the mark, and otherwise reserving the clauses of the other articles of the convention, the internal legislation of each State remains in force."

On the 17th of March, 1884, the convention was acceded to by the Government of Great Britain. By an Order in Council, dated the 12th of July, 1887, it was declared that the provisions of section 103 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, should be applicable to the United States of America. On the 30th of July, 1887, the convention was acceded to by the Government of the United States.

Aston, Q.C., Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and Fothergill, for the motion.—The court ought to look at the convention and protocol as surrounding circumstances to assist it in construing the Act. Sub-section 3 of section 103 of the Act renders compulsory the registration of a trade-mark that has been registered in one of the countries included in the convention, whether such trade-mark complies with the requirements of the law of this country or not.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Board of Trade.—In construing the Act the court cannot look beyond the Act. The Act only protects trade-marks that are capable of registration according to the law of this country. This is not a trade-mark within the definition contained in section 64 of the Act. The applicants have no right to the exclusive use of the words "Little Liver," but the Board of Trade have no objection to register the trade-mark as a combination, if the applicants will disclaim any right to the exclusive use of those words.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the application is not well founded. The difficulty arises from the provisions at the end of sub-section 3 of section 103 of the Act of 1883. This Act was passed at a time when certain proceedings were going on with a view to mutual relations between foreign countries. I do not think it wrong as a matter of history to refer to the position in which the parties stood to one another. But in my opinion it would be entirely wrong to refer to those matters for the purpose of construing the Act. In 1883 there were negotiations in process, and a convention was arrived at for the mutual protection of trade-marks between certain countries, of which Great Britain was not one. [His lordship then shortly referred to the provisions of the convention.] In 1884 the Government of Great Britain acceded to this convention, and in 1887 the United States did so. It was in anticipation of this that section 103 was inserted in the Act. It was not intended to be applicable to all possible arrangements that might be made, but to the difficulty arising from the circumstance that a person might formerly obtain a patent for an invention in this country and some other countries, without being the inventor at all. Section 103 as corrected by the Act of 1885 provides that if such an arrangement be made, any person who has applied for protection in the foreign country shall be entitled to the registration of his mark in priority to other applicants. It does not say that he shall be entitled to the mark out and out, but only in priority to other applicants. Then sub-section 3 says that the application for the grant or registration must be made in the ordinary way under the Act. All that is clear, dealing with the application. Then we come to this: "Any trade-mark the registration of which has been duly applied for in the country of origin may be registered under this Act." Now that may mean one of three things—(1) that where registration has been applied for in the country of origin, it may be applied for in this country; or (2) that registration in the country of origin justifies registration here; or (3) that application for registration, even if it cannot be granted in the foreign country, justifies and necessitates registration here: which is an absurd result.

I read that this refers not to registration but to application for registration, a construction which is borne out by the words "duly applied for." But then Mr. Aston says that what you have to find out is whether there has been a due application for registration in the foreign country, for which purpose you would have to find out what the law requires in the foreign country. But in my opinion the true meaning is that application is justified here, where there has simply been an application there. Then there is the question in what form the order should be made. The Attorney-General is willing not to object to the trade-mark being registered with a larger disclaimer so as to protect the public, as he considers, sufficiently. But I think the best course is to refuse the application altogether, and not to consent to such a registration as the Attorney-General was prepared to make.

A tenant for life had paid certain instalments of rent-charges which had, between 1885 and 1890, been created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, to secure money borrowed by him for improvements on the settled estates. On an application to the court to authorize, under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, the repayment to him by the trustees, out of capital moneys in their hands, of the instalments paid by him before March, 1892, when he first called upon the trustees to provide for the instalments,

Held, that the case did not come within section 15 of the Act of 1890, but within section 1 of the Act of 1887, and that the application must be refused.

Adjourned summons.

A tenant for life under a settlement dated the 31st of August, 1874, had between the years 1885 and 1890 borrowed from the Lands Improvement Co. various sums of money, amounting to £3,279, for the purpose of carrying out improvements on the settled estates, and had created rent-charges under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, to secure the repayment of the same. The rent-charges as they became due were paid by the tenant for life until the 10th of March, 1892, when he formally requisitioned the trustees of the settlement to provide for the future payments of the rent-charges and demanded repayment out of capital moneys in their hands of the sums already paid by him. The trustees refused to act without the sanction of the court, and the tenant for life then took out this summons, asking for a declaration that any moneys in the hands of the trustees being capital moneys under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, or applicable as such, might properly be applied by the trustees (a) in payment of all future instalments, whether consisting of principal or interest of the several rent-charges, or (b) in payment of any sums required for the redemption of the said rent-charges respectively, including therein any sum payable by way of bonus for redemption, and in either case (c) in payment to the applicant of all instalments, whether consisting of interest or principal already paid by him in respect of such rent-charges respectively.

The summons came before Stirling, J., in chambers, on the 26th of May, 1892, when he made a declaration allowing the payments under heads (a) and (b), and adjourned the rest of the summons into court.

Crawley, for the applicant.—The improvements in this case were such as were authorized by the Settled Land Acts, and the court can therefore, under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, direct the application of capital moneys for their payment. Although that section was passed to obviate the difficulty occasioned by the decision in In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, 35 W. R. 463, 35 Ch. D. 41, it gives the court a discretionary power to relieve tenants for life from payments for improvements authorized by the statutes. In re Knatchbull's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 10, 569, 27 Ch. D. 349, 29 Ch. D. 588, decided that rent-charges such as the ones in this case were not incumbrances affecting the inheritance within the Act of 1882; but it was held, under the Act of 1887, that capital moneys might be applied in redemption of such rent-charges: In re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates, 38 W. R. 762, 45 Ch. D. 395. Your lordship's decision in the case of In re Howard's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 360, [1892] 2 Ch. 233, was on the 1st section of the Act of 1887, and more extensive powers are conferred on the court by the Act of 1890.

He also referred to In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 162, 37 Ch. D. 123.

W. C. Druce, for the trustees, did not oppose the application.

STIRLING, J.—The numerous enactments which have been passed for the purpose of amending the Settled Land Act, 1882, make it somewhat difficult to ascertain the meaning and intention of the Legislature with reference to the various applications which are from time to time made under those Acts, but I think the present application must fail.

The Act of 1882 authorized the application of capital money arising thereunder in various ways. One way is mentioned in section 21 (ii.) of the original Act—viz., "In discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land, or other the whole estate the subject of the settlement, or of land tax, rent-charge in lieu of tithe, crown rent, chief rent, or quit rent charged on or payable out of the settled land." Another way is mentioned in sub-section (iii.) of the same section—viz., "In payment for any improvement authorized by this Act."

After the passing of the original Act the question arose which was decided in the case of In re Knatchbull's Settled Estates. In that case improvements had been effected under the Land Drainage Act, 1849, and the Land Improvement Act, 1864, and had been paid for by money raised upon rent-charges created under those Acts, and the application was that capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882, might be applied in discharge of the incumbrances. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the rent-charges so created were not "incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land" within the meaning of section 21 (ii.) which the tenant for life was entitled to have paid out of capital money, so as to relieve him from the payment of the instalments. Thereupon the Legislature altered the law by passing the Settled Land Act, 1887, section 1 of which provides that "where any improvement of a kind authorized by the Act of 1882 has been made or may be made either before or after the passing of this Act, and a rent-charge, whether temporary or perpetual, has been or may be created in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, with the object of paying off any moneys advanced for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such improvement, any capital money expended in redeeming such rent-charge or otherwise providing for the payment thereof shall be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorized by the Act of 1882." It is to be observed that the Legislature did not enact that these rent-charges should be deemed to be "incumbrances affecting the inheritance" within the meaning of section 21 (ii.) of the Act of 1882, but that capital money expended in redeeming such rent-charges should be deemed to be applied in payment for improvements authorized by the Act of 1882. Accordingly it was held by the Court of Appeal in In re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates that by section 1 of the Act of 1887 capital money might be applied in payment of instalments of terminable rent-charges for which the tenant for life was liable.

But I have held in In re Howard's Settled Estates that that section is not retrospective in its operation. My decision in that case was given upon the Act of 1887 alone, and of course I adhere to it. It is now submitted that I ought to make the order asked for in this case, on the ground that it is sanctioned by section 15 of the Act of 1890. In order to understand the meaning of that section it is necessary to refer to the case of In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates, in which it was held that capital money could not be applied in recouping to a tenant for life money paid for improvements executed by him without first submitting a scheme to the trustees and obtaining their approval. That being the state of the law the Legislature passed the amending Act of 1890, by section 15 of which it is provided that "the court may, in any case where it appears proper, make an order directing or authorizing capital money to be applied in or towards payment for any improvement authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882, notwithstanding that a scheme was not, before the execution of the improvement, submitted for approval, as required by the Act of 1882, to the trustees of the settlement or to the court. Now all that was intended by the Legislature there was simply to remove the blot revealed by In re Hotchkin's Settled Estates; but is is said that I ought to hold that sums already paid by a tenant for life in respect of instalments of these rent-charges should be treated as payments for improvements authorized by the Settled Land Acts. Now, by section 1 of the Act of 1890, that Act is to be construed as one with the Acts of 1882 to 1887, and I must therefore read it as if it stood in one Act comprising the whole of the Acts, and in particular section 1 of the Act of 1887. That being so, I have now to say whether sums already paid by the tenant for life in respect of instalments of improvement rent-charges can be treated as payments for improvements authorized by the Acts, and therefore payable out of capital money, and it seems to me that that is not the true construction of section 15. The Act of 1887 draws a distinction between moneys paid in redemption of such rent-charges and payments for improvements. They are only to be deemed to be applied in payment for improvements. They are not payments for improvements in fact. It seems to me, therefore, that I should be unduly straining the words of section 15 if I were to hold that the present application is justified by it. I do not think the case comes within that section, but within section 1 of the Act of 1887. The third part of the summons therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

Company—Winding up—Practice—Petition for compulsory winding up—Supervision order—Readvertisement of petition—Wishes of creditors—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63).

Since the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the making of a supervision order on a petition for a compulsory order, where the petitioners and the creditors and contributories are all, so far as is known, desirous of a supervision order, is not so much a matter of course as it was before the Act.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where two petitions as presented and advertised prayed for the compulsory winding up of an important banking company, but a supervision order only was asked for at the hearing, Held, that the petitions must stand over for the issue of fresh advertisements stating that at the hearing a supervision order would be asked for.

Petition.

Two petitions were presented for the winding up of this company, one by the company and the other by creditors. Subsequently, resolutions were duly passed by the company for a voluntary winding up, and that a Mr. Welton should be appointed liquidator; and he was authorized to appear and consent to an order that the voluntary winding up should be continued under the supervision of the court. A supervision order was now asked for on behalf of the company at the hearing before Vaughan Williams, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

It appeared that the company was incorporated in 1884, its objects being generally to carry on a banking business in London or in the East, such objects being more particularly defined by a special Act of Parliament passed in 1889. The nominal capital was £2,000,000, divided into £10 shares, but only 59,800 of the shares had been issued, on which, however, everything was paid up. The company's petition was supported by holders of 550 shares and by creditors for a large amount. It was said that all persons interested seemed desirous of a supervision order.

Robinson, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the company.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the petitioning creditor.

Vernon R. Smith, for shareholders supporting the application.

George Lawrence and Harman, for creditors supporting the application.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said he was aware that it had been the practice of the Chancery Division, where the petitioners and the creditors and contributories desired a supervision order, to make such an order. But that practice was mainly founded on decisions pronounced prior to the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. Since then, having regard to the fact that the object of the Legislature was that creditors and contributories should have a special protection under a compulsory winding-up order which they had not enjoyed before, the making of a supervision order was not now, under such circumstances, so much a matter of course as formerly. The petitions, as presented and advertised, asked for a compulsory order, and there might be many people who thought that the order which would be made would be the order that was asked for. As they did not know that at the hearing a mere supervision order would be asked for, his lordship thought the proper course was to adjourn the matter for a week. The protection of the Board of Trade was only present when a compulsory order had been made, and creditors and contributories should have an opportunity of coming forward if they desired such an order. His lordship did not say this with a view to encouraging creditors or shareholders to come and ask for compulsory orders, but he thought it right not to make the order at once, so that the persons interested might have the benefit of the protection given them by the Legislature if they wished for it, a protection which they could only have when a compulsory order was made. The petitions must both stand over for a week, and in the meantime advertisements must be issued stating that at the hearing a supervision order would be asked for.

At the further hearing of the case only one creditor, a depositor in the bank, opposed a supervision order. He appeared in person, and asked that a compulsory order might be made, alleging mismanagement and other grounds, and attempting to support his case by statements which his lordship declined to hear without affidavits. His lordship made the usual supervision order on both petitions, pointing out that the applicant would not be prevented thereby from presenting a petition for a compulsory order.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Oct. 25, 26.

KIMBER v. PRESS ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Libel—Privilege—Report of judicial proceeding—Application to justices for summons—Open court—Fairness of report—Burden of proof—Province of judge.

Where justices specially summoned for the purpose sit in their council chamber to hear an application for the issue of a summons on a criminal charge, a fair report of what takes place on such proceeding is privileged, although no evidence is given on oath, and although such proceeding does not result in a final decision, but leads to a further inquiry.

The burden of showing that an alleged libel is a fair report of a judicial proceeding lies on the defendant; but it is sufficient if this clearly appears from the plaintiff's evidence. Where the plaintiff's contention is that the report is rendered unfair by certain omissions, if the judge thinks such omissions to be immaterial he may decline to leave the case to the jury, and order verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant.

Application by the plaintiff for a new trial of an action of libel, or for judgment.

The action was brought by the plaintiff in respect of the following paragraph, which was furnished by the defendants to several newspapers:—"Alleged perjury by a solicitor.—Mr. W. M. Thompson, barrister, applied at the Guildhall, Canterbury, to-day, for a summons against Edmund Kimber, solicitor, of Alpine-villas, Shooter's-hill, and 15, Walbrook, for perjury alleged to have been committed in the Canterbury Bankruptcy Court in connection with some bankruptcy proceedings. The bench acceded to the application." The defence was that the words complained of were a fair and accurate report of a judicial proceeding published bonâ fide and without malice.

At the trial, which took place before Hawkins, J., and a jury, it was contended for the plaintiff that there were certain omissions in the paragraph which rendered it an unfair report of the proceedings in question; and that the application for the summons being an ex parte application, made to magistrates sitting in private, and not in open court, the report of such proceedings was not privileged. The clerk to the Canterbury magistrates was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and said that the application was made at the Guildhall Council Chamber to three magistrates who had been summoned by himself to hear the case. There was only one other person present besides those actually engaged in the case. He did not know whether anyone was in charge of the door. Counsel said he applied on behalf of a Mr. Hasker for a summons for perjury alleged to have been committed by Kimber in certain bankruptcy proceedings in which Kimber had acted as a solicitor. No evidence was given on oath. The summons was granted, but when it subsequently came on to be heard, the case was dismissed. The plaintiff was also called and gave evidence.

The learned judge, after hearing argument, held that the publication was privileged, being a bonâ fide report of a matter heard in a court of law; and being of opinion that there was no evidence of unfairness, he declined to leave the case to the jury, and ordered verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Candy, Q.C., and J. E. Fox (A. Macpherson with them), for the plaintiff.—This publication is not privileged. The right to publish reports of judicial proceedings depends on the right of the public to be present. The public have no right to be present at an ex parte application for a summons. Section 19 of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42) says that the room in which the examination of an accused person takes place is not to be deemed an open court. A fortiori, when an application is made ex parte for the issue of a summons the room where the justices sit is not an open court. This case is different from Lewis v. Levy, 6 W. R. 629, E. B. & E. 537. That was the case of the hearing of a summons which had been already granted, and evidence was taken on oath. The court refrained from holding that the publication of preliminary inquiries before magistrates was universally lawful. The effect of Usill v. Hales, 26 W. R. 371, 3 C. P. D. 319, is that a preliminary inquiry, which does not result in a final decision, but merely leads to a further investigation, does not come within the rule of privilege. Next, this report is rendered unfair by two omissions. The first is that of the name of the applicant, which is a very important matter in such a case. If Mr. Hasker's name had been given in the report it might be that the publication would not have done the plaintiff any injury. The other omission is that of the name of the person in whose bankruptcy proceedings the perjury was alleged to have been committed. The effect of this is that the words convey the impression that the plaintiff himself was a bankrupt. The burden was on the defendants to prove that the report was fair. They ought to have been required to establish their plea: see Stevens v. Sampson, 28 W. R. 87, 5 Ex. D. 53. And the question whether they succeeded in doing so ought to have been submitted to the jury.

Blake Odgers (Murphy, Q.C., and H. Fraser with him), for the defendants.—It is true the burden was on the defendants to show the report was fair. But the plaintiff's evidence showed clearly that it was so, unless the omissions were material. And the question whether they were material was a question which the judge was entitled to decide: Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, 31 W. R. 157, 7 App. Cas. 741.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The question is whether what was done by the defendants is privileged by the law of England. The rule is that where there are judicial proceedings before a properly constituted judicial tribunal, which is exercising its jurisdiction in open court, then an account of what there took place, if published fairly and accurately without malice, is privileged. Under certain circumstances that publication may be hard on individuals. But public policy requires that that hardship should be borne rather than that judicial proceedings should be secret. Does this case come within that rule?

An application was made before magistrates for a summons against the plaintiff on a charge of perjury. Magistrates have jurisdiction to hear such an application; they are a properly constituted body, having jurisdiction to determine whether such a summons should be issued. This, then, was a judicial proceeding before a properly constituted judicial tribunal. So far the case comes within the rule.

But it is said that though they were a properly constituted body, and though they were exercising a judicial consideration, they were not acting in open court. It is argued that the effect of section 19 of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42) is that these proceedings must be deemed not to have taken place in open court. This section does not in its terms apply to the case of an application for a summons. The section itself, therefore, cannot be relied on. But the argument is this: The section says that at a later stage of the proceedings—viz., when the summons is being heard—the room where the justices sit is not an open court, and, therefore, it is ridiculous to suppose it can be an open court at an earlier stage. I cannot see that that is necessarily so. But in truth, the proposition which the plaintiff relies on is not made out. What the section enacts is that the magistrates may order that no persons are to have access to the room where they are sitting; they have a discretion as to whether the court shall be closed or not. Here the magistrates did not make any order for closing the court. And it seems to me clear that if the court is not in fact closed, it is open. However that may be, this was an application for a summons, to which section 19 does not apply. The only section that can apply is section 1, and I think, in the absence of any enactment to the contrary, that these proceedings took place in open court.

It is then said you must not publish a report of the proceedings, however correct it may be, unless the magistrates give a final decision. I do not understand that to be the true rule. The cases seem to me to show that if the result of the proceedings before the magistrates will lead to a final decision, you may publish a fair account of such preliminary proceedings, although a final decision of the whole subject-matter is not arrived at at that stage: Lewis v. Levy, Usill v. Hales. Now, if the summons is refused, that is a final decision; if it is allowed, the granting of it must ultimately result, either in one way or another, in a final decision being arrived at. Therefore, so far as the nature of these proceedings is concerned, the present case comes within the rule.

It is now necessary to consider whether the plea of privilege is made out otherwise. Speaking for myself, I am of opinion that in order to justify an alleged libel as being the publication of a report of judicial proceedings, the burden lies on the defendant to show that the report is fair and accurate and published without malice. But it does not necessarily follow that the defendant must prove this by witnesses called by himself. He may vouch what is proved in his favour by the plaintiff's witnesses. Now what was proved in this case by the plaintiff's witnesses? There was no suggestion of malice. The plaintiff simply put in the libel and called evidence as to what happened at the proceedings before the magistrates. This evidence showed that the libel was, so far as it went, an account of what took place, but the plaintiff contended that there were certain omissions in it which made it unfair. The first omission was the failure to state the name of the applicant. But no evidence was given of any such peculiarity in that person as would make the omission of his name of any importance. The other was the failure to state in whose bankruptcy the alleged perjury was supposed to have been committed. The suggestion was that the words naturally conveyed the meaning that it was in Kimber's own bankruptcy. I do not see why any reasonable man should draw such an inference. The learned judge held, as he was entitled to do, that these omissions were immaterial, and he declined to leave to the jury the question whether they rendered the report unfair. I think that the learned judge was right. I am of opinion that the effect of the evidence of the plaintiff's witness was that the alleged libel was a fair account of what took place, and that the jury would not have been justified in saying that the report was unfair. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

MAYOR, &c., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL v. HARDING. (a.)

Principal and surety—Fraud of principal—Liability of surety—Building contract—Certificate obtained by fraud of contractor.

An alteration in the position of a surety brought about by the act of an employer does not discharge the surety, if the act of the employer has been caused by the fraud of an employé whose honesty the surety has guaranteed.

The plaintiffs entered into a contract with a firm of contractors for the construction of certain works. The defendants were parties to the contract as sureties for the contractors. The contract provided that the liability of the sureties should continue until the engineer of the plaintiffs should have given his final certificate of completion. A certain sum of money was to be retained by the plaintiffs, and not paid over to the contractors until six months after the granting of the final certificate of completion. The certificate was obtained by fraud on the part of the contractors, and the retention money was paid over to the contractors.

Held (affirming the decision of Grantham, J.), that the certificate, having been obtained by the fraud of the contractors, whose honesty the defendants had guaranteed, did not operate as a discharge of the defendants' liability under their contract of suretyship; that the payment over of the retention money, even if it had not been brought about by the contractors' fraud, would not have discharged the defendants, there being no evidence that the payment of the retention money had caused any alteration in the position of the defendants.

Appeal of two of the defendants from the judgment of Grantham, J., on further consideration, after trial with a special jury.

The action was brought by the Corporation of Hull against a firm of contractors for breach of contract and for moneys received to the use of the plaintiffs, and against the defendants Harding and Thacker on their contract with the plaintiffs as sureties for the firm of contractors.

On the 25th of June, 1888, a contract was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, under which the contractors agreed to execute, well and truly, certain works described in the specification, which included the construction and maintenance of certain sewers, and other works connected therewith, for the drainage of a portion of Kingston-upon-Hull. The defendants Harding and Thacker, as sureties, covenanted with the corporation that the contractors should well and truly execute the works referred to, and in the event of failure on the part of the contractors to perform their part of the contract the sureties agreed to pay to the corporation all such loss as the corporation should sustain.

It was provided by the specification that the contractors and their sureties should not be released from their liabilities and obligations under the contract until after the expiration of six months from the date of the certificate of completion, which was to be given by the engineer of the corporation, and not then, unless all the conditions of the contract should have been fulfilled to the satisfaction of the engineer, of which satisfaction the final certificate of the engineer was to be the only evidence binding on the corporation. Advances of money at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of the work executed, as certified by the engineer, were to be made to the contractor as the work proceeded. It was also provided that the final certificate for the balance of 10 per cent. should be furnished six calendar months after the date of the engineer's certificate of completion, provided the works had been properly maintained by the contractor and were executed to the satisfaction of the engineer, and that the contractor had complied with the whole of the stipulations of the specifications. It was further agreed between the parties that the works generally and every part thereof should be conducted and completed under the superintendence and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the corporation.

The works were completed on the 18th of April, 1889, and the engineer gave his certificate of completion more than six months before the 7th of February, 1890, on which date the engineer gave his final certificate, and the balance of the contract price was then paid to the contractors. It was subsequently ascertained that the works had been improperly and imperfectly constructed, and were incomplete and not in accordance with the conditions of the contract, and were wholly useless for drainage purposes. The corporation then brought this action against the contractors and their sureties.

The action was tried at the Leeds Assizes before Grantham, J., and a special jury. The jury found, as a result of the evidence, on the questions put to them by the learned judge, that the work had been scamped and fraudulently done; that the corporation had been cheated by the way the work had been done; that the certificate for the work done had been obtained by the fraud of the contractors; that the corporation had omitted to properly superintend the work, and that this omission led to the scamping of the work; that there was no evidence of any wilful default or connivance on the part of the engineer of the corporation. On these findings the learned judge at once entered judgment for the plaintiffs against the contractors, leaving the amount of the damages to be settled by a referee. After further consideration the learned judge entered judgment against the sureties, who appealed. The contractors did not appeal.

Channell, Q.C., Montague Lush, and Hindmarsh, for the defendants, the sureties.—The sureties were innocent parties, and are entitled to set up the final certificate as releasing them from their suretyship, even though that certificate was obtained by the fraud of the contractors, because if the corporation had not been negligent in the performance of their duty of superintendence that fraud would have been discovered at the time. In Phillips v. Foxall, 20 W. R. 900, L. R. 7 Q. B. 666, it was held that where an employer on discovering his servant's dishonesty did not discharge him, the surety was released from liability. In this case the corporation ought to have discovered the contractors' fraud before the work was finished. [Lord ESHER, M.R., referred to Black v. The Ottoman Bank, 10 W. R. 871, 15 Moore P. C. 472.] The position of the sureties has also been altered by the fact of the corporation having given up the "retention money."

Forbes, Q.C., Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Manisty, for the plaintiffs.—The final certificate, having been obtained by fraud, is void and of no effect, and cannot operate as a discharge of the sureties. The sureties were in effect sureties for the honesty of the contractors, and cannot set up their fraud as a defence: Petty v. Cooke, 19 W. R. 1112, L. R. 6 Q. B. 790. Negligence of the employer does not discharge the surety unless it amounts to a connivance: Mayor, &c., of Durham v. Fowler, 22 Q. B. D. 394, 37 W. R. Dig. 149.

Channell, Q.C., replied.

The following cases were also referred to in the course of the arguments: Knights v. Wiffen, 19 W. R. 244, L. R. 5 Q. B. 660; Simm v. Anglo-American Electric Telegraph Co., 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188; Phillips v. Clagett, 11 M. & W. 84; Wulff v. Jay, 20 W. R. 1030, L. R. 7 Q. B. 756; Law v. East India Co., 4 Ves. 824.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Corporation of Hull are suing two sureties upon a contract of suretyship. The sureties insured the corporation against something which was to be done or not to be done by a firm of contractors for works. The contract in terms was that the contractors should do the work well and truly, according to plans and specifications. The work has not been done "well"; therefore, by the terms of the contract of suretyship, the sureties are primâ facie liable. The contract contained another term to the effect that the liability of the sureties should continue until a final certificate had been given by the engineer of the corporation, and that certificate was to be the only evidence of the work having been done to the satisfaction of the corporation. The engineer gave his final certificate, but it cannot have been the intention of the contract with the sureties that their liability should cease when the certificate was given, however it might have been procured, but that it should only cease when such a certificate was given to the contractors as would by implication release the contractors. We must, therefore, see whether the certificate was such a one as would by implication release the contractors. The jury have found that the certificate was procured by the fraud of the contractors, and that finding has not been challenged. Under those circumstances it may be that some act was necessary on the part of the corporation to enforce their rights against the contractors. The contractors, having procured the certificate by fraud, could not plead it as a release, and if the contract of suretyship is as above stated, it follows the sureties cannot escape liability by means of the certificate, and therefore they have no defence on the contract alone.

It has been said, however, that there are certain doctrines of law which will release the sureties. In the first place it was said that the corporation had imposed on them by the contract the duty of superintending the contractors' work, and that it was their failure to fulfil that duty which caused the work of the contractors to be badly done. What is the meaning of the expression "superintend"? It was contended that it meant that the corporation were to direct the work. When you consider the positions of the corporation and the contractors it is clear that that is not the meaning. The contractors never submitted to have the work directed by the corporation. Superintendence merely means that the corporation had a right to see how the work was being done, not to direct how it should be done. That is to say, the corporation had an option given to them whether they should superintend or not, and the omission by the corporation to exercise this option does not relieve the contractors from the obligation of doing the work properly, nor does it release the sureties from their liability. I have already said that the giving of the final certificate by the engineer did not, by reason of the terms of the contract, release the sureties. But it was argued that the giving of the certificate does release the sureties by virtue of the law of suretyship. This argument also fails, because the mere fact of giving the certificate, even though it may have induced a certain belief on the part of the sureties, did not alter their position; it did them no damage at all.

The next point was that the corporation were induced to give up to the contractors the retention money, which, if it had been retained in the hands of the corporation, would have been a fund to which the sureties might have had recourse. If that would have reduced the amount of the sureties' liability, then the giving up of the fund would have released the sureties altogether. Did the giving up of that money, brought about as it was by the contractors' fraud, release the sureties? The sureties contracted that the work should be well and truly done—that means well and honestly done. It has been proved that the contractors did not do the work well and honestly, they did it badly, and then fraudulently concealed the bad work from the persons authorized by the corporation to see how the work was being done. This fraudulent concealment was a breach by the contractors of a part of the contract, the due performance of which the sureties had guaranteed to the corporation. Therefore the retention money was paid over by reason of a fraud against which the sureties had insured the corporation. It is impossible to say, according to any doctrines of law, that the sureties are to be relieved from liability by a fraudulent breach of the contract the due performance of which they had guaranteed. The paying over by the corporation of this retention money is, therefore, a fact on which the sureties cannot rely. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The broad principle of law which is at the root of our decision is that a surety cannot say that he is discharged from his suretyship, on the ground that his position has been altered by the act of the employer, when that act has been caused by fraud, against which the surety, by his very act of suretyship, contracted. The present case presents several matters of interest, and the first question to be considered is the effect of the final certificate of the engineer of the corporation. The certificate was obtained by fraud, and the corporation, as against the contractors, were entitled, on the discovery of that fraud, to elect within a reasonable time to avoid that certificate. As soon as they did so, it was gone as against the contractors and all other persons who had not acted bonâ fide on the faith of it. If the corporation had taken no steps to repudiate the certificate, it would have been good, but it has been impugned in such a way as to make it clear that the corporation are entitled to treat it as not binding. Therefore, unless something happened after the giving of the certificate to alter the position of the sureties, it will not avail them. That is where the argument for the defendants breaks down. There is no proof that since the giving of the certificate the position of the sureties has been so altered as to render it inequitable to enforce it against them. It was suggested that the certificate raised an estoppel. That is quite true, if the sureties had acted on the certificate, but as they did not do so, there is no estoppel. Mr. Channell cited Knights v. Wiffen as an authority for the proposition that the mere statement in the certificate itself, by inducing the sureties to take no steps against the contractors, must amount in law to an alteration of the sureties' position. It is sufficient to point out that the question whether the sureties' position has been altered is one of fact, not of law. There may, no doubt, be some facts which are such that it is impossible not to say that in law they are an alteration of position, but that is not the case here. For example, if the sureties, acting on the faith of the certificate, had settled an account with the contractors, it would have been different. If the decision in Knights v. Wiffen was intended to go further than I have said, then I should not be disposed to agree with it, and it is not binding on this court. There may be some doubt, as was suggested in Smith's Leading Cases, whether the inference of fact in that case was correctly drawn. Even if the certificate had altered the position of the sureties, there would still remain the question whether or no the certificate had not been obtained by an act of the contractors, against which the sureties in the contract of suretyship had contracted. If so, it is clear that an answer would have arisen under the principle of law stated at the beginning of my judgment.

Apart, however, from the giving of the certificate, an argument has been based on the payment over of the retention money which, under the contract, ought to have been retained until the work was completed. I cannot doubt but that the retention money was a fund to the benefit of which the sureties were entitled to look, and by reason of the payment this benefit was destroyed. The argument on this head might be reduced to a dilemma as against the corporation—either the certificate was given or it was not; if it was, then the sureties were discharged; if it was not, why did the corporation pay over the retention money and so deprive the sureties of their security? The answer is that no certificate was given—that is, no certificate binding on the corporation. It is true that the retention money was paid over before it was due, and to that extent the position of the sureties was altered; but that came about by the fraudulent execution of work, the honest execution of which the sureties had guaranteed. The answer, therefore, is to be found in the contract of suretyship itself, which provides that in such a case the sureties are not to be discharged. They cannot be discharged by an act against which they had themselves guaranteed the corporation.

A further point in the case is that by the contract between the corporation and the contractors the work was to be done under the superintendence of the corporation. The corporation did not superintend, and therefore the position of the sureties is altered in that respect. It is an obvious remark that there was no contract between the corporation and the sureties that the former should superintend the work. The effect of the proviso is merely to give the corporation an option of interfering in the progress of the work. The non-exercise of that option does not fall within those cases in which the neglect of an employer to enforce a right against a contractor deprives the surety of the advantage of the existence of that right. There are cases where the omission of the employer would destroy the surety's rights under the contract of suretyship and alter the position of the surety, and so avoid the relation of suretyship. But that is not the case here. There was no right in the surety that the corporation should superintend the work, and the corporation did not abandon the option by not superintending. They only failed to exercise it.

What is the law on this point? Ever since, and probably before, the case of MacTaggart v. Watson, 3 Cl. & Fin. 525, as expounded by subsequent authorities, notably Dawson v. Lawes, 2 W. R. 213, Kay, 280, and the cases cited in the Mayor of Durham v. Fowler, the law has been this: The mere omission on the part of an employer, mere passive acquiescence in acts improper on the part of the employee, will not of itself relieve the surety. If the omission is an omission to do an act which the employer has contracted should be done, that is different. If there was an omission to preserve the security to which the surety was entitled, in such a case the omission would be inconsistent with the principle of suretyship, it would be an omission to do an act which the employer had contracted to do. Another instance of an omission which would fall under the branches of the law of suretyship which I have mentioned, occurs in Phillips v. Foxall, where an employer omitted to discharge a servant who had been found to be dishonest. That case can only be explained on one of two principles: one, that it is part of an understanding of the contract of suretyship that the surety should be informed of subsequent acts of dishonesty on the part of the person guaranteed, so that he may determine his guarantee or demand the dismissal of the servant. That is the view that was taken by Quain, J., and Cockburn, C.J. The other principle, expressed by Blackburn, J., was that the surety, upon a default by the person guaranteed, is entitled to the benefit of all the rights of the employer against the employed, and if the employer did not discharge the defaulting employee, the right of the surety would be destroyed. It is a different explanation, but it comes to the same thing. An omission which destroys the right of the surety comes to the same thing as a positive act destroying the right; for if the right is one which ought to be preserved, the omission to preserve it is a wrong. There is no case showing that the non-exercise by the corporation of their right of superintendence was an act of negligence or omission which altered the rights of the sureties and placed them in a worse position than before.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have but little to add. The great question to be determined in this case is, against what did the sureties guarantee the corporation. That depends on the true construction of the contract, by which it was contracted that the contractors' work should be well and truly executed. I think truly means honestly. In other words, the sureties guaranteed that the contractors should not fraudulently scamp or hide the work as it went on. It is said that although that may be so, clause 4 of the specification must be read together with the contract, and if that is done the sureties must be released. In my opinion that is not so. The contractors broke the contract by scamping the work and so obtained the certificate by fraud. As against them therefore the certificate might be set aside. I think that the true reading of clause 4 is that the effect of it is to be the same as regards the contractors and the sureties—namely, that when a valid certificate has been given both are discharged, but until it is given they are not. On the question of release by the doctrine of law applicable to suretyship I have nothing to add to what has already been said. As to the payment of the retention money, that depends on the true construction of the contract, which I have already dealt with. The sureties having guaranteed the performance of the contractors, cannot say they are released by the payment of money which was brought about by the very acts against which they insured. That is the salient point which distinguishes this case from those which were cited, especially Law v. East India Co.

BARING v. ABINGDON. (a.)

Deed—Construction—Manor—Right of common—Common appurtenant—Grant in fee to third person of part of tenant's occupation—"Together with all commons belonging."

By a deed dated in 1859 the lord of the manor of B., granted to M. in fee simple "all that piece or parcel of land situate at B., containing fifty-three acres, now or late in the occupation of S. as tenant thereof, together with all ways, waters, watercourses, trees, woods, underwoods, hedges, ditches, commons, and all other rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of land and hereditaments, or any part thereof, belonging." The parcel of land was a portion of a large farm held by S. under a lease dated in 1856, and which was unexpired. Under a succession of leases from 1809, S. and those who had held the farm before him, and the lord of the manor, had enjoyed rights of common of pasture and of estovers in respect of the whole farm over all the wastes of the manor. M. arranged with S. that the latter should give up to him possession of the piece of land granted by the deed, and paid S. a valuation accordingly. The plaintiff, who derived his title from M., claimed under the deed of 1859 a right of common over a particular one of the wastes in respect of the parcel of land granted by the deed. There was evidence that throughout the period, from 1824 to 1859, the particular waste over which the right was claimed by the plaintiff was not used, but another of the wastes was, for turning out thereupon the flock when folded upon that particular portion of the farm; and since that period up to the time of the action there had been no user of the alleged right.

Held, that the right of common did not pass.

Per Lindley, L.J.—The general words in the deed were not sufficient to pass or to create a right of common in respect of the parcel of land granted, in the absence of special circumstances as between the grantee in fee and the tenant under the lease; and the state of things and the position of the parties did not warrant the inference that it must have been intended that any such right should be given, but the contrary.

Per Bowen, L.J.—The language of the deed, though vague, obscure, and ambiguous, might possibly have passed such a right if (which was not shown to be the case) it was the intention of the parties that it should.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J.

The question was whether under a deed, dated in 1859, of grant in fee simple by the lord of a manor to a stranger of certain lands of the manor, part of a farm then in the occupation of a tenant under a lease, a right of common of pasture over one of the wastes of the manor, which right existed as to the whole farm, passed in respect of the part granted under the words in the conveyance, "together with all commons and all other rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of land and hereditaments hereinbefore described or referred to, or any part thereof, belonging."

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the headnote and the judgments of the Lords Justices.

Stirling, J., held that the right of common did not pass.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hopkinson, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have had an opportunity of considering this case, and I think nothing would be gained by reserving our judgment. Before I proceed to remark upon the facts I wish to express our acknowledgments to Mr. Hopkinson for the very clear and able way in which he has dealt with an extremely difficult case. And that observation is not affected whether the decision is for him or against him.

Now the question which we have to consider in this case is really what are the rights of the plaintiff, who claims under a deed of grant of the 27th of January, 1859, which I will comment on in the first instance. The parties to that deed were persons who were the lords of the manor—I forget whether there was one or more at this moment—of Banstead. The wastes of the manor of Banstead consisted at the date of this grant of three or four commons. There was Banstead Heath, Banstead Downs, Park Downs, and Burgh Heath. Those commons did not adjoin; they were scattered in various parts of the manor, as was shown by the map which was handed up. Now the grantors were the lord of the manor (Mr. Alcock) and his trustee. The grantee was Mr. Maudslay. The property granted by the grantors to the grantee is described in this way. I pass over the recitals, not forgetting the observations which have been made on them, but I do not think that much turns upon them. The recitals show what is tolerably obvious, that the deed was carefully prepared by a conveyancer, and, beyond that, I do not think the recitals throw much light upon the points which we have to consider.

The grant is of "all that piece or parcel of land formerly divided into several closes situate at Banstead containing by recent survey fifty-three acres."

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then the boundaries are put in, which I need not allude to. Then there is a reference to the plan, which only shows a triangular piece of land marked "fifty-three acres." Then it goes on "all which said premises are now or late were in the occupation of Steer as tenant thereof . . . together with all ways, waters, watercourses, trees, woods, underwoods, hedges, ditches, commons, and all other rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of land and hereditaments hereinbefore described or referred to, or any part thereof, belonging."

Now, bearing in mind who the grantor was, and who the grantee was, we have to consider what passed under these general words. I do not understand that the introduction of general words in a grant amounts to a warranty by the grantor that there is anything to answer them. I understand them to be put in for a different object altogether—to cover anything which may not have been specifically mentioned; to sweep in anything which may have been overlooked; but in no sense as a warranty; I take it that in this grant, as in all others, you may, if not in all cases, certainly in the great majority of cases, read general words as if they said "if any." There is no warranty that there are any ways, commons, or other things belonging or appertaining. There may or may not have been. If there were, you (the grantee) were to have them.

When we look and see what the position of affairs as regards this property was, we find that there is nothing accurately answering this description. The grantor is the lord of the manor. He is granting what he has got to grant, and he has not got, although he has power to create, any right of common belonging to the particular parcel of land, which he purports to grant. That particular piece of land was a portion of a large farm held by a gentleman of the name of Steer under a lease dated in 1856, and which was unexpired. The real position of affairs, as I understand it, is this, that under a succession of leases from 1809 down to 1856 Mr. Steer, and those who had held this farm before him, and the lord of the manor had enjoyed certain rights of common in respect of the whole farm over all the wastes of the manor. Whether that enjoyment began as of right under the lease of 1809, which is the first of which we have any knowledge, or whether there was a right of common attached to this land by some previous grant or lease by more apt words than we find in the lease of 1809, I do not know. But the evidence shows (and I will read what Stirling, J., finds in respect of it presently) that from 1809 down to the time of this grant to Maudslay, at all events down to the end of the year 1858, the lessee of this larger farm had exercised rights of common over all these wastes. Now the exact state of the evidence upon that part of the case cannot, I think, be put better than it is in a passage I will read from Stirling, J.'s judgment. After describing who Steer was, he says that "he remembered his father coming in 1818 to the Manor Farm; that his father, directly he came there, began to keep sheep, which were regularly turned out on the wastes of the manor every year from May until November. He remembered his father taking in 1824 some further land consisting of 'The Hooks' to the extent of thirty-one acres and twenty acres of common fields towards Banstead Downs, and these were used in the same way as the other parts of the farm. He said that when he got these further lands his father increased his flock from 150 to 200 or 220, and went on turning out on the wastes in the same way, only in larger numbers. One flock of sheep was kept on the farm, which was cultivated on the four-course system, and the flock was folded from year to year on various parts of the farm, as the state of the cultivation required. When the flock was folded on a part of the farm near Banstead Downs, it was turned out there; when on a part of the farm near Park Downs" (that is another of these wastes) "the flock was turned out there, and when the flock was folded on 'The Hooks' it was always turned out on Park Downs, not on Banstead Downs. This state of things appears to have continued throughout the period from 1824 to 1829. The witness stated that when in 1858 Maudslay bought, he paid the witness his valuation and took possession."

Now pausing there for a moment, and disregarding a circumstance which is natural and which I will consider presently I mean the negotiation which took place between Maudslay and Steer—and looking at Maudslay as a purchaser unconnected with Steer, the first question I will ask myself is, What passed to Maudslay under the terms of this grant? Now bearing in mind what the state of things was, and bearing in mind the language used, it appears to me that there is not one decision, but a series of decisions which show, and show conclusively, that, but for the peculiar position in which Maudslay stood to Steer, these words would not be sufficient either to pass or to create a right of common in respect of this particular tenement. The cases to which I refer are very numerous. They have been alluded to. I will mention Whalley v. Tompson, 1 Bos. & Pull. 371; Clements v. Lambert; Barlow v. Rhodes, 1 Cr. & M. 439; and Hall v. Byron. The law upon the subject is expressed shortly, but I believe very accurately, in the edition of Gale on Easements by the late Mr. Justice Willes, in a short passage which I will read. It is at p. 77 of the 3rd edition: "General words such as 'appertaining belonging,' &c., have been held in numerous instances, both with regard to rights of common and of way, to be insufficient to pass the right upon a severance of the tenement; but a conveyance containing the words 'used, occupied, and enjoyed,' has been held to be sufficient." He cites a great number of cases, including those to which I have referred and a great number of others, some of which I have looked at and some I have not. As regards rights of way, I would merely observe in passing that the passage in that book has been somewhat modified by more recent decisions, beginning with Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 360, 23 W. R. Dig. 251, and coming down to the present time, to the effect that, if a person grants a house and there is a road which is seen and obviously used by the grantor for the enjoyment of the house granted. the right of road may pass although the right did not exist as a right distinguished from ownership before the date of the grant. It is impossible to invoke that class of cases here, because of the existence of these several wastes. It cannot be said that, by looking or by an inspection of the parcel, there is anything here which answers the description of a particular road without which the property cannot be enjoyed. The mere fact that there are here several parcels of waste puts an end to any arguments of that kind. If it is said that it is necessary to enjoy pasture over one piece of the waste, the question immediately arises, Why that piece rather than any other piece? I need not trouble, therefore, with such cases as Thomas v. Owen and one or two others.

Pausing there and looking only at the state of the property, and disregarding, as I say, the peculiar position of Maudslay and Steer, supposing that Maudslay was a mere purchaser of this land without having any arrangements with Steer, it appears to me that we should be forcing and running counter to the authorities if we were to hold that there was sufficient in this language to create or to pass the right which is claimed by the present plaintiff. Nor is there, that I know of, any single case which is contrary to that view. And I doubt very much whether Mr. Hopkinson himself would have contended for it, but for the peculiar position of Maudslay. Now, Maudslay's position was this: We do not know exactly what the facts were, but approximately we do. He evidently wanted possession from Steer of this particular portion of Steer's larger farm. Steer had a larger farm. This was not much more than one-fifth of the whole, and some arrangement had been made by Maudslay with Steer to the effect that Steer should go out of possession and let Maudslay in. There was not, so far as we know, any assignment by Steer of his lease to Maudslay in respect of this particular property, nor was there anything more than an arrangement by which, in consideration of so much money paid by Maudslay to Steer, Steer went out and let Maudslay in. That being the case, it appears to me that there is great difficulty in pressing the case of Doidge v. Carpenter to the extent to which Mr. Hopkinson desires it to be pressed. Doidge v. Carpenter is the case which is most in favour of the appellant's argument. It was a case of this description. There had been a lease of the farm, and there was a right of common enjoyed by that lessee over the property of the person who ultimately conveyed the reversion to him, and the conveyance of the reversion was couched in these words. The lessor granted the reversion of the whole property in lease to the tenant with the words "common belonging or in anywise appertaining." It was urged that there was no common belonging or in anywise appertaining. In strictness, and apart from the peculiar position of the grantee in that case, I doubt whether the decision or the observations made by Lord Ellenborough would have been made. But what Lord Ellenborough said was this. He said: "Although there is nothing to pass in the shape of transferring, the intention of the parties, as is obvious from their position, must have been to create and confer upon the grantee that right of common, which in fact he has been enjoying, and which would come to an end by the merger of his lease in the reversion if he did not construe the words 'belonging or in anywise appertaining' as equivalent to 'actually used and enjoyed.'" It is quite obvious that this intention would have been defeated by the purest technicality, and that the man would have lost that common which he had previously enjoyed if the court had not construed the deed in the way which it did, the object being, not to destroy his rights, but to continue them for ever. The court was asked to take a strained and technical view, and to say: "No; although the intention was to continue for ever what you had, you are to be deprived of it." That was too much. The circumstances and the position of the parties showed that it could not have been so, and that the real intention of the parties would have been completely frustrated if the court had construed the deed in the way in which the grantor was driven to contend. The position of the parties here and the state of things is such as, to my mind, by no means to force us to the same inference of fact as in Doidge v. Carpenter, and the distinction is obvious and very important. The grantee in this case is not the tenant. I doubt whether he stood in the position of tenant except to this extent, and to this extent only, that he made an arrangement with the tenant to go out, and that he was to get possession. I doubt whether it goes further than that. In addition to that, the property in respect of which this right is assumed to be created is not the whole, but a comparatively small portion, of the property held by the tenant, which is a distinction of considerable importance where the court draws inferences of fact and regards the intention of the parties. And then you have this, which is, to my mind, very striking, that although Steer, who went out in favour of Maudslay, certainly did enjoy rights of common over all the wastes in respect of his whole property, when you come to look at exactly what he did you find this, that as to all the sheep which were folded upon the particular property he was to give up to Maudslay he depastured those sheep, not on the common on which the plaintiff now claims pasture, —viz., Banstead Heath or Banstead Downs—but upon another common altogether—viz., Park Downs. Bearing that in mind, and bearing in mind the very strong evidence of user before the grant, and bearing in mind what is most important, I think, in construing ambiguous general words—the usage from 1859 downwards, usage which goes to show that the right now claimed has never been enjoyed—it does strike me as a very strong inference to draw, to infer that Alcock and Maudslay when they executed this deed really intended that Maudslay should have the right which is now claimed. I confess the inference I draw is diametrically the opposite; that it never entered the mind of any of them that Maudslay was bargaining for, or that Alcock was granting, any such right. Usage is against it, and the usage beforehand is not so much in its favour as to overcome the very strong impression which the other usage leaves. And if we were to put upon these words the construction which is contended for by Mr. Hopkinson, instead of being satisfied, as in Doidge v. Carpenter the court was, that we were giving effect to the intention of the parties, I am convinced that we should be doing just the contrary, and that the real truth of the matter is this—that the particular right of common which is claimed was never dreamt of in 1859 when the deed was executed.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that I am not driven by Doidge v. Carpenter or any other case, or by any principle of law, or by the facts, to do that which I think was contrary to the intention of the parties. In my opinion the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case really turns upon the deed of 1859 as read by the light of surrounding circumstances, including the entire absence of any subsequent user which would support the view put forward by the appellant. The general words in the deed are words of the merest generality. They are words which are not apt words to describe such a right as is claimed. Although, if the right existed already, the words might be effectual to pass it, it seems to me that with regard to such ambiguous words as these the true meaning becomes plain when you see that for thirty-four years subsequently the deed has been interpreted in a sense different from that for which the appellant contends.

Now, that being the short ground upon which the case seems to me to turn, out of respect to the extremely brilliant argument of Mr. Hopkinson I will say a few words in expansion of that view. In order to make good the case of the appellant I think it is necessary to construe this deed, and in particular to construe the words which accompany the conveyance of this small piece or parcel of land, which is only a piece or parcel of land of what was the Manor Farm, which conveys it to Maudslay, under whom the appellant claims, "together with all ways, waters, watercourses, woods, underwoods, hedges, ditches, fences, commons, and all other rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of land and hereditaments described or referred to, or any part thereof." Now, can any student of law at this time of day maintain for a moment that general words like these imply the existence of some antecedent right? They are spread broadcast over all conveyances. Would anyone like to maintain at his own expense a wager to the effect that there were rights of watercourses attached to this farm or land because "watercourses" are used as general words? It is clear, although these general words may be efficacious enough to pass what did exist, the use of them, considering their generality, does not import that there was such a right existing. Mr. Hopkinson's argument must, therefore, in order to succeed, make good one of two positions, either that there was a previously existing right, which these words aptly describe, so as either to continue or, to use the most accurate expression, to recreate or to create it de novo by reference to the past; or, secondly, that if there was no such previous existing right which these words could accurately describe, there was such a state of circumstances that a grant of this parcel of land must necessarily either involve in itself a grant of right of common upon this particular waste, Banstead Downs, or, at all events, that it must be accompanied by the implication of a grant to that extent and to that effect, which comes to the same thing.

Now, first of all, was there any previously existing right which these words aptly describe so as to recreate it? If there was an existing right, what was it? It was a right, if any existed, between the landlord—the lord of the manor in 1809 and in the subsequent years—and his tenant, a right created by the deed of lease which was executed, the general words of which would receive that interpretation when read by the light of the user. There is ample user to justify the view, I think, that, under those leases, a right of common as appurtenant to the farm (in the limited sense of the term appurtenant) was granted to the tenant to enure for his benefit and for the convenient enjoyment of the demised farm during the period of the demise, not a right created as appurtenant to the lands at common law in the hands of anyone to whom they might pass, but a conventional right as between the landlord and the tenant to obtain during the demise. That was the right which the user at that time would lead one to think might have been created. The tenant had, in fact, under his lease, as against his landlord, the absolute power of putting his sheep upon the wastes of the manor and obtaining estovers for the comfortable enjoyment of his premises.

Now did that right exist at the time of this grant in the first place, or had it been extinguished? If it had been extinguished, then these words could not refer to it. They would not be apt words to refer to an extinct right, though they might be words, perhaps, which would cover an existing right. If it had been extinguished they would not be apt words to cover it. If the question whether it was extinguished or not at the time of the grant depends upon the evidence in this case, I should think it was left in great obscurity, and I for one shall not attempt to decide this case on the ground that, at the date of this grant of 1859, the right had been clearly extinguished. I cannot go the length of saying that I am satisfied of that, but I remark that it was only a right which existed as between landlord and tenant. Do these words aptly describe such a right? Certainly not. They may be wide enough to cover it, but they are not the proper words. The right is between the landlord and tenant. It was, moreover, a right which belonged to the whole farm. It is here spoken of as a right which belonged to the severed portion if it is spoken of at all. Such language, therefore, is not apt to describe that particular right. I do not say that it might not pass it. It is sought by Mr. Hopkinson to justify the use of the language by the application of the doctrine of apportionment, and he says, with perfect truth, that in the case of alienation to a stranger common appurtenant will pass with the parcel of the entire estate to the enjoyment of which the common was originally attached, both in the case of common appendant and common appurtenant. That law was a law which was necessary, in the interests of the commonwealth, as it was said by Lord Coke, to be laid down, otherwise common appurtenant would have been extinguished all over the country by the alienation of land. The case of Sacheverell v. Porter shows that that is so, and Wyat Wild's case, 8 Co. 78b, but there is a manifest fallacy in applying this doctrine of apportionment so as to force the construction of this deed, as to which there is no question of alienation of a parcel of the premises by the person in whose hands the whole is. It is not a question of severance; nor a case of a tenant who had a farm with common attached to it in the nature of common appurtenant, alienating a parcel of the farm, in which case, under general words such as these, the common appurtenant which was necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the parcel would pass according to the case of Sacheverell v. Porter and Wyat Wild's case. This is an instance of a lord who by an outstanding lease had bound himself to a particular tenant to give that tenant during his lease the right to pasture his sheep upon a particular common, granting to a stranger with general words a parcel of the land of which he at the moment was reversioner. It is clear that it is not at all strictly a case of apportionment.

Mr. Hopkinson endeavoured to support the view for which he was arguing by referring to the case of Doidge v. Carpenter. I will state shortly what that case was. There was a tenant of the lord of the manor who had had created by his lease in his own favour a right of common appurtenant with the reasonable enjoyment of his demised premises. During his tenancy, and whilst he was enjoying this right as against his landlord, he took a conveyance in fee from the landlord of the entire property of which he was the tenant. The words of the conveyance were words which granted the premises with all commons belonging or in anywise appertaining, or words to that effect. The tenant under that deed claimed, and the court ultimately allowed him, the right to go on possessing, under those general words of grant, the right of common which he had enjoyed before under the lease. It was sought to defeat his claim upon the ground that there was a merger, and that there was no existing right, because the right was destroyed by the conveyance, and the words of the conveyance were not words which would create a new right. If effect had been given to that argument, it is obvious that upon a mere technicality the grossest injustice would have been done. The tenant who had got the lease under which he has a right of common buys the reversion of the lease, and it was suggested that by that conveyance, although there are words which purport to convey the rights of common which existed, he was not to have as much in fee as he had originally under his lease as regards the common. It would be a most outrageous injustice if it were true. But the law of England, which is generally goodsense, found its way out of that technicality, and rightly decided upon the ground of reason. I think that, having regard to the relation of the parties and to the circumstances of the case at the time, no other construction ought to have been put upon the words contained in the grant than that the parties intended that there should be created in favour of the tenant, who was thenceforward to be the owner in fee, the same right of common with the enjoyment of his premises as he enjoyed before, there being words in the deed which were sufficient to point to the intention of the parties that the right of common which already existed should go on existing. It was a question in Doidge v. Carpenter of the construction of the deed, which had to be read by the light of the surrounding circumstances, these surrounding circumstances making it clear to demonstration what the intention of the parties was, and the surrounding circumstances throwing such light upon the general words as to enable the court to see, beyond a doubt, what those general words meant. That is what Doidge v. Carpenter is.

But now, take the present case. It is a totally different affair. It is not a case of a grant in fee to the tenant, with apt words to describe or which would import that he was to go on enjoying what he had already. It is a commonplace grant to a stranger of a parcel of a farm. That is the broad distinction. It is not doubted that the doctrine of apportionment of common appurtenant will apply when the case requires it. No one doubts that. In looking at what the true intention of the parties was, as exemplified in their language, you must observe, first of all, that it is a grant to a stranger; and, secondly, a grant, not of the entire farm, but of a bit carved out of the farm. Can any human being say that, from the relations of the parties or the justice of the case, there is anything that makes it necessary that you should consider that they must have intended that the right of common should go on existing, and existing not in its old shape, because the right of common in its old shape, was appurtenant to the entire farm, but as re-apportioned to the parcel of land which was the sole subject-matter of this conveyance. I do not say that the language of this grant might not have passed the right of common under a different state of circumstances, but I do say that there is nothing in the circumstances of the case which show that this language must pass it. It leaves the language still obscure, vague, and ambiguous. With regard to the vague, obscure, and ambiguous language, which possibly might have passed such a right if it was the intention of the parties that it should, what additional facts have we beyond those I have mentioned which throw any light upon the question? Why is it that from that moment, for thirty-four years the grantee of this land never ventured to use this right which is now dug up after thirty-four years' delay? That shows that the circumstances at the time were not such that the parties themselves could be supposed to have intended these words to have any specific application at all. If, indeed, they were words so specific that you could not account for their existence in the deed except upon the supposition that there must have been some subject-matter to which they applied, the court would search round about and find what would be the natural subject-matter and what would be the most reasonable subject-matter to which to apply them. But the words are not such as to justify the supposition that there must have been something to which they correspond. On the contrary, as has been pointed out, they are words of the greatest obscurity and vagueness; and having regard to the non-user for thirty-four years it appears to me, when once you find they are not apt words—that they are words which you would have to strain, and words which are not exact and precise, and which no conveyancer who knew his business would desire to use in order to convey such a right—that the true construction is not that put by Mr. Hopkinson, but by the respondents.

I add one more fact which seems to me to justify that conclusion, and that is, that although the words which Mr. Hopkinson seeks to rely on refer to rights belonging to the piece or parcel of land to which the right can only be (in the very secondary sense which he claims for) considered to apply, yet if you are to measure it by the user of that date, the user, strictly speaking, was not the user of this particular piece of the waste as connected with the enjoyment of this particular portion of the farm. I do not lay too much stress upon that, because I entirely agree with Mr. Hopkinson that, if this right did exist as regards the whole farm, and it was a question, strictly speaking, of apportionment, these words would be sufficient to carry a portion of the common with them, for the purpose of the enjoyment of the grant of the alienated parcel. So much, therefore, for the first branch of Mr. Hopkinson's argument. I have taken a long time to express myself because it is a little obscure in the subject-matter.

I should like to say something with regard to Mr. Hopkinson's second argument, which is this: He says if you look at the surrounding circumstances you ought to infer that the deed with these words—à fortiori even without these words—created a right of common over this waste on Banstead Downs as being reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the alienated parcel of land. If such a right exists it arises either from the words of the deed, expressly created, or from implication to be derived from the words of the deed, or it may arise, as it seems to me, by implication from the surrounding circumstances, having regard to the fact that the deed has been executed. Whichever way you look at it (though in the one case it would be an express grant, and in the other implied), if you find, either in the deed or from the surrounding circumstances and the deed together, a clear intention of the parties that the right of common should go with the land, then Mr. Hopkinson might succeed. But surely he is pressing too far the principle upon which the class of cases to which I am about to refer rests, that the grantor must not derogate from his own grant, and that the surrounding circumstances may show when a grant has been executed, that it must have been the intention of the parties that a particular licence or concession should accompany the express grant which has been made. Surely he is pressing that doctrine too far to apply it to a case of this kind. In the case of continuous easements we know what the law is. There has been what is sometimes called an exception to the law, but I doubt whether it is strictly an exception. It seems to me to be only an illustration of the principle in the case of formed roads. Where you find a formed road which is obviously and visibly laid out for the purpose of rendering the enjoyment of a particular house or land more feasible, the right to enjoy the formed road passes by implication, certainly when there are words capable of passing it, and I see no reason to think that it would not pass in a similar case without any words at all. I am not at all certain that it is the right which arises upon the deed itself, and that it does not arise from the circumstances outside the deed and the deed together. But to go further and to say that it is obvious that the grantor of the deed of 1859 must be taken to have granted this common because this common on Banstead Downs was reasonably necessary for the complete enjoyment of the granted parcel seems to me to be applying the doctrine to a case in which the reason of the thing does not admit of its application. If you could show in any particular case—I want to know whether any case can be brought up so high on any state of facts—but if you could show it was necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the grant of land that some right of common should be treated as attached to it, then the principle of law would apply. That is all. I doubt whether you could find it easy to make such a case. Certainly this is not the case. In this particular instance, so far from its being true that the reasonable enjoyment of common on Banstead Downs is necessary for the complete enjoyment of the granted premises, the contrary is clear. Never were sheep turned out on Banstead Downs from these premises. There is a bit of waste close by which might be utilized for the purpose, either by right if such a right existed, or by convention with the persons to whom the waste belonged if there is no such right. The case, therefore, cannot be brought upon its facts within any of those classes of cases where the principle that the grantor cannot derogate from his own grant has been held to apply.

For these reasons—reasons slightly different from those given in the court below—it appears to me that the appeal fails, with the usual result.

KAY, L.J.—I agree with the other members of the court in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed. The claim is not of an easement. It is a claim to a right of common on certain detached pieces of waste belonging to the manor of Banstead. That is a very different kind of right from a mere easement. It is a claim to a profit à prendre upon this waste of the manor of Banstead, which waste it is admitted was not part of the thing granted in any sense. The land that was granted is some fifty-three acres of what it is said was originally part of the demesne lands of the manor. To that land, speaking now of the estate in fee simple of that land, there never was any right of common attached at all. The lord as owner of the manor had of course a right to depasture on his own waste, and his right could only be called a right of common because in the exercise of it he would not be allowed to overstock the common so that those who had rights of common properly so called upon it would be deprived of those rights. But except in that sense the lord had no right of common on these parts of the waste, and certainly such right as he had was not attached to the demesne lands. He would have had that right if he had had no demesne lands whatever. Therefore, as I say, to this land, speaking now of the fee simple interest in the land, there never was at any time previously to the deed of 1859, which we have to construe, any right of common attached to the land at all.

Then we have to construe, and I think the whole question turns on the construction of that deed of 1859. At that time, and for many years previously, the lord of the manor had been accustomed to let this land as part of a much larger farm—Lindley, L.J., has calculated it to have been five times as large—and to permit his tenants of this part of the demesne lands to pasture the cattle which were levant and couchant upon their farms on the different portions of the wastes of the manor. That is the only sense in which there ever was any common of pasture attached to this land at all, and that was by a distinct grant and permission of the lord of the manor when he let this land to his own tenants. It was in lease with the rest of the farm at the time of the deed of 1859 which granted it to Maudslay, the predecessor in title of the present claimant.

Now we approach the deed with these facts, and what strikes me as extraordinary is, that if it was the intention of the parties to that deed to attach to the fee simple which was conveyed by that deed, not to the tenant but to a stranger, a right of common, why did they not say so in express, clear, explicit, and unmistakable words? There is nothing whatever in the deed to pass the right of common except the mention of common among the general words which are used in that deed, as they are ordinarily used in all deeds of conveyance; and the word which is used in connection with commons is commons "belonging" to this land. I have said that in no sense was there any common belonging to this land, except that, as between the lord and his tenants, he had been accustomed to give to his tenants permission to exercise rights of common such as he had himself in respect of this land when he let it. Now is that enough, when you find a grant not to the tenant—not a grant of the reversion to a tenant like Doidge v. Carpenter—but a grant to a third person who has no kind of connection with the tenant, a grant which contains no recital of any intention to give rights of common, no express and explicit grant of the particular right of common, which is not even of the whole of that farm, but only of about one-fifth part of it, I mean the whole of the farm in respect of which rights of common had been conceded to the tenants who accepted the farm? Is the necessary construction of this deed such that the purchaser of these fifty-three acres is to have a similar right of common in respect of the fifty-three acres which the tenant of the whole farm had in respect of that farm under the special grant contained in the deed? I am not able, I confess, to come to that conclusion. It seems to me that the case of Doidge v. Carpenter differs widely. It has been pointed out already, and I will not repeat at any length what has been said, that in Doidge v. Carpenter there was an express lease of a right of common to the lessee, and there the landlord, dealing with the lessee who was at that moment under the lease enjoying by the express terms of the lease a right of common, releases in fact the reversion to him, conveys to him the fee simple, together with all commons and common of pasture thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining—that is, the landlord conveys to the tenant the thing he was enjoying with the common, and the right of common thereto appertaining—and Lord Ellenborough says that under the circumstances, "thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining," which are the words of the conveyance in fee, seem as if they were studiously selected in order to constitute a grant de novo to subsist in enjoyment as before. It might have been worded otherwise, it might have been said—and it would have been to my mind equally cogent if it had been expressed thus—that there is a landlord conveying the reversion in fee to his tenant with all commons and rights of common appurtenant, which as between the landlord and tenant might very well be construed to include those rights of common which by grant of the landlord the tenant is enjoying at the moment of the conveyance to him. I think that the case is very widely different in that respect from the case which is before us now. This is not a grant to a tenant or anyone who was in possession or enjoyment of any rights of common at the time. It is a grant to a man who at the moment was an entire stranger to this property.

Then I cannot leave out of sight this circumstance also: If the tenant himself had been granting away part of the thing let to him there might, according to the case of Sacheverell v. Porter, have been in law an implied apportionment of the right of common which he enjoyed in respect of the whole farm. The grant was not by the tenant, but by the lord of the manor, and the doctrine of the case of Sacheverell v. Porter does not by any means necessarily apply to a grant like this. I daresay if the grant did very clearly express, or if the necessary construction, or the proper construction, of the grant was that a right of common was granted, then the doctrine of that case might apply to show that it was a portion of that right of common which could be ascribed to this particular piece of land which was then being conveyed; but, of course, you first of all have to arrive at the conclusion that there was by this deed a right of common.

I agree that in this case it is absolutely necessary, in order to come to the conclusion that any right of common passed, to hold that the deed of itself created a right of common, because, as between the grantor and the grantee of the fee simple, or as between any holder of the fee simple and the lord of the manor, no right of common up to that time had ever existed at all.

I do not think it necessary to canvass the decision of Thomas v. Owen, Ewart v. Cochrane, and the like cases, where, there having been a grant of a particular subject of real estate, it was held that an easement—apparently that which was, if not necessary for the enjoyment of, at any rate a thing which had up to that time been enjoyed with, and was, therefore, an important adjunct by way of easement to, the thing granted—did pass. To my mind those cases have nothing to do with the right of common like that claimed in this case, and therefore, for these reasons, I concur in the judgment of the other members of the court, and think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Chan. Div. North, J. — June 28, 1892.

In re PALK.
In re DRAKE.
CHAMBERLAIN v. DRAKE. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Liability of deceased trustee for breach of trust committed after his death.

The estate of a deceased trustee is not liable for a breach of trust committed after his death where he has left the trust funds in a proper state of investment at his death.

W. H. Palk by his will, dated the 12th of December, 1884, bequeathed the residue of his estate to his executor and trustee, T. E. Drake, upon the trusts therein mentioned. The testator died on the 28th of July, 1885, and the will was duly proved by T. E. Drake, who took over the trust estate.

By his will, dated the 27th of September, 1886, T. E. Drake gave the residue of his estate equally between his three daughters, and appointed his daughter Harriet Drake as executrix. T. E. Drake died on the 9th of March, 1888, and his will was duly proved by Harriet Drake. At the time of the death of T. E. Drake all the trust securities of W. H. Palk were standing in T. E. Drake's name.

By a deed dated the 17th of January, 1890, Harriet appointed the plaintiff and one Probyn (since deceased) to be trustees of the will of W. H. Palk. This deed contained a statement of the securities in which the trust estate of W. H. Palk was invested. After the execution of the deed it was discovered that certain of the securities mentioned in it were not in the possession or under the control of Harriet Drake. She had employed her brother, C. H. Drake, as her solicitor in the winding up of T. E. Drake's estate. It now appeared that she had under the advice and influence of C. H. Drake (not clearly understanding what she was doing) executed transfers of the missing securities, and had allowed him to receive the purchase-moneys, which he misappropriated. Some part of the money had been recovered from C. H. Drake, but a considerable balance remained unpaid.

The present action was brought against Harriet Drake and her two sisters. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the whole estate of T. E. Drake was liable to make good to the plaintiff, as trustee of Palk's will, the trust funds formerly vested in T. E. Drake as such trustee; that accounts might be taken to ascertain the amount of the liability, and proper orders made to enforce it; that the defendant Harriet Drake might be declared personally liable for such parts of the estate of Palk as she had suffered to be received by C. H. Drake, and that she might be ordered to make good the same; and that if and so far as might be necessary the estates of Palk and T. E. Drake might be administered by the court.

By her defence Harriet Drake stated that she was willing that her interest in the estate of T. E. Drake should be treated as liable to make good such amounts as through the misappropriations of C. H. Drake remained owing to Palk's estate.

The defendants alleged that the whole of the funds subject to the trusts of Palk's will were properly invested at the time of the death of T. E. Drake, and they submitted that his estate was not liable to make good any losses which had arisen by reason of any act or default of Harriet Drake or of C. H. Drake, or which otherwise had occurred since the death of T. E. Drake.

Beaumont, for the plaintiff.—The estate of a deceased sole trustee remains liable for the trust fund until trustees have been validly appointed in his place and the trust fund has been handed over to them: Gibbins v. Taylor, 4 W. R. 432, 22 Beav. 344.

Creed, for the defendants.

NORTH, J.—The estate of the deceased trustee is not liable for what he left in a proper state of investment at his death. Harriet Drake is of course liable to make good the whole loss. There will, therefore, be an order declaring that Harriet Drake is personally liable, and that her beneficial interest under her father's will is liable to make good the trust funds, but that the rest of T. E. Drake's estate is not liable.

having become directors, took transfers accordingly from the vendor, of shares in the company allotted to him in part payment of his purchase-money, although there were still matters open between him and the company at the time,

Held, on an application to make the directors liable for misfeasance under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, that, a prospectus having been issued inviting the public to subscribe for shares, in respect of any shares so transferred by way of gift to the directors, as to which there had been concealment of the fact from the public, the directors were liable, and that the fact of knowledge of the transaction on the part of all the actual members of the company made no difference.

Held, also, that, these directors having paid full value for similar shares subscribed for by them, that raised as against them, in the case of the shares given to them, a presumption that these shares were of value.

Summons.

This was a summons taken out in the winding up of the above-named company by the liquidator under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, asking that each of the respondents, the four original directors of the company, might be declared guilty of misfeasance under the following circumstances, and liable accordingly as mentioned below.

The summons was heard before Vaughan Williams, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division.

One Dowse, an inventor, being possessed of certain patents for automatic machines, desired to promote a company to purchase his patents and the benefit of a notion which he had conceived for the sale of penny postage stamps to be automatically delivered to purchasers, and for this purpose got seven gentlemen, including one of the respondents, to sign (in respect of one share each) the memorandum of association of this company, which was incorporated on the 30th of September, 1890. Its capital was £5,100, divided into 5,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 100 founders' shares of £1 each.

The company, which was, under its memorandum of association, to enter into and carry into effect, with or without modifications, an agreement already prepared for the purchase of the patents from Dowse by the company, was met at the outset by difficulties about obtaining directors and subscriptions for shares beyond the minimum of seven shares agreed to be taken by the subscribers of the memorandum. Dowse thereupon arranged for the respondents to become directors and subscribe respectively for 100 £1 shares in the company, he undertaking, if they would so do, to give each of them one-fifth share in his profits under the said agreement. The said agreement was then modified, and, as modified, provided that the company was to pay Dowse as purchase-money £2,600, payable as to £1,250 in cash and as to £1,350 in fully paid-up shares, 100 of which were to be founders' shares.

Provision was also made thereby for the agreement being registered by the company in accordance with section 25 of the Act of 1867, and for the issue to the vendor and his nominees after such registration of 1,350 shares as fully paid up, as mentioned in the schedule thereto, and in the said schedule each of the respondents appeared as an allottee of twenty founders' shares, and the vendor of twenty founders' shares and 1,250 ordinary shares in the company. It thus appeared on the face of the agreement that some consideration was being paid or some gift was being made by Dowse to the respondents. By clause 7 thereof "£1,250, balance of the purchase-money," was to be payable out of the net profits of the company remaining after payment of dividends as therein mentioned"; and by clause 10 the validity of the agreement was not to be impeached on the ground that the vendor, as promoter or otherwise, stood "in a fiduciary relation to the company," or that the directors, having accepted office at his request, did not "constitute an independent board."

On the 17th of November the subscribers to the memorandum of association appointed the four respondents directors of the company, and the modified agreement was approved. The agreement, as modified, was executed as of the 21st of November, and registered before the allotment of shares, in order to comply with section 25 of the Act of 1867. On the 9th of December 1,250 ordinary shares, fully paid, were allotted to Dowse, and twenty founders' shares to each of the four respondents and to Dowse.

On the 21st of November a letter had been written by Dowse to each of the four respondents in the following terms:—"Provided you subscribe and pay for not less than 100 shares in the Postage Stamp Automatic Co. within fourteen days, I hereby agree to transfer to you 250 fully paid ordinary shares as and when the same are allotted to me, and also to give you a charge for £100 on my cash interest in the aforesaid company, such charge to be forthwith prepared by the secretary, Mr. Barker," and on the 16th of December Dowse transferred to each of the respondents 250 of the ordinary shares received by him as vendor, and wrote to each of the respondents a letter in the following terms:—"In consideration of an agreement I undertake to pay you out of the sum of £1,250 payable to me in cash by the Postage Stamp Automatic Delivery Co., under an agreement filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, the sum of £100, the same to be paid proportionately with other payments by the company under the said agreement, and I agree to this charge being forthwith filed with the Postage Stamp Automatic Delivery Co. (Limited.)"

The liquidator, Barker, who was secretary of the company, was treated by the court as aware of all the preceding facts, excepting the letter of the 21st of November, and the arrangement under which Dowse obtained the assent of Jones and the other respondents to become directors and subscribe for 100 shares each, and also of the transfer by Dowse on the 16th of December of 250 ordinary shares to each of the respondents. The respondents and Dowse each took up and paid for 100 £1 shares in the company. Except these shares and the one share each agreed to be taken by the subscribers of the memorandum of association, no shares were taken up by anyone, and the only other person that became a shareholder (by transfer, in June, 1891, of Dowse's shares) was aware of all the relations and arrangements between Dowse and the respondents, including the letter of the 21st of November.

The company carried on business on a small scale until the spring of 1891, and, more capital being then urgently needed, a prospectus was, in June, 1891, issued to the public asking further subscriptions. Neither this prospectus nor a prospectus previously printed, but not issued by the directors, contained any mention of the transfer by the vendor of shares to the directors, or of the agreement to make them a cash payment, and an intention to conceal from the public invited to take shares the fact of such transfer and agreement was found as a fact by the court.

The subscribers of the memorandum of association were aware that the respondents were to share profits with the vendor.

An extraordinary resolution for voluntary winding up was passed on the 1st of April, 1892, and an order was afterwards made to continue the voluntary winding up under the supervision of the court.

The creditors of the company were few, and the principal creditor was Barker, for services rendered as an accountant.

On the 3rd of May, 1892, this summons was issued by Barker, as liquidator of the company, for a declaration that each of the respondents was guilty of misfeasance and breach of trust in relation to the company, in accepting, by way of gratuity, a gift from Dowse, the promoter of and vendor to the company, of 270 fully paid-up shares of £1 each, being part of the consideration payable and paid by the company to Dowse, under an agreement, dated the 21st of November, 1891, and made between Dowse of the one part and the company of the other part, and that each of them was liable and might be ordered to pay to the company and the liquidator thereof £270, together with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, from the 21st of November, 1890, until payment.

Eve, for the liquidator, referred to the cases collected at p. 406 of Mr. Buckley's book on the Companies Acts, 6th ed.

T. L. Wilkinson, Swinfen Eady, and Peterson, for the respondents, contended that they were not accountable to the company for anything in respect of the shares on three grounds—first, because there was no concealment from the actual members of the company, and it was intended to work the company as a private company; secondly, because the shares were not a gift, but a consideration for the respondents subscribing for shares; lastly, because the shares never had any value, and the respondents, if liable, were only responsible for the highest value of the shares since they received them; and cited Eden v. Ridsdale's Railway Lamp and Lighting Co., 38 W. Eve, in reply, referred to In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J. [after stating the facts, substantially as set out above, continued:—].—The first question which I have to decide is whether the respondents are accountable to the company for the shares which they received from the vendor.

First, then, as to the founders' shares, I do not think the respondents are liable, because with regard to these there was no concealment, the agreement with the company disclosing the fact that such founders' shares would be allotted to the respondents, and the 10th clause of the agreement disclosing the fact that the respondents became directors at the request of the vendor, and that the board of directors would consequently not be independent. With regard to the ordinary shares the case is different, because undoubtedly with regard to these there was concealment from the public to whom the prospectus was issued, although the public did not take up any shares.

Now, it is contended that the respondents are not accountable to the company for these shares on the following grounds:—First, because there was no concealment from the actual members of the company, and it is said that it was intended to work the company as a private company. I find, however, as a fact, having regard to the issue of the prospectus, that the intention was to get the public to subscribe. Secondly, it is said that the shares were not a gift to the respondents, but transferred to them in consideration of their subscribing for 100 shares each. Lastly, it is said that even if the respondents are liable, they are only responsible for the highest value of the shares since they received them, and that the shares have never had any value. I will deal with these contentions seriatim.

The first contention, in my opinion, fails. The issue of the prospectus shows an intention to deceive future allottees. The fact of the knowledge of the actual members of the company will not in such cases avail directors. This is clear from the judgment in In re British Seamless Paper Box Co. I do not think that the case is materially different by the fact that the respondents did disclose to the company that they were receiving some consideration or gifts from the vendor. The fact of the mention of the transfers in the minute-book is not a sufficient disclosure. The transfers might in fact have been for valuable consideration, notwithstanding they are expressed to be for 15s.

The second point also, in my opinion, fails. Even assuming that the inducement to the vendor was the undertaking of the respondents to take up shares, I think that in substance the shares were given to the respondents in consideration of their becoming directors, and at a time when there were still matters open between the company and Dowse.

Lastly, I think that the contention that the shares were of no value fails. The respondents themselves paid full value for the shares. This raises a presumption of value against them.

Appeal from chambers.

The facts were shortly as follows:—

The plaintiff Prebble and the defendant Robinson submitted certain differences between them for the decision of two arbitrators and their umpire, who sat to hear the evidence for six hours upon one day, and for two hours upon the following day.

Subsequently the umpire made his award, and wrote to both parties intimating that it was ready to be delivered upon payment of a sum of £153 16s. 8d. for the fees of the umpire and the arbitrators, including a small sum for the cost of preparing the award.

The plaintiff took up the award, which was in his favour, and sent in his bill of costs, including the item of £153 16s. 8d., to the defendant.

The award contained no mention of these fees.

Upon taxation of the bill, the defendant objected to this item, on the ground that the umpire did not in his award give the amount of the arbitrators' and umpire's fees, and that the same were excessive and ought to be reduced by the taxing master.

The taxing master stated that in his opinion these costs were most unreasonable and that he would have reduced them if he thought he had power to do so, but he refused to tax them on the authority of In re Stephens, Smith, & Co. and The Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., 36 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 464 May 7, 1892).

The defendant appealed to Bruce, J., in chambers, who referred the matter to the court.

The Arbitration Act, 1889, provides (section 2):—"A submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be deemed to include the provisions set forth in the Fisst Schedule to this Act so far as they are applicable to the reference under the submission."

Provision (i) in the First Schedule is as follows:—"The costs of the reference and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrators and the umpire, who may direct to, and by whom, and in what manner, those costs or any part thereof shall be paid, and may tax or settle the amount of costs to be so paid or any part thereof, and may award costs to be paid as between solicitor and client."

Moyses, for the defendant.—The master had power to tax this sum: it was not part of the award, and could, therefore, be taxed without setting aside the award itself. [He was stopped by the court.]

Marshall, for the plaintiff.—The arbitrators or umpire are given express power by provision (i) to settle their own charges, which are part of the general costs of the arbitration. The umpire in this case did settle his own and the arbitrators' charges at the sum of £153 16s. 8d., and this sum is not subject to any further taxation unless the whole award be set aside on the ground of misconduct under section 11 of the Act. This case is governed by In re Stephens & Co., which was cited to the taxing master.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I fully sympathize with the difficulty which was felt by the master and the judge in this case, and I think it would be well if a clear provision existed that arbitrators and umpires should not be the final judges of their own fees. However, I think it is tolerably clear that these charges are subject to taxation. The case in the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL which was cited is a decision by judges of very great authority, but there is a great difference between it and the present case. In that case the arbitrators did what provision (i) allows them to do: they stated in their award what were the costs of the reference and the award, and directed by whom they should be paid; and the judges said that they could not tax individual items of these costs without setting aside the whole award, and that they were not asked to do. The distinction is clear: there the sum was a part of the award itself, here these charges are not ascertained by the award at all. Undoubtedly they would have been subject to taxation before the Arbitration Act came into force, and as the umpire has not brought himself within the words of the Act I think there is no difference between these proceedings and proceedings taken before the date of the Act.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship read provision (i) and continued:—] The arbitrators or umpire may direct by whom the costs are to be paid—that is a provision which was very commonly inserted in references before the Act was passed. Then they may "tax or settle" the costs, and may award costs as between solicitor and client.

Now there is no indication in this provision that the arbitrators are to "tax or settle" after they have made the award: this power is coupled with a power which was often exercised before the passing of the Act in and by the award itself. It seems to me, therefore, that when this power given by the Act to tax is not exercised in and by the award, it has not been used at all, and that the master has power to tax these charges. The case must be referred to the master for taxation.

STORY v. SHEARD. (a.)

Highway—Damage caused by excessive weight—Power of road authority to recover expenses—Death of person liable—Action against executors—"Actio personalis moritur cum persona"—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23.

Proceedings under section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, to recover the amount of extraordinary expenses incurred in the repair of a highway by reason of damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon cannot be maintained against the legal personal representatives of a deceased person by whose order the excessive weight or extraordinary traffic was put upon the road, such proceedings being founded in tort, and the maxim "Actio personalis moritur cum persona" applying.

Case stated by justices of the county of Derby.

The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, s. 23, provides as follows:—"Where by a certificate of their surveyor it appears to the authority which is liable or has undertaken to repair any highway . . . that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover in a summary manner from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted the amount of such expenses as may be proved to the satisfaction of the court having cognizance of the case to have been incurred by such authority by reason of the damage arising from such weight or traffic as aforesaid."

The appellant was the surveyor for the county of Derbyshire, and the respondent was the executrix under the will of John Sheard, who died in May, 1891.

The appellant had certified in October, 1891, that extraordinary expenses to the extent of £295 3s. 5d. had been incurred by the Derbyshire County Council during the year ending the 31st of March, 1891, in repairing certain main roads in the county, by reason of damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same and extraordinary traffic thereon—viz., locomotive engines drawing trucks laden with coal—and that such weight and traffic was conducted over the said main roads by order of John Sheard, deceased.

An information was lodged in January, 1892, against the respondent as John Sheard's executrix, with a view to the recovery from his estate by the county council as the road authority of the amount of such extraordinary expenses. The magistrates dismissed the information, upon the ground that the proceedings under section 23 were purely personal against the person who gave the order and could not be prosecuted against his estate. The question was whether this view was correct.

Carver, for the appellant.—Section 23 is not a penal section: it merely makes provision for the summary recovery of these expenses as a debt; the right to recover these expenses, therefore, survives against the estate of a deceased person.

T. E. Ellison, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, B.—In January, 1892, proceedings were taken against the executrix of a deceased person who was alleged to have used a public road in such a way as to put excessive weight upon it, whereby extraordinary expenses were incurred in repairs. The objection was taken that although the deceased might have been liable in respect of these expenses, his executrix was not liable because the proceedings under this section were in tort, and the magistrates decided in favour of this objection and against the applicant under the information. The question at issue can be decided by looking into the substance of these proceedings. If they are taken for the purpose of recovering a debt they will lie against the executrix. If they are in tort the rule "actio personalis moritur cum persona" applies, and they will not lie against the executrix. That is a well-established rule binding upon us, and I cannot doubt that this is really a case of tort. It arises in this way. A person uses a highway in an excessive manner. Under the old law proceedings might be taken by the owners of the highway by action or by indictment, and if by action the foundation of it would certainly be in tort. Then as the use of these heavy machines became common the Legislature made this special provision, that upon the certificate of the surveyor the expenses may be recovered in a summary manner from the person by whose order the excessive weight was put upon the road. Until the passing of this Act no action could have been brought against a person who had misused a highway in this manner except on the supposition that he had committed a tort; and this statute, while giving a new method of recovering the damages, has not changed the nature of the acts upon which the proceedings are founded.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — Oct. 26, 27.

In re VANSITTART.
Ex parte BROWN. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Voluntary settlement—Gift of diamonds by husband to wife within two years of the bankruptcy—Claim of trustee—"Settlement"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

A gift of diamonds by a husband to his wife is a "settlement" on the wife within the meaning of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and, in the event of the husband becoming bankrupt within two years afterwards, such settlement will be void as against his trustee.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order that certain articles of jewellery given by the debtor to his wife within two years of the bankruptcy should be handed over for the benefit of the creditors.

The bankrupt, C. G. Vansittart, formerly lived in India, and was stated to have been sometimes known amongst the natives as the Gold King of India.

Between December, 1890, and December, 1891, Mr. Vansittart purchased diamonds of considerable value, which he presented to his wife.

Shortly afterwards he became bankrupt, and the jewellery in question was now claimed by his trustee.

Witt, Q.C., and Germaine, for the trustee.—My first point is that, on the evidence, what was done was merely a mode adopted by the bankrupt to hold his property. He retained dominion over these presents, and the alleged gift was not a reality, but was held by the wife in trust. But even if the jewellery was really given, it constituted a transfer of property within two years of the bankruptcy, and falls within section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Yate Lee, for Mrs. Vansittart.—The jewellery now sought to be recovered was really given on four occasions, including the birthday of the bankrupt's wife, and the anniversary of their marriage, and also on one occasion when a horse of the bankrupt named Romance won its first race. Mr. Vansittart then gave his wife a diamond bracelet which was known as the Romance bracelet. The gifts were ordinary presents, and there is no evidence that they remained the property of the husband. Then as to this being a settlement within section 47, my contention is that that section does not apply. The section refers to a "settlement," "settlor," and "trustee of such settlement," and it is a perversion of terms to say that a section containing those words ever contemplated a gift of diamonds by a man to his wife. This application is not made under the Statute of Elizabeth, which might apply, and section 47 is aimed at property being settled on a trustee and does not apply to a pure gift.

He referred to In re Player, Ex parte Harvey, 15 Q. B. D. 682, 34 W. R. Dig. 170.

Cur. adv. vult.

October 27.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—It is extremely difficult to extract from the decided cases any clear definition of the transfers which will and which will not fall within the operation of this section. The section has a history. The word "settlement" did not appear in the original statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, s. 5. The words used there were, "Be it further enacted that if any person which hereafter is or shall be a bankrupt by intent of this statute shall convey, or procure or cause to be conveyed, to any of his children, or other person or persons, any manors, lands, tenements, hereditaments, offices, fees, annuities, leases, goods, chattels, or transfer his debts into other men's names," &c. In Kensington v. Chantler, 2 M. & S. 36, Lord Ellenborough held that money did not fall within the section, which was confined to things which were the subject of conveyance or capable of being conveyed or procured to be conveyed. Lord Ellenborough did not mean by this that the section only extended to land and did not extend to personal property. He meant apparently that the section did not apply to a gift of money, which if given directly to the donee could not have been intended to be preserved, and he seems to have mentioned the fact that money was not included in the words of the statute rather as an illustration that the statute was not intended to apply to gifts of personal property not intended to be preserved by the donee, than as a definition of the subject-matter intended to be the subject-matter of the section.

I infer from this and other decisions on the same lines referred to in the text-books that the judges so read the section as to make the application of it depend on the intention of the donor, at all events to this extent—that the section did not apply to cases where the circumstances of the gift made it manifest that the subject-matter of the gift was not intended to be preserved by the donee, as would be manifest in the case of a gift of money to a son to advance him in his busines or for his maintenance. The words of the original section so far as they affect the point under discussion remained unaltered until 1869, when for the first time the word "settlement" was introduced into the Bankruptcy statute and substituted for the words which I have cited. Perhaps the object of the change was on the one hand to indicate that the section was not intended to apply to transfers of property which, from the nature and circumstances of the transfer, showed that the donor did not contemplate the preservation of the actual subject-matter of transfer by the transferee; and, on the other hand, to indicate that the section did apply to the transfer even of money when the intention was manifest that the money should be preserved either in its original form or in some other form of investment. It is difficult to account for the use of the word "settlement" in substitution for the word transfer or conveyance unless the Legislature intended to indicate something of this kind. This was what I understand Cave, J., to mean in the case of In re Player, Ex parte Harvey, where he says, "The word to look at is 'settlement.' It means that 'settlement' shall not be confined to ordinary formal settlements commonly so called, but may include any transfer of property. But settlement must be the end and purpose of the transaction, that is, the preservation of the thing, whatever its form, for the enjoyment of another person." Taking this view, I am afraid that a present of diamonds by a man to his wife is a present which I ought to hold was a settlement on the wife. It seems to me that, to use the words of Cave, J., the purpose of the transaction was the preservation of the thing, whatever its form, for the enjoyment of another person. I think that the donor contemplated the retention by his wife of the present which he gave her. I should have held just the same if he had given her money to buy herself a present. I wish to add that, if I had had to construe the section apart from previous decisions, I am not at all sure that I should not have limited its operation to written transfers. I am not sure that this is not what Lord Ellenborough meant in Kensington v. Chantler, but it is quite impossible at this time to introduce such a limitation into the section, which up to the present time has never been introduced, at all events expressly, in any of the judgments in any of the decided cases.

HURLBATT v. BARNETT. (a.)

Arbitration—Practice—Compulsory reference—Question in dispute in part a matter of account—Reference of all issues in the cause to an official referee—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 14.

The Arbitration Act, 1889, is an amending, not a consolidating, Act, and, under section 14, the court has jurisdiction to order a compulsory reference of a whole cause to an official referee if the main, but not the only, question in dispute between the parties is a matter of account.

Appeal of the defendants from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bruce, J.) dismissing an appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers, compulsorily referring the whole cause to one of the official referees. The plaintiffs were the assignees of the estate and effects of Sawyer, Wallace, & Co., of New York, which firm prior to the 4th of September, 1890, when their business was assigned to the plaintiffs, carried on the business of commission agents in the United States and also in Europe. The agent of Sawyer, Wallace, & Co. in Europe was L. W. Sawyer, and he employed certain sub-agents. The statement of claim alleged that the defendants had been employed as such sub-agents, and in that capacity had entered into numerous transactions, and had received large sums of money on behalf of Sawyer, Wallace, & Co. The action was brought for an account of all such moneys received by the defendants. The defendants admitted that in respect of contracts entered into by them as agents for Sawyer, Wallace, & Co., and fulfilled before the 4th of September, 1890, there was a certain sum due from them to the plaintiffs, but alleged that, by reason of the assignment of the business of Sawyer, Wallace, & Co. on the 4th of September, 1890, and by reason of a claim by Sawyer, Wallace, & Co. to close all outstanding contracts from that date, they (the defendants) had become liable, as principals, on all contracts entered into by them as agents for Sawyer, Wallace, & Co. which were outstanding at the date of the assignment of the business. The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to an account in respect of such last-mentioned contracts; they were willing, however, to give credit to the plaintiffs for all amounts due on contracts completed before the 4th of September, 1890, but claimed to set off against any sum due from them to the plaintiffs a larger sum alleged to be due to them in respect of work done and commissions earned under their agreement with Sawyer, Wallace, & Co.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Boyd, for the defendants. — The case does not come within section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, because if the contention of the defendants is correct there will be no matters of account in dispute at all. Section 14 was intended to consolidate the law as enacted by section 3 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and sections 56 and 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873. It was not intended to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court as to compulsory reference. He cited Weed v. Ward, 37 W. R. 406, 40 Ch. D. 555, and Lord ESHER, M.R., referred to Knight v. Coales, 35 W. R. 679, 19 Q. B. D. 297.

Pollard, for the plaintiffs.—The effect of section 14 was to give the court enlarged powers of reference, and this case comes within the words of the section, because the questions in dispute consist mainly or in part of matters of account. The judge had jurisdiction to make the order, and it has not been shewn that he exercised his discretion wrongly.

Boyd replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the judge in chambers and also the Divisional Court have made a compulsory order for the trial of the action before an official referee. In so directing they acted under section 14, sub-section (c), of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the first question, therefore, which we have to consider is, What is the true construction of that section? The Arbitration Act, 1889, is not a mere consolidating Act, but is also an amending Act. It was passed after there had been certain decisions of the court on the corresponding sections of the Common Law Procedure Act and the Judicature Act. One of these decisions was the case of Weed v. Ward, and in that case a somewhat limited interpretation was put upon these Acts, and the court held that there was no jurisdiction to refer an action unless it could be seen that there must of necessity be an account. That being the interpretation put upon the former Acts, and when it is found that the words have been enlarged in the amending Act, the inference is that that enlargement must have been intentional on the part of the Legislature. We must consider, therefore, for the purpose of deciding this case, whether the larger words used in section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, show any such limitation as was put upon section 56 of the Judicature Act in Weed v. Ward. The words of section 14, sub-section (c), are as follows: "If the question in dispute consists wholly or in part of matters of account" the court may order the whole cause to be tried before an official referee. If these words are compared with the words "in any cause or matter requiring any prolonged examination of documents or accounts," in section 57 of the Judicature Act, it is clear that it was the intention of the Legislature that under the Act of 1889 the court should have wider powers of reference than formerly. The section does not say that in order to give the court the power of compulsory reference the dispute must be one which cannot end otherwise than in an account; and I think that if the court can see that a part of the dispute really is as to a matter of account, then the court has jurisdiction to refer the whole case.

In the present case it is obvious that the great question in dispute between the parties is as to a matter of account, and therefore the court has jurisdiction. Having jurisdiction the court has a discretion to say whether its jurisdiction shall be exercised in a particular case or not. The Court of Appeal can overrule the exercise of a discretion by an inferior court; but it should be very cautious in doing so. In Knight v. Coales a very good rule as to the exercise of this discretion is laid down, though I do not mean to say that it is one that must invariably be followed. It was there said, "We are of opinion that this discretion should be exercised with extreme caution, regard being had to the relative importance of that which is matter of account as compared with that which is not. The matter of account giving the jurisdiction should not be incidental or subordinate to the other questions in dispute, but should be a substantial element to be decided in the action to justify a compulsory reference." I do not think that that rule goes so far as to say that, merely because there is a dispute as to a contract, and on one reading of it there would have to be an account, there must necessarily be a reference. In different cases the court may take a different view, and that is a matter of discretion. In this case it is clear that the amount of the account is the most substantial thing in dispute between the parties; the court had jurisdiction, and, in my opinion, exercised its discretion rightly. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Attachment—Jurisdiction—Judgment debt — "Execution"—Irish judgment registered in England—Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 56), ss. 1, 4—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5.

The Judgments Extension Act, 1868, gives no jurisdiction to commit a judgment debtor to prison under the Debtors Act upon the certificate of a judgment obtained in Ireland and registered in England under the former Act, inasmuch as such committal is not a process of "execution," and the general words of section 1 of the Judgments Extension Act, giving jurisdiction to the English courts upon such a judgment, are controlled by section 4, and limited to "execution" under that Act.

This was an appeal from a refusal of Pollock, B., sitting as judge in bankruptcy, to order the committal of the respondent to prison upon a judgment summons taken out under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, upon a judgment recovered in Ireland on the 23rd of June, 1892, and registered in the English courts under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

Section 1 of that Act provides that where judgment has been obtained in the courts at Westminster a certificate thereof registered in Ireland, and where judgment has been obtained in Ireland a certificate registered in England, shall "be of the same force and effect, and all proceedings shall and may be taken on such certificate as if the judgment of which it is a certificate had been a judgment originally obtained or entered up on the date of such registration as aforesaid in the court in which it is so registered," &c.

Section 4 provides as follows:—"The Courts of Common Pleas at Westminster and at Dublin, and the Court of Session in Scotland, shall have and exercise the same control and jurisdiction over any judgment or decreet, and over any certificate of such judgment or decreet, registered under this Act in such courts respectively, as they now have and exercise over any judgment or decreet in their own courts, but in so far only as relates to execution under this Act."

H. Reed, Q.C., for the appellant.—The effect of the registration of an Irish judgment in the English courts under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, is to enable all steps to be taken to enforce it which, under the Debtors Act, could be taken upon an English judgment. That is the true effect of section 1, and the interpretation of "execution" in section 4 must be determined by reference to section 1. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—You have to read section 1 and show it is unlimited by section 4.] Assuming the powers given under the Act to be limited by section 4, "execution" must be taken to mean enforcing a judgment in any way the Act permits, and imprisonment under the Debtors Act is a mode of enforcing the judgment. It is a process of execution. The Debtors Act has been held to apply to a decree. [He cited Ferguson v. Ferguson, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 661, 24 W. R. Dig. 184.] [LOPES, L.J.—The Judgments Extension Act cannot apply to the Debtors Act, inasmuch as it was passed in the year before.]

Channell, Q.C., and Beddall, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—If section 1 of the Judgments Extension Act stood alone it may or may not be the case that the words of it are large enough to cover this case. But it is not necessary to determine that, because the Act must be read as a whole, and section 1 must be read with reference to section 4. When you have general words in one section of an Act, and have a subsequent special section which limits the general words, that is the governing section.

Now here we have section 4, which expressly limits the jurisdiction given by section 1 to "execution" under this Act. Is, therefore, the power of imprisoning for non-payment of debts which the court has under the Debtors Act a process of "execution" at all? It seems to me that it is not, and I think it has been so held; when you have exhausted all the powers you have under the Debtors Act the execution still remains. I am of opinion, therefore, that imprisonment cannot be inflicted here upon an Irish judgment so registered under this Act, and that the appeal must, consequently, be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—This is an Irish judgment, and it is sought by the appellants, under the Judgments Extension Act, to proceed under section 5 of the Debtors Act, as if it were an English judgment, and he admits that he must bring himself within that Act.

Now section 1 is general in its terms, and says that "all proceedings" may be taken upon the certificate of a judgment registered under the Act as if it were an English judgment. The appellant relies upon the force of these words "all proceedings." But at the time that Act was passed the Debtors Act was not, and they could not, therefore, be applicable to proceedings under that Act.

But there is a stronger ground than this, because, by section 4 of the Act, the proceedings which may be taken under it are expressly limited to "execution." Imprisonment for debt is not a process of execution, it is a punitive provision, and when a man has suffered all the punitive effects of the Debtors Act the execution remains.

KAY, L.J.—I agree entirely in the reasons and conclusions which have been given in the judgments of the other members of the court, and will only add that section 5 of the Debtors Act speaks of the power given of committal as a new jurisdiction, and the words show that under it "execution" shall not be interfered with.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN KNIGHT AND THE TABERNACLE PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Practice—Question for opinion of High Court—Special case stated by arbitrator—Judicial decision—Consultative opinion—Right of appeal to the Court of Appeal—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 19.

The Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from an opinion of the High Court of Justice on a question submitted to it by an arbitrator under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, such opinion not being a judicial decision, but merely consultative.

Appeal from a decision of a divisional court.

A dispute having arisen between a building society and one of its members named Knight, a reference was made to arbitration pursuant to the Building Societies Act, 1874. A question of law arose in the course of the reference; and an order was made on the arbitrators to state a special case under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. This order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal: In re an Arbitration between Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society, 39 W. R. 507, [1891] 2 Q. B. 63, and it was subsequently further affirmed by the House of Lords.

The arbitrators accordingly stated a special case, which was heard before Grantham and Charles, JJ., who decided the question of law thereby raised in favour of Knight.

Section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, is as follows:—"Any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the court or a judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference."

The society appealed, but the preliminary objection was taken on the part of the respondent that no appeal lay.

Fillan (Lincoln Reed with him), for the respondent.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Macoun, for the appellants.

Lord ESHER, M.R. — The question is whether that which the appellants here complain of is a decision of the High Court of Justice from which there lies an appeal to this court. It is an answer of the Queen's Bench Division to a question stated for their opinion in the form of a special case under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Primâ facie it is a decision, a judicial decision, but the question is whether, looking at the context of section 19, it is not to be treated as a consultative opinion rather than as a judicial decision. The distinction between the two things was recognized by the House of Lords in Overseers of Walsall v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 30, and under section 29 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which provides that certain questions may be "submitted for decision" to the High Court of Justice, it has been held that the decision of the court is consultative only, and not judicial: Ex parte County Council of Kent and Council of Dover, 39 W. R. 465, [1891] 1 Q. B. 725. Section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, says that an arbitrator may "state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference." It seems to me that this points to something less than a decision, certainly not to a judicial determination. I think that what we have to deal with here is a consultative opinion of the court, and that there is no appeal.

BOWEN, L.J.—There are two ways in which an arbitrator may submit a question of law to the court. He may state his award in the shape of a special case for the opinion of the court. If he adopts this course, he thereby exhausts his office; his award is a determination of the rights of the parties subject to what the court may order on the hearing of the special case. In such cases there might well be an appeal to this court from the decision of the High Court. The other course which he may adopt is to ask the opinion of the court in a consultative manner. This is in effect an interlocutory consultation of the court. Here the arbitrator does not divest himself of jurisdiction over the case. He is originally clothed with the duty to finally determine the case; and although an honest arbitrator is bound under such circumstances to follow the opinion expressed by the court, he is only so bound in honesty and morals. His consulting the court does not result in the determination of the case by any order of the court. In such a case I think there is no appeal to this court.

BLEWITT v. TRITTON. (a.)

Practice — Appeal — Evidence — Document — Sufficiency of stamp — Ruling of judge — Trial without jury — Right of appeal — Ord. 39, r. 8.

The ruling of a judge at the trial of an action, whether with or without a jury, that a document offered in evidence is sufficiently stamped, is not subject to review in the Court of Appeal.

Appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Day, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

This was an action on a promissory note for £216. At the trial the plaintiff put in the note, which was stamped with a penny stamp.

Objection was taken that it was insufficiently stamped under the Stamp Act, 1870. Day, J., overruled the objection and admitted the note in evidence, and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed on the ground that the note had been wrongfully admitted in evidence.

W. Higgins, for the defendant.—By the Stamp Act, 1870, which governs this case, every kind of promissory note whatsoever requires to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp: see Ashling v. Boon, 39 W. R. 298, [1891] 1 Ch. 568. [Houghton, for the plaintiff, referred to ord. 39, r. 8, which says, "A new trial shall not be granted by reason of the ruling of any judge that the stamp upon any document is sufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp.] That rule only applies to applications for a new trial and not to appeals. [Lord ESHER, M.R., referred to Siordet v. Kuczynski, 4 W. R. 153, 17 C. B. 251.] At any rate it only applies to cases which are tried before a jury. On an appeal from a judgment of a judge at the trial of an action without a jury, this court ought to disregard any evidence which was wrongfully admitted at the trial: Jacker v. International Cable Co., 5 Times L. R. 13.

Houghton referred to Heiser v. Grout, 8 W. R. 79, 5 H. & N. 35.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—If this case had been tried before a jury, the only way in which this point could have been taken would have been by an application for a new trial, on the ground that the judge had received evidence which he ought not to have received. But section 31 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, prevents such an objection being taken by providing that no new trial shall be granted by reason of the ruling of a judge that the stamp on any document is sufficient, or that it does not require a stamp. And in Siordet v. Kuczynski it was held that a judge court not reserve the point whether a document offered in evidence was sufficiently stamped, the intention of the Legislature being that the decision of any stamp objection was to be reserved for the judge at the trial alone. Ord. 39, r. 8, follows the words of that section. And the rules being applicable to all cases, I am of opinion that we ought to apply the words of this rule to both kinds of trial, viz., those with a jury and those without a jury.

We cannot, therefore, enter into the question whether the learned judge's decision on the Stamp Act was right.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In Siordet v. Kuczynski the court had to put a construction on section 31 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and they construed it to mean that you could not do indirectly what the Act prevented you from doing directly. Before that enactment you could, on showing that the judge at the trial had erroneously ruled that a document was sufficiently stamped, have obtained either a new trial or a verdict of nonsuit. Either way might have been tried. Then section 31 expressly barred the first way. But the court thought that the effect of the section was to make the judge at the trial final arbiter on any such question, and to preclude further discussion on it, and held that it prevented, not only a new trial, but also an entry of nonsuit. In Cory v. Davis, 14 C. B. N. S. 370, Willes, J., said the same thing. Then we come to ord. 39, r. 8. Ought we not to hold that the Rule Committee in repeating the words of section 31 must have intended to use them in the sense which the court had put on them? Assume that a plaintiff puts in a document, that the defendant objects that it is insufficiently stamped, and the judge overrules the objection and admits the document. Assume that the plaintiff has other evidence on which he might rely, but he decides to let his case rest where it is. Unless we are right in our judgment, the Court of Appeal would be in this position, if they thought the judge's ruling wrong—they would be bound either to take no notice of the mistake, or else to order a verdict for the defendant without knowing whether they had all the evidence before them. I am of opinion that we ought to carry on the old construction which has been put on the words—viz., that the judge's decision is final.

In re MAHON AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Solicitor — Taxation — Costs—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881—General Order, 1882, Schedule II.

In the taxation of costs under Schedule II. of the General Order of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, headed "Instructions for drawing, &c, deeds, wills, and other documents," the taxing master may, in extraordinary cases, in the exercise of his discretion, for special reasons, increase or reduce the scale of charges. By extraordinary cases are meant cases either more or less difficult than the normal. The taxing master is not obliged to state his reasons for such increase or reduction. Cases for the opinion of counsel are included in the words "other documents."

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by some solicitors that their objections to an order of a taxing master in this matter might be allowed, and that it might be referred back to the master to vary his certificate.

Schedule II. of the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, provides as follows:—"Schedule II.—Instructions for Drawing and Perusing Deeds, Wills, and other Documents.—Such fees for instructions as, having regard to the care and labour employed, . . . and the other circumstances of the case, may be fair and reasonable. In ordinary cases, as to drawing, &c., the allowance shall be: For drawing, . . . 2s. per folio. Attendances.—For ordinary cases, . . . 10s. In extraordinary cases the taxing master may increase or diminish the above charge, if for any special reasons he shall think fit." The second part of the schedule then provides for "Abstracts of Title" and "Journeys from Home," with a similar note that the taxing master may increase or diminish the allowance for the same.

The solicitors' client required a taxation of his bill. In the bill the solicitors had charged, inter alia, 10s. each for eighty-three attendances; of these ten were disallowed altogether, thirty were allowed at 10s. each, and the remaining forty-three were reduced to 6s. 8d. No objections were taken to the ten disallowed altogether. The client raised no objection to the thirty for which 10s. each was allowed. But the solicitors in their written objections said, with regard to some seventeen of the forty-three attendances reduced to 6s. 8d.: "These were ordinary attendances in an ordinary case, for which solicitors are entitled to charge 10s. each under Schedule II., and it is submitted that, not being an extraordinary case, a taxing master has no discretionary power to diminish such charges, and, even if he had, there must be some special reason for the reduction."

In two instances also the taxing master allowed only 1s. per folio for drawing a case for the opinion of counsel. In their objections the solicitors said: "A case to counsel is a 'document' under Schedule II. which of all others requires care and labour, and 2s. per folio is the proper charge."

In his answers to the objections the taxing master said: "I am not sure I precisely understand what is meant by 'extraordinary.' In the present case many of the attendances were of an extraordinary simple character. . . . In cases of extraordinary difficulty I can well understand the taxing master having discretion to increase the 10s. for an attendance. . . . Does it not follow that in extraordinary simple cases the master has power to diminish the 10s. where in his discretion he thinks it proper to do so? . . . In taxing costs under the Act, Schedule II., it has been the uniform custom and practice of all the masters in the Chancery Division to exercise their discretion in dealing with items of the description comprised in the objection, and the case of In re Reade, 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 219, seems not only to justify this custom, but to go much further, for the master's discretion would seem to include the whole of the items covered by Schedule II."

With regard to the cases to counsel the taxing master said: "The fact is that the cases in question, so far from being of an extraordinary nature, were of a very simple character. Under Schedule II. the taxing masters one and all allow 1s. per folio for drawing a case for the opinion of counsel, . . . 'documents' are not to be taken in the largest sense of the word, 'abstracts' are not included. . . . Further, if my reading of In re Reade be correct, the master's discretion would again come in. In this matter I am clearly of opinion that if I had any discretion, 1s. per folio is ample for the case in question. . . ."

The taxing master accordingly overruled the above objections.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the solicitors.—The taxing master has no power to diminish the charge for attendances. He may perhaps increase it in extraordinary cases. If he can diminish them he must have special reasons for so doing, and he must state them. Here he has really taken 6s. 8d. as the ordinary charge, not 10s. Cases for counsel are "other documents," within the schedule, under which the ordinary charge is 2s. per folio.

J. G. Butcher, for the client.—The taxing master has a discretion to increase or diminish the charge for attendances. If cases to counsel are within the words "other documents," still the taxing master by his answers shows that he considers that he has a discretion, which discretion he has exercised.

NORTH, J.—The amount at stake in this case is not of importance, but it is a question of general interest. [His lordship then went through the schedule as above set out, and continued.] Then we come to the words, "In extraordinary cases the taxing master may increase or diminish the above charge if for any special reasons he shall think fit." The note at the end of the second part of the schedule corresponds with this note at the end of the first part, and I think that the word "extraordinary" draws a distinction between "extraordinary" and normal cases immediately above each note, and that it includes, not only more difficult, but also less difficult cases than the normal, and means everything not ordinary or normal, be it more or less, which is further shown by the words of the note, which say, "he may increase or diminish." Now, coming to the words "if for any special reasons he shall think fit," it is argued this means that he must state for what reasons he thinks fit. But I do not think the words bear this interpretation. I do not think he need state his reasons. The schedule, in my opinion, provides a scale of charges for the ordinary normal cases, and in extraordinary cases the taxing master is to have special reasons for increasing or diminishing the scale, but he need not state his reasons, he has merely to consider in his own mind and give his decision. Now, taking the case of attendances. The ordinary charge formerly was 6s. 8d., now it is fixed by the schedule at 10s., and the taxing master may make the charge either greater or less, according to circumstances, in his discretion, and by attendances of course are meant the ordinary normal attendances of solicitors, and he is to consider what are such attendances and what are not. Now in this case eighty-three attendances by the solicitor are charged for; thirty were allowed, ten disallowed altogether, and there is no objection to these. I don't suppose those attendances did not take place at all, but the master in his discretion disallowed them, and he has discretion to disallow for attendances which ought not to have taken place; for example, if a solicitor attends thrice in one day where once would suffice, &c. This leaves a margin of forty-three attendances reduced to 6s. 8d. Of these seventeen only are complained of. It is objected that the taxing master has no discretion so to reduce the charge. In my opinion he has. It is said, if he reduces the amount he is bound to give special reasons for so doing, but in my opinion he is not bound to state the reasons upon which he acts, and in the present case I don't see how he could, for he could not give reasons in writing for each case.

Then there is an objection raised to the principle of his decision. It is said he treated 6s. 8d. as the normal charge, and not 10s., as he should have done. But, in my opinion, he has not done this, but has made reductions in his discretion sufficient for the purpose. On the first point, therefore, the objectors fail.

Then as to the other point. Two charges are made in respect of cases laid before counsel. The proper charge to be allowed is at the rate of 2s. per folio. The taxing master has only allowed 1s. per folio. It is said he has no discretion as to that, but, in my opinion, he has; he could lessen the charge, either by reducing it from 2s. per folio to 1s., or by reducing the number of folios allowed. But in this case he has not so exercised this discretion. He has allowed the charge at the rate of 1s. per folio on the ground that the schedule scale for drawing "deeds, wills, and other documents"—that is, 2s. per folio—does not include cases for counsel, which he considers are not "other documents" within the schedule, and he illustrates his argument by saying that "abstracts" are not included in the term "other documents." That is so, however, because they are specifically provided for by the schedule. In my opinion, then, cases for the opinion of counsel undoubtedly come within the schedule, being included in the words "other documents," and on this point I do not agree with the taxing master. Then he says it is the invariable rule in the office only to allow 1s. per folio. I see no reason for any such rule. Though he clearly has jurisdiction to allow 2s. more or less, yet, unless there is some special reason, he ought to allow 2s. If he had exercised his discretion I should not have felt it open to me to review his decision; but I do not so read his reasons. If he had said 2s. is the normal charge, but I think 1s. sufficient, that would have been good; but he has not taken this course. I do not, however, think it is necessary to refer the matter back to him, as I am satisfied that in this case 2s. per folio is the proper charge. No costs to either party.

In re PORTER.
COULSON v. CAPPER. (a.)

Will—Vested remainder—Forfeiture—Attempt to assign—Inoperative settlement.

Life estates were given by a testator to his two sisters (both since deceased), and the survivor of them, and subject thereto to all testator's nephews and nieces equally who should attain twenty-one, with a proviso that, in case any of the nephews or nieces should, during the life estates, or either of them, assign or in any manner dispose of their expectant share in testator's estate, or attempt so to do, they should forfeit all benefit under testator's will. A niece of testator's, having attained twenty-one and married, during one of the previous life estates, executed a post-nuptial settlement, in which she included her reversionary interests under testator's will. This settlement was inoperative.

Held, that the post-nuptial settlement was an attempt to assign within the meaning of the will; that the niece's share under the will was therefore forfeited; and that the clause relating to forfeiture would apply equally to a share vested, but subject to be divested, as to a contingent share.

Testator, W. Porter, who died in June, 1851, by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trusts as therein mentioned, and subject thereto upon trust for testator's two sisters, H. Bentley and S. Bakewell (both since deceased), as therein mentioned, and after the decease of the survivor of them upon trust to pay and divide all the trust moneys between the children of his said two sisters and all other his nephews and nieces who should attain the age of twenty-one years equally as therein mentioned. And testator then declared that in case any of his nephews or nieces should, during the lives of his said sisters or the survivor of them, sell, mortgage, assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of (save by a last will or codicil or some writing in nature thereof which should be revocable) his, her, or their expectant share or part in the said trust moneys or any portion thereof, or any beneficial estate or interest therein, or should attempt so to do, then in any such case he, she, or they so selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of the expectant part or share, or attempting so to do, should forfeit and lose all benefit under testator's will, and the same mortgage, assignment, &c., so far as the same should purport to affect any part of the trust moneys, or any interest therein, should be utterly null and void, and the share and interest of the person so selling, &c., the trust moneys, or attempting so to do, should go in like manner as if he, she, or they had never been born.

Mrs. A Sullivan, daughter of the said S. Bakewell, having attained the age of twenty-one years, married in 1876. No settlement was made on her marriage, but in 1879 she and her husband, during the life of one of the testator's sisters, executed a post-nuptial settlement, in which she included her reversionary share in the testator's estate, in favour of herself, her husband, and her children. At the date of the settlement Mrs. Sullivan was domiciled in South Australia, in which colony there was at the time no law in force enabling her, even with her husband's concurrence, to assign her reversionary interests under the testator's will, and the said settlement did not operate as an assignment of such interests.

T. Rolls Warrington, for Mrs. Sullivan and the trustees of her settlement.—The intention of the testator was to secure the property for the benefit of Mrs. Sullivan and her children, and he could not have intended to prohibit such a dealing with it. "Attempt so to do" was intended to apply to some disposition which, but for the proviso, would have been effectual. The gift being vested, the condition is repugnant, and therefore void.

He considered In re Payne, 25 Beav. 556; Stephens v. James; Kearsley v. Woodcock; Churchill v. Marks, 1 Coll. 441; and In re Rosher, 32 W. R. 821, 26 Ch. D. 801; and NORTH, J., referred to Martin v. Margham, 14 Sim. 230.

NORTH, J.—In this case I think that what the testator has contemplated by his will as possible, has taken effect, or, rather, has been done, and therefore the provision for divesting the share operates. The direction in the will is this: certain life estates are given to two sisters and the survivor of them, and after the death of the surviving sister then "upon trust, subject as aforesaid, to pay and divide the trust moneys between all the children, if any, of my two sisters and all other my nephews and nieces whatsoever equally," to be paid to them, subject as therein mentioned, when he, she, or they should attain the age of twenty-one years. Now, if that was the entire gift there is a vested gift in remainder, vested at birth, payable at twenty-one, but subject to the preceding life estates; those life estates have now come to an end, and one of the persons who, if there was no other clause in the will, would have taken under the clause that I have read asks for a share—I mean Mrs. Sullivan. The will, however, goes on to provide: [His lordship then read the clause in the will concerning forfeiture, stated the facts set out above, said that in his opinion Mrs. Sullivan's marriage was not itself an assignment within the meaning of the clause, and continued.] The argument is that because she did not assign it, inasmuch as she could not assign it, therefore she in effect did nothing, and has not forfeited her interest. I could have followed that argument if the words "or attempt so to do" had been omitted from the will; but I find those words there, and I do not see my way to rejecting them or striking them out. Assigning is one thing; attempting to assign is another; and the will clearly contemplates a difference between the two, because it deals, first, with the assigning, and, secondly, with the attempting to assign, which must mean, not assigning, because that is covered by the first phrase, but attempting to assign must mean, attempting to do something which is not an assignment. Therefore it is either assigning, or, without assigning, attempting to assign. In this case it seems to me clear that this was an attempt to assign; and, unless I reject those words altogether, I must treat it as producing the result which the testator intended to avoid.

Now there are a great many cases in the books bearing on the subject. Mr. Warrington has attempted to distinguish one of them from the present, on the ground that what was the subject of the assignment in that case was at the time of assignment contingent and not vested. I do not see how there is any distinction for the present purpose between a share which is contingent and a share vested, subject to be divested; that is to say, I do not see any legal principle upon which I can say that the clause in the present will would not apply to a vested share subject to divesting, though it might apply to a contingent share. It seems to me there are a great many cases in which the court has recognized that where a legacy has been given absolutely with a provision that in case the legatee should die before the legacy became payable, then that the gift over should take effect, and it has been held that the gift over is perfectly good as addressed to the death of an absolute legatee dying before it becomes payable. There has been some little difference in the cases as to what its becoming payable meant, whether it meant the end of twelve months after the death of the testator when a legatee has a right to say that the executor is bound to pay a legacy, or whether it might be carried back to a rather earlier date—such earlier time in the twelve months as there may be assets available to pay the legacy; but in either case if the legatee died after the death of the testator, but before there were assets available to pay within twelve months, the gift over is good. I never heard it suggested that such a gift over as that was repugnant. I do not see how it can be, and that class of cases is one class which seems to me to negative the argument of Mr. Warrington in this case. Whether the testator would, if he had known the circumstances, have said that this bequest should be void in the events that have happened, I do not know; but that it comes within the words used in the will I do not feel any doubt about. His lordship then declared that the post-nuptial settlement executed by Mrs. Sullivan was an attempt to assign her share within the meaning of the will, and that her share was, therefore, forfeited.

CHADBURN v. MOORE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Principal and agent—Estate agent—Authority—Specific performance.

An estate agent has no authority to enter into a contract for sale of real estate unless he has express authority from the vendor to sign such contract.

Trial of action.

This was an action for specific performance of a contract contained in two letters for the sale of twenty-nine leasehold houses.

The plaintiff saw in the Daily Telegraph of the 14th of April, 1891, the following advertisement:—"Forced sale by order of the mortgagees.—Thirty-four well-built houses situated at Grays, close to the station on the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway, within easy reach of the docks; all let to respectable tenants at rents amounting to £640 per annum; held for about ninety-five years at ground-rents amounting to £146; price £3,500, of which £3,000 can remain on mortgage—For further particulars apply to Messrs. Pinder, Simpson, & Newman, 33 and 34, Saville-row, London, W.," and on the same day he called on (a.) Reported by J. WINKFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Messrs. Pinder, Simpson, & Newman, a firm of surveyors and estate agents, and having obtained further information, visited the houses and returned on the same day and made an offer for them which was reduced into writing. It appeared from the evidence that this offer was submitted by Mr. Newman to his client (the defendant), and that the plaintiff was to return the next day for the answer. Newman saw the defendant, who gave him instructions to withdraw five of the houses and fixed the price; but, according to the view of the evidence taken by the court, the defendant did not specifically instruct Newman to sign a binding contract. The plaintiff called on the next day, when the two following letters, which formed the alleged contract, were written out by a clerk and respectively signed by the plaintiff and Mr. Newman and exchanged.

"Sutton, Surrey,
"April 15, 1891.

"To Messrs. Pinder, Simpson, & Newman,
"33 and 34, Saville-row, W.

"Gentlemen,—Having looked at the twenty-nine houses at Grays, situate in Cromwell and Hampden-roads, I am willing to give the sum of £2,300 (two thousand three hundred pounds) for the leasehold interest, which I understand is for about ninety-five years unexpired at a ground-rent of £120 per annum.

"I shall be willing to pay a deposit of two hundred pounds and complete on the 1st day of May, 1891, on the understanding that I have free conveyances and that you advance me a sum of two thousand one hundred pounds by way of mortgage at 4½ per cent. per annum. I shall be willing to give additional security if necessary. I understand the title is good.

"Yours truly,
"JAMES CHADBURN.

"P.S.—Particulars of the houses are attached hereto."

Full particulars of the houses follows, signed by the plaintiff.

The other letter was as follows:—

"33 and 34, Saville-row,
"Burlington-gardens, W.,
"April 15, 1891.

"Dear Sir,—We accept your offer dated 15th April, 1891, for the purchase of the twenty-nine leasehold houses at Grays.

"Yours truly,
"PINDER, SIMPSON, & NEWMAN."

From the correspondence which was put in it appeared that the offer and acceptance were forwarded by the estate agents to the defendant, who thereupon wrote to the plaintiff asking him to call in reference thereto, and on the 20th of April wrote to Newman a letter of which the following is the material part:—

"I think you were, as you usually are, a little premature in actually entering into what might be a binding contract. It is always best to have an offer and acceptance subject to a formal contract being entered into, as otherwise the vendor under an open contract gets landed into all sorts of difficulties."

To which Newman replied on the 21st of April:—

"The offer for the above was accepted under your definite instructions, and it is a very good get out for you."

Several interviews took place between the plaintiff and the defendant, at which the latter endeavoured to persuade the former to abandon the contract, and ultimately the writ was issued in this action.

Renshaw, Q.C., and F. T. Duka, for the plaintiff.—The question is, Was Newman authorized by defendant to accept plaintiff's offer? It appears from the evidence that plaintiff's offer of the 14th of April was submitted to the defendant, and from the correspondence that defendant and Newman thought there was a binding contract. Hamer v. Sharp, 23 W. R. 158, L. R. 19 Eq. 108, does not apply. In the first place, that decision was prior to the Vendor and Purchasers Act, 1874, and the Conveyancing Acts, and therefore the objection as to there being no conditions to save expense to the vendor does not apply. Further, that case turned on the written instructions given to the estate agent. Here there are none.

Prior v. Moore, 3 Times L. R. 624, was also referred to.

Marten, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the defendant, were not called on.

KEKEWICH, J.—Having heard Mr. Newman, who was called without the plaintiff knowing what he was going to say, and having read the correspondence, I have little doubt that I have the real transaction, which is a mere transaction between principal and agent, before me. I suggested that the defendant should be called. It might be that a different complexion would be put upon the matter by his cross-examination, but this was not done, and he is entitled to have judgment upon the point of law. The defendant, undoubtedly, authorized Newman to find a purchaser for the houses. It is true the expression does not come out on the correspondence. On the second occasion he appears to have been instructed to negotiate a sale. Whatever else he did do, the defendant did not, in express terms, authorize Newman to enter into a contract. Newman was to find a purchaser, and to negotiate a sale. The question is, is this sufficient?

No evidence of any motion was adduced to show that a house or estate agent resembles a broker on the Stock Exchange or any other exchange. A house or estate agent is in a different position owing to the peculiarity of the property with which he has to deal, which does not pass as simply as stocks and shares do, but has to be transferred after investigation of title and in accordance with strict laws. An agent for the sale of real estate must be more formally constituted than an agent for the sale of stocks and similar securities. There is no definite authority.

In Hamer v. Sharp Hall, V.C., does not go so far as to say an estate agent cannot enter into any contract, nor does he decide the question of authority, but merely states his opinion. In Prior v. Moore I indicated my own opinion that instructions to a house agent to procure a purchaser and negotiate a sale do not amount to authority to the agent to bind his principal by a contract. There is in this case a circumstance which must not be forgotten, the defendant on the second occasion named the price he was prepared to take for the twenty-nine houses, Newman then jumped at the conclusion that he had power at that price to enter into a contract.

That is, in my opinion, not sufficient, the vendor must instruct the agent to enter into an agreement, and unless he does so, the principal reserves his final right to accept or refuse. In his letters Newman tells the defendant that the bargain is a good one, and that he has entered into it in accordance with the defendant's definite instructions, but in the witness box Newman says that the definite instructions meant, not definite instructions to enter into a contract, but to fix the price. It is unnecessary for me to consider the relations between the plaintiff and defendant, but I have come to the conclusion that the defendant never gave authority to Newman to enter into a contract, and has never conceded that he gave authority to Newman; he, in fact, treated it as negotiation.

A further point was raised on behalf of the plaintiff—viz., that in Hamer v. Sharp the Vice-Chancellor's reasons for considering that the instructions in that case were not a sufficient authority to the agent to sign a contract for the sale of the property, for the price stated in the instructions were based on the difficulties then existing with regard to a contract for sale, and that these difficulties have now been removed by legislation, but, as I read the case, it goes further than that. Moreover, in the defendant's letter to Newman he objects to the latter entering into what might be a binding contract, which implies that he did not give Newman authority to enter into such a contract. On the simple point of law, or rather, first, on the fact what authority did Newman have, and, secondly, on the point of law what did that authority amount to, the plaintiff's case fails, and there must be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

Q. B. Div.
(Mathew and Bruce, JJ.) Oct. 25.

In re AN ARITRATION BETWEEN THE RICHMOND GAS CO. AND THE MAYOR, &c., OF THE BOROUGH OF RICHMOND (SURREY).

Gas company—Statutory liability—Fixed price—Failure of supply—Unavoidable occurrence—Liability to abatement of price—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), ss. 24, 36—Richmond Gas Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. xxxv.), s. 25.

A gas company who are under a statutory obligation to supply a fixed quantity of gas to the public lamps in a district at a fixed price during a certain period are not liable to a reduction in that price if, by reason of an occurrence over which they had no control (such as a frost of exceptional severity), the fixed amount of gas has not been supplied during a part of that period.

Special case stated under the Arbitration Act, 1889, by an umpire to whom certain differences between the Richmond Gas Co. and the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Richmond (Surrey) had been referred.

The material facts, as stated in the case, were as follows:—The Richmond Gas Co. are incorporated by Acts of Parliament, and are thereby authorized to supply gas within certain limits, which include the parish of Richmond.

By section 48 of the Richmond Gas Act, 1867, the company are required to supply gas to the public lamps adjoining the company's mains during such hours as shall be settled by agreement between the company and the vestry or other lighting authority.

By section 24 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, it is provided (inter alia) that "the undertakers shall supply gas to any public lamps within the distance of fifty yards from any of the mains of the undertakers in such quantities as the local authorities of each district or the trustees of any turnpike road or highway board within the limits of the special Act may from time to time require to be supplied, and the price to be charged by the undertakers and to be paid to them for all gas so supplied shall be settled by agreement between the local authorities and the undertakers."

By section 36 of the said Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871, it is provided (inter alia) that "whenever the undertakers neglect or refuse to supply gas as by this Act required to all or any of the public lamps in accordance with the provisions of this Act, they shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for each default."

By section 25 of the Richmond Gas Act, 1881 (which incorporates the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871), it is provided that "the charge for supplying gas to the public lamps in the parish of Richmond, including the providing and use of such lamps and all proper lampposts, lampirons, burners, and fittings connected therewith, also the renewing and maintaining the same and the lighting, cleaning, and extinguishing the lamps shall, on and from the thirtieth day of June, 1881, be four pounds five shillings per lamp per annum, subject to an increase or reduction of five shillings per annum for every increase or reduction of threepence per one thousand cubic feet, to the ordinary consumer within the said parish. The said lamps to be lighted from sunset to sunrise, and the burners used therein to consume not less than five cubic feet of gas per hour."

During the period between the 1st of October, 1890, and the 31st of March, 1891, the company, in pursuance of the said section 25, supplied gas to the parish of Richmond, the duty of providing for the lighting of the parish belonging during the early part of that period to the vestry, and afterwards, upon the incorporation of the borough, to the corporation as the urban sanitary authority.

During the months of December, 1890, and January, 1891, it frequently happened that many of the public lamps in the parish of Richmond were not kept lighted by the company from sunset to sunrise, and that many others were supplied with and consumed less than five cubic feet of gas per hour.

For the purpose of this case it was admitted that the cause of the matters mentioned in the last preceding paragraph was that by reason of the frosts of exceptional duration and severity which occurred in the said months of December and January, the aqueous vapour unavoidably present in the gas was frozen in the pipes and that naphthaline crystals were deposited therein, and that by the ice and crystals so formed the pipes were on several occasions stopped up and the passage of the gas to the burners prevented.

It was also admitted that the company made special effort to overcome the obstructions above mentioned, and during the continuance of the above-named periods of frost employed extra labour and spent large sums of money in such efforts.

The company contended that they were entitled for the period aforesaid to be paid the full price provided for in the said 25th section of the Richmond Gas Act, 1881, without any deduction in respect of the deficiency of supply and consumption of gas above-mentioned, and without having to make or allow any payment to the corporation, whether by way of damages or otherwise, in respect of the same; and, further, that the only remedy of the corporation, if any, was to proceed for penalties under section 36 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871. The corporation, on the other hand, contended that in cases in which there was such deficiency of supply or consumption as aforesaid the company were not entitled to recover the full statutory charge, but could recover such sum only as might be fair, having regard to the supply of gas actually provided.

The question for the court was which of these contentions was correct.

A. J. Kam, for the company.—The company are entitled to the full payment provided for by the Act. They are under a statutory liability to supply gas, and are thereby placed in the same position as persons under a liability at common law to do certain acts. Such persons are released from their liability if by reason of an unavoidable occurrence such as the act of God, the performance of the act is rendered impossible. The frost in this case was such an unavoidable occurrence: River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson, 26 W. R. 217, 2 App. Cas. 743, per Lord Cairns, L.C., at p. 749; s.c. 24 W. R. 872, 1 Q. B. D. 546, per Mellish, L.J., at p. 554. The proper remedy (if any) is by proceedings for penalties under section 36 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871: Atkinson v. The Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., 25 W. R. 794, 2 Ex. D. 441; Vallance v. Falle, 32 W. R. 770, 13 Q. B. D. 109.

C. A. Russell for the corporation.—The corporation are entitled to a reduction in respect of the deficiency of light. They are not seeking to enforce a claim for damages for breach of the company's obligation, but they are not bound to pay for what they never received. The consideration for which the company are entitled to receive the £4 5s. per burner is that they shall supply the specified quantity of gas to the burners and keep it alight during the specified hours: section 25 of the Richmond Gas Act, 1881. This they have not done, and the amount payable to them should be reduced pro tanto.

MATHEW, J.—I think that our judgment must be in favour of the gas company. The question is whether they must submit to a reduction in the lump sum payable to them under the Act because of an occurrence which it is admitted was unavoidable. The Acts require that the company shall expend large sums upon the manufacture and supply of gas, and they are to do this upon the terms stated in the Acts. One term is that they shall receive £4 5s. per burner per annum. [His lordship read section 25 of the Act of 1881.] There is another important clause which points out the event in which the company may be treated as not complying with the statutory conditions—that is, section 36 of the Gasworks Clauses Acts, 1871. [His lordship then read the paragraphs of the case as to the effect of the frost.] The condition of the weather was such that it was impossible to convey the gas to the burners by the ordinary methods. Everything that the company could do to supply gas to the lamps was done, but, owing to causes over which the company had no control, the gas could not reach the lamps. It was said that by virtue of this statute the company had entered into a contract to supply light, and that if on any occasion the lamps were put out by a storm or by the malicious action of any person the corporation were at liberty to take notice of that and to require a proportionate reduction in the price; in fact, that under the Act the company were bound to keep all the burners alight. I think that that is an unreasonable construction to put upon the Act, and that the contention of the company is correct.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. At first sight it seemed unreasonable that the corporation should be bound to pay for what they had not received the benefit of. But I think it is clear that the company are under a statutory obligation to supply gas and the necessary fittings, and if they "neglect or refuse" to do so they are liable to a penalty; and the corporation are bound to pay for the gas at the rate specified. It was argued that if the company do not supply to the burners the full amount of gas which they are bound to supply, the £4 5s. may be in some way apportioned. I think that is not so, but that the obligations are independent, one by the company to supply gas and the other by the corporation to pay the £4 5s. The case will, therefore, be remitted to the umpire with this expression of our opinion.

Case remitted accordingly.

AYLESFORD v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Married woman—Examination as to property—"Debtor"—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 25, r. 52.

A married woman against whom a judgment has been obtained is within the terms of ord. 25, r. 52, of the County Court Rules, 1889, and may be ordered to attend for examination as to whether she has means of satisfying the judgment.

Appeal of the defendants from an order of the judge of the Warwickshire County Court, discharging an order that the plaintiff, the Countess of Aylesford, should attend before him to be examined as to whether she had any, and what, means of satisfying the judgment in the action.

In the year 1889 the plaintiff brought an action in the county court of Warwick against the defendants to recover £50 for the loss of a dog. The plaintiff was nonsuited and ordered to pay the costs of the action. The plaintiff did not appeal, and had not paid the costs. The defendants obtained ex parte from the county court judge the above-mentioned order for the examination of the plaintiff under ord. 25, r. 52, of the County Court Rules. On the day appointed for the examination of the plaintiff objection was taken before the county court judge by her solicitor that the plaintiff, being a married woman, did not come within the words of the rule, and that the order was, therefore, bad. The county court judge upheld the objection, and discharged the order.

The defendants appealed.

Ord. 25, r. 52, of the County Court Rules, 1889, is as follows: "When a judgment or order is for the recovery or payment of money, the party entitled to enforce it may apply to the court or a judge for an order that the debtor liable under such judgment or order be orally examined as to whether any, and what, debts are owing to the debtor, and whether the debtor has any, and what, other property or means of satisfying the judgment or order before a judge or an officer of the court as the court or a judge shall appoint."

Lyttelton, for the defendants.—The county court judge was wrong in discharging the order. He acted on the authority of Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; but his attention was not called to two later cases—Holtby v. Hodgson, 38 W. R. 68, 24 Q. B. D. 103, and Pelton Brothers v. Harrison, [1892] 1 Q. B. 118, 40 W. R. Dig. 181, in which the question of a married woman's liabilities on a judgment recovered against her was discussed. These cases show conclusively that a married woman may be "a debtor liable under a judgment or order," and therefore the order for the plaintiff's examination was rightly made and ought not to have been discharged. [He was stopped by the court.]

E. M. Pollock (T. Willes Chitty with him), for the plaintiff.—An order such as is asked for in this case can only be made against a "debtor." A married woman cannot be a debtor within the words of the rule: In re Gardiner, Ex parte Coulson, 36 W. R. 142, 20 Q. B. D. 249. The effect of Scott v. Morley has not been altered by the later decisions.

He also referred to Irwell v. Eden, 35 W. R. 511, 18 Q. B. D. 588.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of opinion that this case is clearly within the language of the rule. A married woman is not a debtor for all purposes and in all senses, but she is a debtor liable to the extent of her separate estate. I think that the language of Lord Esher in Holtby v. Hodgson is distinctly in point. That case was decided on ord. 42, r. 32, of the Supreme Court, the language of which is identical with this county court rule.

TAYLOR v. RUSSELL. (a.)

Mortgage—Priority—Tacking.

In November, 1862, the S. trustees mortgaged certain lands, including the piece in question, to L., but by some accident the title deeds of the piece remained with the S. trustees. In January, 1883, the survivor of the S. trustees, together with the tenant for life, conveyed this piece to T., and he received the title deeds.

T., in February, 1883, mortgaged this piece of land to the appellants, but the title which he purported to show was a forgery.

In October, 1887, T. mortgaged the same piece of land to R., showing in his abstract the real title, and handing over the real title deeds.

R., having afterwards discovered that there was an outstanding mortgage in the representatives of L., asked them to release the piece of land from the mortgage debt secured by the indenture of November, 1862, and to convey the legal estate to the S. trustees discharged from the mortgage debt, upon the express condition that they should thereupon convey the legal estate to R. This was carried out.

Held, that R., thus getting in the legal estate, was not to be postponed to the prior equitable mortgagee.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 39 W. R. 81, [1891] 1 Ch. 8) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Sir James Hannen, and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), reported 39 W. R. 8 [1891] 1 Ch. 8.

The facts are given very fully in the judgments and in the report in the court below.

Haldane, Q.C., and Levett, Q.C., for the appellants.—Legard's trustees had no right to convey in this way. The mortgagees could have released, but only in favour of those entitled to the equity of redemption. You cannot by any bargain with a stranger get rid of notice. Legard's trustees, though innocent, were committing a breach of duty. The estate is in the mortgagees merely as security. Beyond his security a mortgagee is a trustee. If he goes into possession he has to account for rents, &c., as trustee, or if he sells wrongfully. The appellants are entitled to insist on an estoppel. The Surtees trustees were not entitled to prefer one to another.

J. Scott Fox and Eastwick, for the respondents, were not heard.

The House took time for consideration.

March 28.—Lord HERSCHELL.—The question raised in this action is whether the appellants are entitled to a first charge as mortgagees of certain hereditaments comprised in an indenture of mortgage dated the 15th of February, 1883. The learned judge who tried the action declared them to be so entitled, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The case is one of that unfortunate class where one of two innocent parties must suffer from the fraud of a person with whom they have dealt. Thomas Toward, whose frauds have led to this litigation, executed on the 15th of February, 1883, an indenture of mortgage conveying to the appellants the property now in question to secure an advance of £2,500. The title which he purported to show was a deed of conveyance of the property to himself from the trustees of one Samuel Smithson. The signatures of the trustees were in fact forgeries, and the land had never formed part of the Smithson Estate. The appellants were content to take the title without further inquiry because they had shortly before become the mortgagees of certain other hereditaments in the same neighbourhood, conveyed to Toward by Smithson's trustees, and had then investigated the title, and had no reason to suspect that the forged deed was otherwise than genuine.

Thomas Toward had in fact acquired the land in question from the trustees of Robert Surtees by a conveyance dated the 30th of January, 1883. On the 20th of October, 1887, he mortgaged it to the respondent, Arthur Henry Russell, to secure an advance of £2,500, showing in his abstract the real title and handing over the deeds to the respondent. I have said that Thomas Toward had acquired the land by conveyance from Surtees' trustees, but he did not in fact obtain the legal estate, although so far as appeared from the conveyance and abstract of title he did so. By an indenture dated the 19th of November, 1862, the trustees under the will of Robert Surtees had conveyed a considerable quantity of land, including the piece in question, by way of mortgage to Sir Francis Legard to secure the sum of £9,000 and interest. This mortgage was outstanding at the date of the conveyance to Toward, and was apparently overlooked. The result was this, that although both the appellants and the respondent Russell thought they had obtained the legal estate, neither of them had in fact done so. But inasmuch as at the date of his conveyance to the appellants, Toward had an equitable estate subject to the mortgage to Sir F. Legard, the appellants obtained a good equitable title. And their title, being of earlier date than the equitable title of the respondent Russell, would undoubtedly on that ground have had the priority but for what subsequently happened. I say this, of course, apart from the question of negligence, on which ground also the respondent contends that the appellants' security must be postponed to his.

When Toward's frauds became known the respondent Russell, having ascertained the existence of the outstanding mortgage, approached the representatives of Sir F. Legard, and applied to them to release the land in question from the mortgage debt secured by the indenture of November, 1862, and to convey or cause to be conveyed the legal estate in the same to the respondents. Sir F. Legard's representatives, being satisfied that the remainder of the property comprised in the mortgage was sufficient security for the sum due to them, agreed to take this course. It was accordingly arranged that they should convey the legal estate to the Surtees trustees discharged from their mortgage debt, upon the express condition that they should thereupon convey the legal estate in the premises comprised in the respondents' mortgage to them. The Surtees trustees assented to this arrangement, which was accordingly carried out by two indentures. By one of the 21st of November, 1888, the Legard trustees conveyed to the Surtees trustees, who in turn, by an indenture of the 26th of November of the same year, conveyed to the respondents. The respondents thus became possessed of the legal estate in the premises comprised in their mortgage, and it is on this (apart from the question of negligence to which I have already alluded), that they base their claim to priority over the appellants whose equitable interest was prior in point of time to their own.

It is not disputed that the doctrine of equity is well settled, "that a man who has bonâ fide paid money without notice of any other title, though at the time of the payment he as purchaser gets nothing but an equitable title, may afterwards get in the legal title if he can, and may hold it, though during the interval between the payment and the getting in of the legal title he may have had notice of some prior dealing inconsistent with the good faith of the dealing with himself." I am using the language of Lord Selborne when delivering the opinion of the Judicial Committee in the case of Blackwood v. London Chartered Bank of Australia, 22 W. R. 419, L. R. 5 P. C. 92. It is said that there is engrafted upon this rule of equity this exception, that the possession of the legal estate cannot be insisted upon as against a prior equitable incumbrancer where it was obtained from one who held it merely as trustee. The language of the late Master of the Rolls in Harpham v. Shacklock was strongly relied on in support of this view. His words were: "Nothing is better settled than that you cannot make use of the doctrine of tabula in naufragio by getting in a legal estate from a bare trustee after you have received notice of a prior equitable claim." It is not necessary for your lordships to determine whether this view is in accordance with the authorities, but I am content to assume it to be well founded. Where the person in whom the legal estate is vested stands in the relation of trustee to the prior incumbrancer, it would certainly be strange if a subsequent incumbrancer with notice of these facts could secure any advantage by obtaining a conveyance of the legal estate to himself.

The appellants put their case in this way. They say that by the indenture of mortgage of February, 1883, the equity of redemption which had passed to Toward by the deed of January, 1883, became vested in them, and that they thus had an equitable estate in fee simple, subject to the mortgage to Legard. And, further, that Toward, as between himself and the Surtees trustees, was entitled to a conveyance of the legal estate of the property freed from the mortgage of November, 1862, and that this right passed to them. These propositions are not open to contest. Their next position is that when the legal estate became vested in the Surtees trustees by virtue of the conveyance of the 21st of November, 1888, they became trustees of it for the appellants, and that the respondents have thus obtained the legal estate from bare trustees who were bound to convey it to the appellants. But for the circumstances under which that conveyance took place, this might well be so. But it must be taken as proved that the legal estate was conveyed to the trustees of Surtees' will at the request of the respondent Russell, "and only upon the terms and express condition agreed to between them, the said trustees and the successors in title of Sir F. Legard, that they the said trustees would immediately thereafter convey the said premises and the legal estate therein" to him. The representatives of Sir F. Legard being under no obligation to convey to the Surtees trustees, and having made the conveyance only on the condition and for the purpose mentioned, the learned counsel for the appellants were forced to admit that their clients could not successfully have invoked the aid of a court of equity to compel a conveyance to themselves. They equally failed to establish that the appellants could have obtained an injunction to prevent the conveyance to the respondent. Whether there was to be a conveyance to the Surtees trustees or not was a mere question of the machinery by which the arrangement between the respondents and Sir F. Legard's representatives was to be carried out, and I am of opinion that the matter must be dealt with upon the same footing as if the conveyance had been made directly from those representatives to the respondents.

The controversy, therefore, resolved itself into this: Was there anything in the circumstance that the legal estate was obtained from Legard's representatives, which precludes the respondents from claiming the benefit of it as against the appellants? It was contended on their behalf that inasmuch as they were the owners of the property subject to the mortgage, Legard's representatives were trustees for them, and that in conveying to the respondents without consideration they were guilty of a breach of trust to which he was a party; that if they were satisfied with less than the entire property comprised in their security, it was only to the appellants that they could lawfully release any part of it. No authority was cited for the proposition that a mortgagee is, subject to his security, a trustee of the legal estate for the mortgagor. The rights of a mortgagor are, no doubt, well established in a court of equity. He may redeem the mortgage, and no dealings with the property by the mortgagee, save a conveyance under the power of sale, can deprive him of this right. But it is quite a different proposition, and one which I think is wholly untenable, to assert that a mortgagee is trustee for the mortgagor. It is admitted that a mortgagee may create such estates as he pleases; he may convey, by way of submortgage, to whom and in as many parcels as he pleases. This seems to me to show that Legard's representatives cannot be regarded as holding the legal estate as trustees for the appellants. If the conveyance to the respondents was a breach of trust on the part of Legard's representatives, as against the appellants, they could, I presume, have come to a court of equity for an injunction to prevent the conveyance being executed. But had they done so the answer would surely have been, "Come and redeem; that is the right which you possess, and you are not entitled, whilst abstaining from the exercise of that right, to restrain the appellants from dealing with the legal estate vested in them." I am quite unable to see that Legard's representatives committed, as against the appellants, any breach of trust or other wrong of which they are in a position to complain, and this being so, the respondents, in taking the conveyance, were not parties to any breach of trust or other wrong. The case is a novel one. But I do not think that the appellants have brought themselves within any established exception to the rule that a subsequent incumbrancer without notice who has got in the legal estate may hold it as against one whose equitable title is prior in point of time. And I am unable to see any equity in the appellants entitling them to insist that the respondents shall not enjoy the advantage derived from the possession of the legal estate.

The view which I take renders it unnecessary for me to express an opinion upon the other ground upon which the respondent relies—viz., the alleged negligence of the appellants.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—There are no facts in dispute in this case, though much is left to inference and conjecture, which the appellants might have cleared up if they had thought fit to do so. The author of the mischief which has given rise to the present controversy was one Thomas Toward, of Shildon, in the county of Durham, a builder by trade, and a man certainly of more ingenuity than honesty. Toward absconded some time in the year 1888, the precise date is not given, but it was stated at the bar that it was in the month of August—and thereupon, or shortly afterwards, he was declared bankrupt.

On Toward's disappearance it was discovered that he had contrived to mortgage a small property in the town of Old Shildon, twice over for its full value. first to the appellants, and then to the respondent Russell, a solicitor in York, who is interested in the mortgage on his own account, and on account of his partner, the respondent Mackay.

The property belonged at one time to a gentleman of the name of Surtees, who died in 1857. Mr. Surtees devised his real estate in strict settlement. The trustees of the will, who were devisees to uses, had under the will powers of sale and mortgage, and, as incidental thereto, power to revoke the uses declared by the will.

On the 30th of January, 1883, the surviving trustee of Surtees' will, with the concurrence of the tenant for life, conveyed the property in question, together with a plot containing 820 square yards, making in all 2a. 2r. 1p., to Toward in fee, in consideration of £1,060, and the title deeds of the property, which it seems Mr. Surtees had acquired by purchase, were handed over to him.

In April. 1883, Toward conveyed the 820 square yards to the trustees of a Methodist chapel. He built some houses on the rest of the property, and mortgaged it more than once. Ultimately, on the 20th of October, 1887, he conveyed it to Russell by way of mortgage, for the purpose of securing an advance of £2,500, out of which a prior mortgage had been discharged. On the occasion of this mortgage to Russell the title was carefully investigated, and on the completion of the transaction, the title deeds of the property, which had been in the hands of Russell's firm on behalf of the prior mortgagee, were retained and held by him on behalf of himself and Mackay, and in his hands they have remained ever since. Not only had Russell no notice of any prior charge, but it is clear that no skill or diligence on his part could have detected any flaw or defect in the title furnished to him.

The circumstances attending the mortgage to the appellants are more interesting. On the 27th of April, 1881, Toward, who was then represented by a respectable firm of solicitors, mortgaged to the appellants a house in the village of New Shildon, known as No. 1, St. John's-road, which the trustees and the beneficial owner under the will of a Mr. Smithson had conveyed to him by an indenture, dated the 21st of August, 1878. It seems that on the occasion of this mortgage, Toward, with an eye to future business, took the precaution of keeping a copy of the conveyance to him. In January, 1883, when he was in treaty with the trustee of Surtees' will, he applied to the appellants without the intervention of a solicitor, for an advance of £2,500 on the security of the property. The appellants through their solicitors asked for an abstract of title. He furnished them with an abstract of a deed, purporting to be dated the 3rd of November, 1882, and to be a conveyance to him from the Smithson trustees, and the beneficial owner under Smithson's will, in consideration of £1,500. The appellants through their solicitors then desired to compare the abstract with the deed abstracted, and Toward produced to them a document in the form of a deed, which he had fabricated, by taking everything except the parcels and the date from his copy of the conveyance of the 21st of August, 1878, and inserting as the parcels a description more or less accurate of the property which he was purchasing from the trustee of Surtees' will, and forging thereto the names of the Smithson trustees, and the name of the beneficial owner under Smithson's will. Beyond comparing the abstract with the forged deed the appellants made no investigation of Toward's alleged title; they made no inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the property formed part of the estate devised by Smithson's will, nor did they call for the production of the earlier title deeds, although the forged deed on the face of it referred to a covenant to be executed by the beneficial owner under Smithson's will for the production of title deeds. According to their own account, they were favourably impressed by the shortness of the title, and they were satisfied that the property which Toward offered them in the town of Old Shildon was part of the Smithson Estate, because they had been assured by Toward's solicitors on the previous occasion that, "as a fact, the greater part of New Shildon was built upon land sold off by Mr. Smithson."

The mortgage to the appellants was dated the 15th of February, 1883, and it is not disputed that it operated to pass the estate and interest which Toward had acquired on the 30th of January preceding.

The appellants and the respondents each supposed that their own mortgage was a first charge, and protected by an assurance of the legal estate. It turned out, however, that the legal estate was outstanding, although the fact had escaped notice until after Toward's disappearance. It seems that on the 19th of November, 1862, by a deed of that date the Surtees trustees, with the concurrence of the then tenant for life, had conveyed the property afterwards sold to Toward, together with other property of much greater value, to one Sir Francis Legard in fee by way of mortgage for the purpose of securing £9,000, of which £3,000 was paid off in 1887. By some oversight the title deeds of the property afterwards comprised in Toward's purchase were not handed over to the mortgagee, and the fact that the property was in mortgage was overlooked when it was sold and conveyed to Toward.

After Toward's disappearance, Russell took possession of the property in question in this action under or by virtue of his mortgage, and then finding that the appellants claimed priority under a mortgage of earlier date, he applied to the trustees of Sir Francis Legard's will, in whom the mortgage of 1862 was then vested, and induced them to convey the property to the Surtees trustees upon the express condition agreed to between them and the Surtees trustees that the Surtees trustees would immediately thereafter convey the legal estate to him. This arrangement, the terms of which are not in dispute, was carried out by two deeds—a conveyance of the 21st of November, 1888, from the Legard trustees to the Surtees trustees, with the consent of the tenant for life under Surtees' will, and a conveyance of the 26th of November, 1888, from the Surtees trustees to Russell.

It is admitted that by this transaction Russell acquired the legal estate; and it is not disputed that an equitable mortgagee who has advanced his money without notice of a prior equitable mortgage may gain priority by getting in the legal estate unless the circumstances are such as to make it inequitable for him to do so, as would be the case, for example, if the legal estate were held upon express trusts or according to recent authorities, if it were vested in a satisfied mortgagee.

The mere fact that the subsequent incumbrancer has notice of the prior incumbrance when he gets in the legal estate counts for nothing. "It is," as Lord Hardwicke says (2 Ves. 574), "the very occasion which shows the necessity of it."

It is therefore incumbent upon the appellants, who were the plaintiffs in the action, to show that Russell acted inequitably in getting in the legal estate, or that there is some equity which prevents him from availing himself of its protection.

In considering the circumstances under which the legal estate was got in, it would, I think, be a mistake to attribute to the persons concerned in the transaction the knowledge which we now possess, whether the possession of that knowledge would or would not have affected their position.

The first question, in my opinion, is, What did the Legard trustees know about the facts of the case? It is not alleged in the pleadings or in the evidence, nor has it been suggested at the bar, that they knew anything about the appellants or their claim to be mortgagees of the property. Observations were made upon their conduct, as if they had officiously meddled in a quarrel which did not concern them, and had given, or had attempted to give, some advantage to one of two competing claimants, out of mere caprice, or possibly through some misapprehension of the real state of things. That is not, I think, the true view of the case. One has, in some degree, to guess at the facts, because the appellants, on whom the burden of proof lies, have not chosen to go into evidence about them. But, taking everything most strongly in favour of the appellants, it seems to me that no fault can be found with the action of the Legard trustees. They were applied to by a person who had apparently been misled through the negligence of their predecessor in title, and had advanced his money without notice on the security of a small portion of the property mortgaged to them. They did not require that portion for the purposes of their own security. Why should they not hand it over to the applicant? He had a mortgage perfect on the face of it, and possession of deeds showing a good title for sixty years. The Surtees trustees consented; so did the tenant for life under Surtees' will. And, as far as I can make out, the Legard trustees knew nothing whatever about anybody else in connection with the property. Notwithstanding the very able arguments addressed to us, I cannot see anything in their position as mortgagees to oblige them to play the part of the dog in the manger, and keep what they did not want themselves from a person who seemed to have a very good claim to it.

The next question is, What did Russell know? It is conceded that he knew that the appellants claimed priority on the ground of having a mortgage prior in date to his. More than this he cannot, I think, be taken to have known. There is no reason to suppose that the appellants had explained to him the circumstances which they now contend excused them from obtaining the title deeds of the property. It would have been strange if they had. They do not appear to have known the circumstances themselves. They did not even take the trouble to make themselves acquainted with the facts when they put in their statement of claim four months afterwards. The case made in their pleadings was that Russell only obtained possession of the title deeds to the premises under the conveyance of the 26th of November, 1888. In fact, the appellants seem to have displayed no greater diligence after Toward absconded than they did when they took their security. Russell certainly knew that there were claimants prior to him in date; but he also knew that those claimants could not have a single title deed relating to the property except their alleged mortgage. That circumstance unexplained would affect their claim to priority. Why was Russell to assume that it was capable of explanation when the persons interested did not choose to come forward and explain it? So long as it is the settled rule of the court that a subsequent incumbrancer may gain priority by getting in the legal estate, and that there is nothing in itself inequitable in so disarranging equities, I do not see how it can be contended that there was anything contrary to equity, or anything involving a breach of trust or a breach of duty in the transfer of the legal estate from the Legard trustees to Russell.

But then it is said that the legal estate passed through the hands of the Surtees trustees, and that they were trustees for the appellants in a sense. I am not quite sure that I know what that expression exactly means; but of this I am sure, that it is only when the legal estate has been acquired from a trustee in the proper sense of the term that the acquisition of it has been held of no avail; and certainly the Surtees trustees were never trustees of this property for the appellants; they were only devisees to uses under Surtees' will; they never had the legal estate until it was conveyed to them on a special trust or confidence to hand it over to Russell. In point of fact, I think they may be left out of the question altogether. The case seems to me to be precisely the same as if the legal estate had been conveyed directly by the Legard trustees to Russell. It is not clear why recourse was had to the interposition of the Surtees trustees, or why the conveyance to them took so singular a form. It may be, as suggested in the respondents' case, that that course was adopted with the view of affording protection to the trustees of the Methodist chapel, whose property was also included in the appellants' mortgage. At any rate, it is no part of the appellants' case that the particular machinery that was made use of was designed to embarrass or defeat their claim.

On these simple grounds, without discussing the doctrine of tabula in naufragio, or attempting to define the limits of its application (which it appears to me would be no easy matter, having regard to the current of modern authority), I think the appeal must be dismissed. The appellants have not succeeded in showing that Russell has done anything inequitable or improper in getting in the legal estate.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider what would have been the priority of the parties if the legal estate had not been got in. That question was not fully discussed, and I prefer to leave it undetermined. I will only say that I am satisfied that, on the part of the appellants, there was an amount of negligence which it is difficult to excuse or understand; and I am not at present convinced of the correctness of the view expressed by the learned judge who tried the case in the first instance that negligence necessary to postpone a prior equitable mortgagee in such a case as the present, must be so gross as to render him responsible for the fraud committed on the second mortgagee, and that, in fact, it is immaterial in such cases whether the prior mortgagee has or has not the legal estate.

Lord WATSON.—I have had an opportunity of considering the opinion which has just been delivered by Lord Macnaghten, and I entirely concur in it.

BANK OF AFRICA v. SALISBURY GOLD MINING CO. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Natal.)

Company—Lien on member's shares—Waiver—Articles of association.

A lien conferred by articles of association on the shares of any member indebted to the company is valid, any transfer by such indebted member being thereby made dependent on the consent of the directors.

Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29, approved.

Such a lien may be discharged by a new arrangement between creditor and debtor, the terms of which are incompatible with its retention. But the mere fact of the debtor agreeing to give his creditor authority to sell part of the subjects without notice, upon his making default, is not sufficient to warrant the inference that the creditor is not to realize the other parts of his security.

Where a shareholder indebted to a company applied for time, and gave such an authority with respect to certain shares other than those in question in this action,

Held, that no limitation of the lien in regard to the shares in the action was contemplated, and that a transfer of such shares by the indebted shareholder should not be registered.

This was an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Natal (the 31st of January, 1890) whereby a claim by the appellant company to have 400 shares in the respondent company over which the latter claimed a lien in respect of a debt due to them by Tristram Woolridge, in whose name the shares were then registered, transferred to their nominee, the certificate of the shares having been deposited with the appellants by Woolridge in part security of a current account.

The facts are detailed in their lordships' judgment.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Methold, for the appellants, contended that they were bonâ fide holders for value of the shares without notice of the respondent's lien. Moreover, the respondent company had accepted a promissory note and a transfer of certain other shares in exoneration of the shares now in question. The conduct of the respondents showed laches and acquiescence.

They cited Cowell v. Simpson, 16 Ves. 279; Mason v. Morley, 13 W. R. 669, 34 Beav. 471; Hooper v. Gumm, 15 W. R. 464, L. R. 2 Ch. 282, 291; Angus v. M'Lachlan, 31 W. R. 641, 23 Ch. D. 330; In re Taylor and Others, 39 W. R. 417, [1891] 1 Ch. 590.

Buckley, Q.C., and Cave, for the respondents.—Under our articles of association we had a lien on these shares for Woolridge's debt, which existed at the time when registration of their transfer was claimed by the appellants. [They referred to articles 13-17, 21, 38, 45, 46, 48, 52, and to Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs, 35 W. R. 521, 12 App. Cas. 29.] There had been no discharge of the debt and no waiver of the lien.

Beale, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Lord HANNEN, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The object of this action is to compel the respondent company to register a transfer by one Tristram Woolridge to the appellant bank of 400 of its paid-up shares. The company declines to do so until a debt due by Woolridge, the registered owner of the shares, has been satisfied. By section 38 of its articles of association, the company has a first and paramount lien upon all the shares registered in the name of each member for his debts to the company, and section 52 provides that no shareholder shall be entitled to transfer his shares, without the approval of the directors, "so long as his shares are not fully paid up, or afterwards if he, either alone or jointly with any person or persons, is indebted to the company on any account whatever." The validity of a lien conferred in these or similar terms by articles of association was fully recognized by the House of Lords in Bradford Banking Co. v. Briggs & Co.

The appellants do not dispute that, in the absence of any waiver of its lien, the company would be justified in refusing to register their transfer. But they maintain that certain transactions which took place between Woolridge and the company, as well as between the company and themselves, necessarily imply a surrender of the company's right to treat the 400 shares in question as a security for the debt due by Woolridge.

It appears that the company, in December, 1888, resolved to increase its capital by the creation of 3,000 new shares of £1 each, of which 750 were kept in reserve, and the remainder offered to the public. George Brown, a broker in Pietermaritzburg, acting under a power of attorney from Woolridge, tendered for the whole 2,250 shares, £1 subscription with a premium of £35 16s. for each of them, payable one-fourth immediately, another fourth upon allotment, and the balance upon the 28th of February, 1889. The tender was accepted, and Woolridge duly paid the first two instalments, amounting to £41,400. Before the balance became due he paid the amount stipulated for 1,250 shares, and obtained certificates for them as fully paid up.

When the 28th of February arrived Woolridge did not find it convenient to pay the balance then due in respect of the remaining 1,000 shares, which amounted to £18,400. On that day the company, at his request, agreed to take his promissory note for the balance, payable on the 15th of May, 1889, in consideration of his consenting that, in the event of the note being dishonoured at maturity, the company should have full power to dispose of the 1,000 shares, which were either to be retained in the meantime or transferred to a trustee for the company.

Under a written agreement between him and the appellant bank, made in March, 1888, Woolridge was allowed to draw against a mass of securities deposited with the bank, which he was permitted to reclaim from time to time on substituting other securities for those withdrawn; his obligation being to keep the amount of the bank's advances to him fully covered. In March, 1889, he deposited with the bank, in pursuance of that obligation, certificates representing the 400 shares now in dispute.

Before his promissory note matured Woolridge applied to the company for a further extension of the term of payment. To that request the company acceded, upon terms which were embodied in two agreements dated the 6th and 10th May, 1889. In accordance with these terms, Woolridge gave a new promissory note for the amount of his debt, to be renewed from time to time if both parties consented. He also agreed to transfer the 1,000 unpaid shares to the company's solicitor, in trust for the purposes of the agreement, and in security of the debt; and he authorized the trustee, in case of his default, to realize the shares at once, and to pay the proceeds to the company, "in satisfaction or on account of the said liability."

It was argued by the appellants that the company, in February, and again in May, 1889, transacted with Woolridge upon the footing that his debt, as then constituted by a promissory note, was to be specially charged upon the 1,000 shares, and must therefore be held to have passed from any lien previously affecting the 1,250 shares for which certificates had been issued.

Their lordships do not doubt that a right of lien may be discharged by a new arrangement between creditor and debtor, the terms of which are incompatible with its retention, or by any other arrangement which sufficiently indicates the intention of the parties that the right shall no longer be enforced. An agreement giving the creditor new and special powers with respect to part of the subjects covered by his original lien may be conceived in such terms as to imply that he is not to have recourse against the remaining subjects. But the mere fact of the debtor agreeing to give his creditor authority to sell part of the subjects without notice, upon his making default, is not, in the opinion of their lordships, sufficient to warrant the inference that the creditor is not to realize the other subjects of his security, if necessary. It indicates the intention of the parties that the burden of the debt shall be cast, in priority, upon the subjects to which the authority relates; but it does not necessarily imply that the security of the creditor is to be restricted to these subjects.

Their lordships are unable to find in the agreements of February and May, 1889, any stipulation or expression calculated to suggest that a limitation of the lien given to the company by its articles of association was in the contemplation of either party. On both occasions Woolridge asked for time and nothing else, and the indulgence was granted in consideration of his authorizing the 1,000 shares to be sold if and when default was made, without the necessity of waiting for fourteen days after written notice to him, as prescribed by section 39 of the articles of association.

Upon the 22nd of June, 1889, the appellants, by a letter addressed to the secretary of the company, intimated that they had a lien over 400 shares registered in the name of Woolridge, and requested that any dividend arising upon these shares should be paid to them. Until receipt of that communication the company had no notice of the bank's title to these shares, and had no reason to suppose that any one was asserting an interest preferable to its own lien. On the same day the secretary sent a reply, declining to recognize any other person than the registered owner as having right to dividends, and suggesting that the appellants should obtain an order from Woolridge for payment of dividends to them. No reference was made in that letter to the company's lien; but, on the 11th of July, 1889, the secretary, having meanwhile brought the matter before his directors, wrote by their instructions to the appellants, stating "that, acting under and by virtue of the provisions of clauses 38 and 52 of our articles of association, they cannot in any way recognize the lien held by your bank over shares in Mr. Woolridge's name." At the time when this correspondence passed Woolridge had not executed a transfer of the shares to the appellants, and, in point of fact, he did not do so until the 30th of August, 1889.

If the appellants, during the interval of time between their receipt of the secretary's letters of the 22nd of June and the 11th of July, had made fresh advances to Woolridge, in the belief that the company did not mean to claim any right to the shares, the question would have arisen whether the company could assert its lien so as to defeat the security of the appellants for these advances. But the relative position of the appellants and their debtor Woolridge remained unaltered during that period. It was also suggested that the company had lost its lien by giving effect to transfers by Woolridge of other parcels of his 1,250 paid-up shares, and thereby charging an undue proportion of Woolridge's debt upon the shares deposited by him with the appellants. It is sufficient answer to say that the suggestion is without foundation in fact, because the evidence shows that after the 22nd of June, 1889, although various transfers by Woolridge were presented for registration, the transference was in every case suspended, possibly in order to await the result of this controversy.

In these circumstances their lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right, and they will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss the appeal. The appellants must pay the costs incurred here by the respondents.

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation — Solicitor co-mortgagee — Foreclosure action — Profit costs — Sale of mortgaged property — Solicitor mortgagee's firm acting for mortgagees.

A solicitor mortgagee is not entitled, as against the mortgagor, to charge profit costs in respect of business relating to the mortgage transacted by the solicitor acting for himself and a co-mortgagee, or by a firm of solicitors of which he is a partner.

The rule established by Cradock v. Piper, 1 Mac. & G. 664—that where a solicitor or his firm appears in an action on behalf of himself and a co-trustee, and the expense has not thereby been increased, the solicitor is entitled to the usual costs—is not applicable to the costs of a solicitor mortgagee acting for himself and his co-mortgagees.

In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 33 W. R. Dig. 61, overruled.

F. (who was a solicitor) and A. were transferees of a mortgage created by D. D. died, and the transferees brought an action for administration of his estate, and obtained the usual administration judgment. Orders were subsequently made for the sale of the mortgaged property out of court, and that the purchase-money should be received by the plaintiffs, they undertaking to pay into court the balance after satisfying the mortgage debt. The sale took place, and the plaintiffs carried in for taxation two bills of costs delivered by the firm of F. & H., one for costs incurred upon the transfer of the mortgage, and the other for costs incurred in carrying out the sale. The taxing master disallowed all costs, except costs out of pocket, on the ground that F., one of the mortgagees, was a member of the firm of F. & H., by whom the costs were claimed. The business charged for was transacted exclusively by H. and the clerks of the firm. The plaintiffs took out a summons to review the taxation.

Held, by Stirling, J., that F. could not retain his share of the profit costs as against the estate of D., but that on principle there was nothing to prevent H. from receiving remuneration for his trouble, and the matter would, therefore, be remitted to the taxing master for re-consideration, with a direction to ascertain what would be properly chargeable against the estate of D. if an independent solicitor had been employed, and to allow such proportion of that amount as H. was entitled to in respect of the general profits of the partnership as between himself and F.

Two mortgagees, one of whom was a solicitor, brought an action for foreclosure, and obtained judgment. The mortgagees were represented in the action by the solicitor mortgagee. The taxing master disallowed as against the mortgagor all profit costs of the action.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that the taxing master was right, and that the costs were properly disallowed.

Two summonses to review the taxation of costs in the two above-named actions had been taken out before Stirling, J., and they raised substantially the same question, which was whether a solicitor mortgagee is entitled, as against the mortgagor, to charge profit costs in respect of business relating to the mortgage carried through by the solicitor acting for himself and a co-mortgagee, or by a firm of solicitors of which he is a partner.

In re DOODY, FISHER v. DOODY.

In the year 1858 George Doody, since deceased, borrowed £1,200 of one Liddle, on the security of a legal mortgage of real estate created by an indenture dated the 30th of March, 1858. In 1887 Liddle appears to have given notice to pay off the debt, and in consequence of such notice it was arranged that the mortgage should be transferred to the plaintiffs, Henry Fisher and John Hodgkins. Soon afterwards George Doody died, and this action was brought by the plaintiffs as creditors for administration of his estate, and the usual administration judgment was given. On the 30th of June, 1890, an order was made for the sale of the mortgaged property, and subsequently on the 19th of February, 1891, a further order was made directing that the sale should be concluded out of court, subject to a reserved price and the auctioneer's charges being approved by the judge, and that the purchase-money should be received by the plaintiffs, they undertaking to pay into court the balance of purchase-money, if any, after payment and satisfaction of the sum due to them on their mortgage, such sum to be certified. The sale had taken place, and the balance mentioned in the order was being ascertained. For that purpose the plaintiffs had carried in for taxation several bills of costs, and in particular two bills of costs due to Messrs. Fisher & Hodges, of Newport, solicitors, one bill being for costs alleged to have been incurred on the occasion of the transfer of the mortgage to the plaintiffs in 1887, the other being for costs alleged to have been incurred in carrying into effect the sale out of court sanctioned by the order of the 19th of February, 1891. In taxing these bills the master had disallowed all costs except costs out of pocket, on the ground that the plaintiff, Henry Fisher, one of the mortgagees, was also a member of the firm of Fisher & Hodges, to whom the costs were claimed to be due. It appeared from an affidavit, which had by special leave been filed since the matter was before the taxing master, that all the business charged for by Messrs. Fisher & Hodges in the bills in question was (with the exception of a small part transacted by the plaintiff Henry Fisher as steward of a manor) transacted solely and exclusively by Mr. Edward Hodges (the partner of Henry Fisher) and the clerks of the firm, and not by or through Henry Fisher personally, and that Heny Fisher acted throughout simply as mortgagee or transferee jointly with his co-plaintiff John Hodgkins.

The applicants took out a summons to review the taxation.

Hastings, Q.C., and Prior, for the applicants.—The cases of Clack v. Carlon, 9 W. R. 568; In re Wallis, 38 W. R. 482, 25 Q. B. D. 176; and Stone v. Lickorish & Bellord, 39 W. R. 331, [1891] 2 Ch. 363, are in point as showing the principle on which profit costs are not allowed to a solicitor mortgagee. But where one of two or more mortgagees is a solicitor there is no reason why he or his firm should not be employed to act on behalf of his co-mortgagees and charge profit costs. This case is governed by the case of In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 33 W. R. Dig. 61, in which it was held that one of two mortgagees, who was a solicitor and acted as such in enforcing the security, was entitled to profit costs against the mortgagor, whether the mortgagees were trustees or not. That decision has never been overruled. The taxing master in taxing the plaintiffs' costs has taxed in the usual way certain costs paid by the plaintiffs to Mr. Liddle, the solicitor to the original mortgagees in respect of his transfer to them, but these costs ought to be moderated and not so taxed: Allen v. Jarvis, 17 W. R. 943, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 616; In re Park, Cole v. Park, 37 W. R. 742, 41 Ch. D. 326. Profit costs ought to be allowed in the case of the sale, for it was practically court business: Cradock v. Piper, 1 Mac. & G. 664; In re Corsellis, 35 W. R. 309, 34 Ch. D. 675. It has never yet been decided that where a mortgagee or trustee who is a solicitor acts for himself and his co-mortgagees or co-trustees profit costs will be disallowed. [Micklem referred to Field v. Hopkins, 44 Ch. D. 524, 38 W. R. Dig. 134.] That case is not in point, for the principle there applied was that a mortgagee could not clog the redemption. Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, 3 Jur. N. S. 630, was decided on the footing that the solicitor mortgagee who was not allowed profit costs was a sole mortgagee.

Micklem, for the defendant Grace Street.—This case comes within the principle of In re Wallis and Stone v. Lickorish & Bellord, and the objection that in those cases the solicitor was a sole mortgagee is met by Field v. Hopkins, which shows that it makes no difference whether the solicitor mortgagee is acting for himself alone or for his co-mortgagees. A solicitor cannot charge profit costs for the preparation of a mortgage from his client to himself: In re Roberts, 38 W. R. 225, 43 Ch. D. 52. [STIRLING, J., referred to Wyatt v. Cook, W. N., 1868, p. 237, where Lord Cairns, L.C., decided that a mortgagee was not entitled to the costs of preparing the mortgage.] If a solicitor is not entitled to charge profit costs when he does the work, à fortiori he is not entitled when his clerk or some member of the firm does the work. In Clack v. Carlon there was an agreement between the solicitor and his firm that he should not have any share in the profit costs. The only difference between the present case and In re Wallis and Stone v. Lickorish & Bellord is that here one of the mortgagees is acting through his firm. The analogy of trustees holds good in the case of mortgagees, and the same principle applies to both cases: Christophers v. White, 10 Beav. 523. The case of In re Donaldson was not followed in the subsequent cases, and is inconsistent with Sclater v. Cottam. [STIRLING, J., referred to Matthison v. Clarke, 3 W. R. 2, 3 Drew. 3.] Cradock v. Piper introduced an anomalous rule in the case of solicitor trustees, and is confined to the costs of litigation. The principle of that case ought not to be extended, but Sclater v. Cottam ought to be followed.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—The National Provincial Bank of England v. Games, 34 W. R. 600, 31 Ch. D. 582, is a case in point on the subject of the mortgagee's costs in respect of the preparation of the mortgage. In Matthison v. Clarke the governing principle was that the mortgagee who sold the mortgaged property was a trustee of the surplus money for the mortgagor, but it does not apply here. The real point is whether the solicitor mortgagee did the work. If he did he cannot recover profit costs; if he did not, and that is all we have to prove, the bill is sent in to him and his colleagues, and ought to be paid. This is consistent with In re Wallis, and is not inconsistent with the other cases cited.

HIBBERT v. LLOYD.

This was a foreclosure action in which a judgment for foreclosure had been made.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. L. Hibbert and T. D. Bolton, were the mortgagees, and on taxing their costs of the action the master had disallowed all profit costs, on the ground that they had been and were represented in the action by one of themselves—viz., Mr. Bolton, who was a solicitor carrying on business under the name of "Bolton & Co."

The plaintiffs took out a summons to review the taxation.

Hastings, Q.C., and Methold, for the applicants.—The arguments in this case would be the same as the argument for the applicants in the previous case, and we do not, therefore, propose to repeat them.

Challis, for parties interested in the equity of redemption.—A solicitor mortgagee who appears for himself and a co-plaintiff is in the same position as if he appeared for himself alone, and is not entitled to profit costs. In Stone v. Lickorish & Bellord, Sclater v. Cottam, In re Taylor, 2 W. R. 249, 18 Beav. 165, and In re Donaldson the parties were treated throughout on the footing of trustees.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 9.—STIRLING, J.—These are summonses raising some questions of practical importance as to the taxation of costs of mortgagees where one of them happens to be a solicitor. The circumstances which give rise to the dispute are of common occurrence, and one would have expected to find the law well settled, but no authority has been found which precisely governs the cases which I have now to decide. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:—] The question is whether these decisions of the taxing master are in accordance with the law. In argument much reference was made to the analogies presented by the case of solicitor trustees, and, as this branch of the law has been more frequently the subject of reported decisions, it may be well to begin by considering how it stands. The general principle is stated clearly by Lord Cranworth, L.C., in Broughton v. Broughton, 3 W. R. 602, 5 De G. M. & G. 160. At p. 164 of the report he said:—"The rule applicable to the subject has been treated at the bar as if it were sufficiently enunciated by saying that a trustee shall not be able to make a profit of his trust, but that is not stating it so widely as it ought to be stated. The rule really is that no one who has a duty to perform shall place himself in a situation to have his interests conflicting with that duty; and a case for the application of the rule is that of a trustee himself doing acts which he might employ others to perform, and taking payment in some way for doing them. As the trustee might make the payment to others, this court says he shall not make it to himself; and it says the same in the case of agents, where they may employ others under them. The good sense of the rule is obvious, because it is one of the duties of a trustee to take care that no improper charges are made by persons employed for the estate. It has been often argued that a sufficient check is afforded by the power of taxing the charges, but the answer to this is that that check is not enough, and the creator of the trust has a right to have that and also the check of the trustee. The result, therefore, is that no person in whom fiduciary duties are vested shall make a profit of them by employing himself, because, in doing this, he cannot perform one part of his trust—namely, that of seeing that no improper charges are made. The general rule applies to a solicitor acting as a trustee, and the only question is, how far the circumstances of the present case take it out of this rule."

It therefore follows that, as a general rule, neither a solicitor trustee nor a firm of which the trustee is a member can receive out of the trust estate profit costs by way of remuneration for transacting legal business in connection with the trust. To this general rule there are some exceptions, to one of which I refer at once. It was decided by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, in Clack v. Carlon, that a solicitor trustee may employ his partner to act as solicitor for himself and his co-trustees with reference to the trust affairs, and may pay him the usual charges, provided that it has been expressly agreed between himself and his partner that he himself shall not participate in the profits or derive any benefits from the charges. Nothing short of this will be sufficient. In particular it was decided in Christophers v. White that the general rule applies, although all the business has been transacted by the partners of the solicitor trustee, and not by the trustee himself. Now it has been expressly decided that under some circumstances and to some extent solicitor mortgagees are subject to the same rules as solicitor trustees. In the case of Matthison v. Clarke, decided in 1854 by Kindersley, V.C., the head note is this:—"A mortgagee with power of sale was a member of a firm of auctioneers. The firm sold for him. Held, they were not entitled to their commission." And the Vice-Chancellor said, 3 Drew., at page 4, "It is a well-established rule in equity that a trustee cannot as against his cestui que trust make any profit out of the execution of the trusts in respect of the application and his personal trouble." The same principles appear to have been acted on by Lord Romilly in the case of In re Taylor, to which I shall refer in greater detail hereafter. It is plain, however, that the Vice-Chancellor did not consider that the law as to solicitor trustees is always applicable to solicitor mortgagees, for he says "a mortgagee, in his mere character of mortgagee, is not a trustee," and it is next to be inquired what is the rule which governs that case. It is to be found in the judgment of the same Vice-Chancellor in Sclater v. Cottam, where he says, "One principle is that the mortgagee is entitled, as between him and the mortgagor, to have taken into account in a suit to redeem him any costs which he has incurred in protecting his title to the mortgaged property. Another principle is that the mortgagee, though he may be entitled to certain expenses properly incurred in relation to the mortgaged property, as the expense of employing a collector, cannot himself charge for his own trouble." A little further on he says, "It is not the same as the case of a trustee being allowed his costs, but, upon the two principles put together, I think he is entitled to what he disbursed, but not to that which is the remuneration for his own personal trouble." It was therefore held that a solicitor mortgagee who had defended the title to the mortgaged property in two actions, in one of which he acted as solicitor for himself and co-mortgagee, and in the other for himself alone, was entitled to costs out of pocket only. In In re Roberts it was held by Kay, L.J., on the like principle, that a solicitor cannot charge his client with profit costs for the preparation of a mortgage from the client to himself. These decisions and the principle on which they are based were approved and applied by the Court of Appeal in In re Wallis. The costs relating to a transfer of a mortgage appear to me to fall, not within the decision in Matthison v. Clarke, but within that in In re Roberts, and if Mr Fisher had been sole mortgagee, and had had no practice, the application in the first of the cases before me, so far as it relates to the cost of the transfer, must have been held to be concluded against the applicants on authority.

It is, however, contended that a distinction ought to be made, first, because he is only one of two mortgagees, and, secondly, because he has a practice. As regards the first distinction, I think that, both on principle and on authority, it cannot prevail. The principle is that a solicitor mortgagee is not to receive remuneration for his own trouble, and it appears to me that it can make no difference in the application of that principle whether the trouble is taken by the solicitor on his own behalf solely, or on behalf of himself jointly with someone else. Moreover, the point is covered by the decision in Sclater v. Cottam; for there the Vice-Chancellor disallowed the profit costs of the solicitor in an action in which he appeared for a co-mortgagee as well as for himself. The second ground of distinction gives rise to greater difficulty. The rule, it is said, being simply that the solicitor mortgagee is not entitled to remuneration for his own trouble, what is there to prevent his partner from receiving remuneration for his trouble? In my opinion the rule does not prevent the partner from receiving remuneration, but the question immediately arises, What is the partner's remuneration to be? If the partners enter into an agreement that the mortgagee partner is not to share in the profits arising from the transaction, I should feel free to hold that the usual costs were to be allowed in full; in the absence of such an agreement it does not appear that this ought to be done. To make the point more simple I shall consider a case into which the element of partnership does not enter. Assume that a mortgagee solicitor employs another solicitor with whom he is not in partnership to transact the legal business connected with the mortgage, and that there is between them an agreement, such as actually existed in In re Taylor, that the work shall be done on agency terms, that is to say, that the profit costs are to be shared in defined proportions between the two solicitors. Can the solicitor mortgagee retain his share of the profit costs against the mortgagor? I think not. The rule is that the mortgagee solicitor is not to be remunerated for his own trouble; à fortiori, he cannot be allowed remuneration for the trouble of someone else. This was the decision of Lord Romilly in In re Taylor; but it is right to say that the costs in that case related to sales by the mortgagee under a power of sale, and consequently they fell within the decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Matthison v. Clarke. Now, if on taking the plaintiffs' accounts between Mr. Fisher and Mr. Hodges it turned out that a share of the profit costs was allowed to Mr. Fisher, and that he had actually got the benefit of that share in account, it would seem to me that he could not retain that benefit against the mortgagor. On the other hand, if the account shows that the mortgagee was indebted to his co-partner, the latter ought not to be deprived of so much of the costs as was required to be applied in satisfaction of the debt.

Now to make the taxation depend on the result of the taking of a partnership account would, as seems to me, simply be to introduce a rule unworkable in practice, and to push abstract principle to a point at which it ceases to give results consistent with justice; in short, to add another to the sufficiently numerous illustrations of the adage, Summum jus summa injuria. Two alternatives only appear to me open, either to allow the whole of the costs, just as if an independent solicitor had been employed, or else to allow the partner the same share of the profit costs in the specific matter as he is entitled to in the general profits of the partnership business. If the former course is adopted the mortgagor may be charged with a greater amount of costs than he ought to bear; if the latter, there is some danger of giving the mortgagee's partner less than his due. On the whole I come to the conclusion that the latter alternative gives a nearer approximation to what would be required by a strict regard to principle, and is therefore preferable: and I do so the more readily that I find upon inquiry that, although there is no established practice on the subject in the taxing master's office, this view has actually been taken and acted upon there. It was contended that the point had been decided the other way in In re Donaldson, and a closer examination of the report does appear to show that Mr. Donaldson, the mortgagee solicitor in that case, was a member of a firm of Brown & Donaldson. There is no allusion, however, to this fact in the argument or the judgments; and some at least of the observations in the judgments, as well as the decision itself, seem difficult to reconcile with the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in the subsequent case of In re Wallis, by which I am bound. Under these circumstances I cannot regard the case of In re Donaldson as governing the case of In re Doody.

I now return to the consideration of the rules which govern the rights of solicitor trustees. An exception to the general rule already stated was established by the case of Cradock v. Piper, decided in 1850 by Lord Cottenham. It is to this effect: that where a solicitor (or his firm) appears in a suit or action on behalf of himself and a co-trustee, and the expense has not thereby been increased, then the solicitor (or his firm, as the case may be) is entitled to the usual costs. The summons in Hibbert v. Lloyd raises the next question, whether a similar exception exists in the case of solicitor mortgagees. The ground of the decision appears at pp. 678-80 of the report. [His lordship referred to the report of Cradock v. Piper, and continued:—] The rule has been adversely criticized on more than one occasion—as, for example, by Lord Cranworth in Broughton v. Broughton (see pp. 164, 165 of the report)—but it has been acted upon ever since. It was recently considered by the Court of Appeal in In re Corsellis, Lawton v. Elwes, 34 Ch. D. 675. In that case Lindley, L.J., said, at p. 687: "I am not one of those who admire the decision in Cradock v. Piper. It is one of those cases which are anomalous, but which have laid down a certain rule, and that rule has been acted upon by everybody whom it concerns for so long a time that we cannot and ought not to vary it. It was a rule laid down by Lord Cottenham when Lord Chancellor in 1850, and it has been acted upon ever since by the taxing masters, and therefore we must accept it; but we must accept it as an anomalous rule applicable to the case to which it applies and which ought not to be extended. But although we ought not to extend the rule, it will not do to fritter it away." And Lopes, L.J., expresses himself to the same effect. With these expressions, if I may say so, I desire respectfully to express my concurrence.

I have thought it right to inquire whether the rule established in Cradock v. Piper has been applied to solicitor mortgagees by the taxing masters, and I have received the following certificate from the senior master, Mr. Buckley:—"In answer to your lordship's question I beg to certify that according to the practice of this office the principle of Cradock v. Piper is not applicable to the costs of a solicitor mortgagee acting for himself and his co-mortgagees. This practice is founded on the case of Sclater v. Cottam, which decides that under such circumstances the solicitor is entitled to costs only out of pocket, and this is confirmed by the recent cases of Stone v. Lickorish and In re Wallis."

Now the decision of Sclater v. Cottam is in point although it does not appear that Cradock v. Piper was called to the Vice-Chancellor's attention. Seeing, however, that that decision was given in 1857, and has been acted on uniformly by the taxing masters, and that the rule established by Cradock v. Piper is an anomaly, and is not to be extended, I think that it ought not to be applied in the case of solicitor mortgagees.

The result is that in In re Doody, Fisher v. Doody the summons will be allowed as regards both classes of items which I have mentioned, and the matter will be remitted to the taxing master for reconsideration, with a direction that he is to ascertain the amounts which would have been properly chargeable against the mortgagor if an independent solicitor had been employed, and to allow the same proportion of that amount as Mr. Hodges is entitled to in respect of the general profits of the partnership between himself and Mr. Fisher. The costs of both parties to the summons will be costs in the action.

In Hibbert v. Lloyd the summons will be dismissed, without costs.

From this decision the applicants in Hibbert v. Lloyd appealed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Methold, for the appellants.—The principle laid down by Lord Cottenham in Cradock v. Piper with respect to a solicitor trustee acting for himself and his co-trustee is equally applicable to a solicitor mortgagee acting for himself and his co-mortgagee. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Cradock v. Piper has repeatedly been adversely commented on, even in the House of Lords. It is an anomalous case. BOWEN, L.J.—Does not the rule that a trustee shall not make a profit out of his trust depend on the principle that a trustee should not place himself in a position in which his interest and his duty might conflict?] That is not the principle on which the rule that a mortgagee shall not make a profit out of the mortgaged estate rests; it rests on the principle that it is a matter of contract between the mortgagor and mortgagee what costs the mortgagee can charge. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—How do you get over the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Wallis as to a sole solicitor mortgagee? How does the fact that the solicitor mortgagee has a layman as co-mortgagee affect the principle of that decision?] We rely on the analogy of the rule applicable to a solicitor co-trustee: Cradock v. Piper. Again, in In re Donaldson the taxing master allowed a solicitor co-mortgagee to charge, as against the mortgagor, profit costs, and Bacon, V.C., upheld the taxing master. That case, therefore, shows that the view of the taxing master in the present case as to the practice in the office is not accurate, and the decision is exactly in point. The taxation must work out cheaper where the solicitor mortgagee acts himself.

Challis and Birrell, for the respondents, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J., said that a foreclosure decree had been obtained in an action brought by two mortgagees, one of whom was a solicitor, and he had acted in the proceedings on behalf of himself and his co-mortgagee. It was conceded that he was entitled, as against the mortgagor, to his costs out of pocket. He wanted to have his ordinary solicitor's costs, which, if allowed, would enable him to make a profit out of the persons who were entitled to the equity of redemption of the mortgaged property. Was that right? Take the simple case of a sole mortgagee who was a solicitor. It had been settled for years that such a mortgagee could only get, as against the mortgagor, his costs out of pocket, not because he was a trustee (for he was not), but because the bargain between him and the mortgagor was that the latter should be entitled to redeem the property on payment of principal, interest, and costs, and costs did not include profit costs. The result was therefore, in fact, the same as in the case of a trustee who was a solicitor, though it was arrived at on different grounds and by a different process. Did this rule apply when there were two mortgagees, one of whom was a solicitor? If it did not, the solicitor mortgagee would be making a profit out of the mortgagor. There was no authority that the rule did not apply to this case except the decision of Bacon, V.C., in In re Donaldson. But there had been a long course of practice in the taxing masters' office contrary to that decision, though the practice had not, perhaps, been as universal as his lordship at first supposed. The attention of the taxing masters may not have been always directed to the point. The recent decisions in Stone v. Lickorish and In re Wallis showed that the rule was that profit costs could not be allowed to a solicitor mortgagee. No doubt the decision of Bacon, V.C., in In re Donaldson was to the contrary, but his lordship thought that the learned Vice-Chancellor went a great deal too far. His decision was inconsistent with the principle of the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Wallis, and the reasoning on which that decision was founded.

Reliance had been placed by the appellants' counsel on the decision of Lord Chancellor Cottenham in Cradock v. Piper, in which he laid down the rule (whether for the first time his lordship did not know) that if there were two trustees, one of whom was a solicitor, the solicitor trustee acting for both in a litigation would be entitled to profit costs. His lordship thought he would not be going too far if he said that Lord Cottenham rather lost sight of the fact that it was the double position of trustee and solicitor occupied by the trustee that gave rise to the difficulty; and he certainly would not be going too far in saying that whenever this case had been since discussed the correctness of the decision had been doubted. It had, however, never been reversed by any court, but it had been treated as anomalous. It stood, and still stands, as an established rule, but it did not cover the case of a solicitor mortgagee. If its principle were sound the court ought to extend its application. But if, as seemed to be the better opinion, the principle were not sound, the court ought not to extend its application.

BOWEN, L.J., said he quite concurred, especially as regards the observations made by Lindley, L.J., on Cradock v. Piper which was an anomalous case, and ought not to be extended.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., also thought that the decision of Stirling, J., was right. In re Wallis expressly decided (as indeed had been previously decided) that a sole mortgagee solicitor could not get profit costs as against the mortgagor. His lordship did not in the least see why the mortgagee solicitor was any the more entitled to them because he had joined with him as co-mortgagee, a layman. He concurred in the remarks of the other Lords Justices as to Cradock v. Piper.

Appeal dismissed.

ONWARD BUILDING SOCIETY v. SMITHSON. (a.)

Deed—Estoppel—Sale—Mortgage—Fraud—Innocent misrepresentation—Covenant for title—Averment of legal estate.

By indenture of the 4th of December, 1875, the defendants, being seised in fee of certain real estate, conveyed a plot of ground, part thereof, to the use of T., his heirs and assigns, by way of sale. By indenture of the 25th of May, 1876, T. conveyed the plot by way of mortgage to the A. Society. By an indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, after reciting that the testator, of whose real estate the defendants were the trustees, being at the date of his will, and so continuing till the time of his death, seised in fee simple, free from incumbrances, of certain real estate, of which the plot thereby granted formed part, made his will, and thereby devised his real estate unto the defendants, their heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts, and also reciting that the testator died without having revoked or altered his will, and also reciting that the defendants, in exercise of a power in the will, had agreed with T. for the absolute sale to him of the plot of land and premises intended to be thereby granted, and the inheritance thereof, in fee simple in possession, free from incumbrances, at a certain price, and also reciting that H. S., one of the defendants, as beneficial owner of the plot of ground subject to the power of sale, had agreed to concur in the indenture, it was witnessed that the defendants did grant and convey, and the defendant H. S. did grant and confirm, the plot of ground unto and to the use of T., his heirs and assigns, for ever. The indenture contained a covenant that the defendants and the defendant H. S. respectively had not incumbered; and also a covenant that the defendant H. S., together with the defendants, had good right to convey. By an indenture of the 22nd of September, 1877, T. purported to convey the plot of ground and premises comprised in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, to the plaintiffs by way of mortgage to secure certain moneys. The plot of ground comprised in the indentures of the 4th of April, 1877, and the 22nd of September, 1877, was comprised in, and had been already conveyed by way of sale and by way of mortgage by, the indentures of the 4th of December, 1875, and the 25th of March, 1876, respectively. The indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, was innocently executed by the defendants at the request of T., who was employed by them in the development of the testator's estate, and who enjoyed their confidence, and upon a representation made by him, which they accepted in good faith, that the plot of ground had not already been sold. The plaintiffs innocently advanced their money upon the faith of the representations made through T. to them by the defendants in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877. In an action for breach of covenant for title, Held, that the statements as to title in the deed of the 4th of April, 1877, were not sufficiently precise to raise an estoppel against the defendants so as to prevent them from denying that in fact they had no title to convey, and from setting up the true facts.

Held, by Lindley, L.J., that the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs for the loss sustained by them on the mortgage of the 22nd of September, 1877, on the further grounds—(1) that the plaintiffs were in no better position as against the defendants than T., from whom they took the mortgage, and (2) that the misrepresentation of the defendants, by which the plaintiffs had been misled, was an innocent one.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Quære, whether, supposing there had been an estate created by estoppel as against the defendants, a plea of fraud would be well answered by the reply of purchase for value without notice.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The plaintiffs were a building society incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and were in course of winding up. By an indenture dated the 4th of April, 1877, and made between the defendants of the first part, the defendant Harry Sheldon Cradock Smithson of the second part, and Thomas Toward of the third part; after reciting that Samuel Smithson, being at the date of his will and so continuing till the time of his death seised in fee simple in possession free from incumbrances of an estate at Shilton, in the county of Durham, of which the plot of land thereby granted formed part, made his will dated the 7th of October, 1873, and thereby devised his real estate unto the defendants, their heirs and assigns, upon trust to stand seised thereof upon the trusts thereinafter declared, that was to say (after declaring certain trusts as to an estate at Dalnabrich, in the county of Perth) as to all the residue of his real estate in trust for the defendant H. S. C. Smithson, his heirs and assigns, if he should attain the age of twenty-one years, and also reciting that the testator empowered his trustees, in case his personal estate should be insufficient to pay all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, by mortgage, or sale, or otherwise, to raise any sum which his trustees should think fit in order to discharge such debts, expenses, and legacies, and also reciting that the testator died on the 5th of November, 1874, without having revoked or altered his will, which was proved as therein mentioned, and also reciting that the defendant H. S. C. Smithson attained twenty-one on the 26th of June, 1875, and also reciting that the defendants, in exercise of the power so as aforesaid contained in the will of the testator, had agreed with Thomas Toward for the absolute sale to him of the plot of land and premises thereinafter particularly described and intended to be thereby granted, and the inheritance thereof in fee simple in possession, free from incumbrances, at the price of £35 4s., and also reciting that the defendant H. S. C. Smithson, as beneficial owner of the real estate of the testator subject to the power of sale, had agreed to concur in the indenture now in statement, it was witnessed that, in pursuance of the contract and in consideration of the sum of £35 4s., the defendants, in exercise of the power, did grant and convey, and the defendant H. S. C. Smithson did grant and confirm, unto T. Toward and his heirs the plot of ground, messuage, and hereditaments therein particularly described, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said T. Toward, his heirs and assigns, for ever.

The indenture contained a covenant by each of the defendants with T. Toward, his heirs and assigns, that they, the defendants, respectively had not at any time done or executed, or knowingly suffered or been party or privy to any act, deed, or thing whereby the plot of land and premises thereby granted were, had been, or could or might have been incumbered. It also contained covenants by the defendant H. S. C. Smithson with T. Toward, his heirs and assigns, that (notwithstanding any act, deed, matter, or thing by him, the defendant H. S. C. Smithson, or any of his ancestors, or any person lawfully claiming through him or any of them, theretofore done, permitted, or known to the contrary) he the defendant H. S. C. Smithson, together with the defendants, had in themselves or himself good right, full power, and lawful and absolute authority to grant the purchased plot of ground and premises unto and to the use of T. Toward, his heirs and assigns, in manner therein expressed.

A receipt for the £35 4s. was indorsed on the indenture and signed by the defendants.

By an indenture dated the 22nd of September, 1877, and made between Thomas Toward of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part, the plot of ground, messuage, and hereditaments comprised in and expressed to be conveyed by the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, was granted and conveyed by Toward to the plaintiffs by way of mortgage for securing payment to the plaintiffs of the sum of £330 advanced by them to Toward, and the interest and other moneys in the indenture mentioned. Upon Toward being subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt the plaintiffs gave notice to the tenant of the premises comprised in the mortgage to pay the rent to them, whereupon it appeared that the premises were claimed by the Bishop of Auckland Building Society under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, which were then for the first time discovered by the plaintiffs.

By an indenture dated the 4th of December, 1875, and made between the same parties as were subsequently parties to the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, the premises afterwards expressed to be conveyed by the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, were with other hereditaments, part of the real estate of the testator, conveyed by the defendants as trustees, and by the defendant H. S. C. Smithson as beneficial owner, unto and to the use of Thomas Toward, his heirs and assigns.

By an indenture dated the 25th of May, 1876, and made between Thomas Toward of the one part and the Bishop Auckland Building Society of the other part, the whole of the premises comprised in the indenture of the 4th of December, 1875, were granted and conveyed by Thomas Toward to the Bishop Auckland Building Society by way of mortgage to secure the principal moneys and interest therein mentioned. The Bishop Auckland Building Society had, by virtue of the indentures last mentioned, entered into possession of the hereditaments comprised therein, including the hereditaments which Toward purported to mortgage by the indenture of the 22nd of September, 1877, to the plaintiffs.

There was owing to the plaintiffs on the security of their supposed mortgage the sum of £445, with a considerable arrear of interest.

Thomas Toward was, previously to the date of the indenture of the 22nd of September, 1877, a land agent and builder, and had been up to that time employed by the defendants for the purpose of superintending the development of the estate of the testator and of preparing plans from time to time on the sale to purchasers from the defendants of portions thereof, and had enjoyed the full confidence of the defendants.

The plaintiffs commenced this action against the defendants by direction of the judge of the county court of Durham in which the society was being wound up, alleging that they advanced the sum of £330 to Thomas Toward upon the faith that the representations made by the defendants in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, were true, and that at the date of that indenture the defendants had power to convey the premises comprised therein to Thomas Toward free from incumbrances.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that, by reason of the representations and covenants by and on the part of the defendants respectively in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, contained, the defendants were liable to make good to the plaintiffs the moneys advanced by them on the security of the indenture of the 22nd of September, 1877, together with interest from the date of the last payment of interest by Toward; and that the defendants might be ordered to make good such principal money and interest accordingly; or, in the alternative, damages for breach of the covenants.

The defendants in their defence alleged (and it was admitted by the plaintiffs) that the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, was innocently executed by them at the request of Toward and upon the faith of a representation made by him, and accepted as the truth in good faith and without question by the defendants, that the hereditaments comprised in and expressed to be conveyed by that indenture were parcel of the testator's estate and had not been sold, mortgaged, or otherwise incumbered by the defendants to or in favour of anyone.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, by way of damages for breach of the covenant on the part of the defendants contained in the indenture of the 4th of April, 1877, the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs on the security of the mortgage of the 22nd of September, 1877, or the value of the premises comprised in the mortgage security, whichever sum should be the smaller.

From that decision the defendants appealed.

Scott Fox, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs claim through Toward, and cannot stand in any better position than he did. A man cannot transfer an estate which he has not got—which was Toward's case—and, à fortiori, cannot transfer a right to sue on a covenant running with land which he has not got. The assignee of a covenant cannot sue the covenantor in a case where the assignor could not sue on the covenant: Doe d. Bullen v. Mills, 2 Ad. & El. 17, per Taunton, J., at p. 20: Taylor v. Needham, 2 Taunt. 278. A covenant does not act as an estoppel; it is either good, or bad, on which the covenantor may be sued for breach, but it creates no estoppel (see per Jessel, M.R., in General Finance, Mortgage, and Discount Co. v. Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society, 27 W. R. 210, 10 Ch. D. 15). The defendants are not liable for the misrepresentation made through Toward to the plaintiffs, for it was an innocent one. If Toward had an estate by estoppel (which he had not) he could not possibly be in a better position than if he had had an estate at law or in equity, in neither of which cases would he have been able to give his assignee more than he himself had.

He also cited Frowike & Kingsmill's case, Keilw. 21 Hen. 7, fo. 70, p. 6; Thoroughgood's case, 2 Co. Rep. 9*a*; Coke upon Littleton, l. 1, c. 1, s. 1, 3*b*; Henry Pigot's case, 11 Co. Rep. 27; and Foster v. Mackinnon, 17 W. R. 1105, L. R. 4 C. P. 704; and referred to Lainson v. Tremere, 1 Ad. & El. 792, and Cuthbertson v. Irving, 4 H. & N. 742, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 35, 6 H. & N. 135.

Warmington, Q.C., and Warrington, for the respondents.—We allow that Toward could not have successfully sued the defendants because of his fraud. But the deed was not void, only voidable. The defendants were not misled as to the contents of the deed, but only as to their having authority or power to make the grant, and those are two different things. The fraud does not arise from the deed itself, but from something collateral to it. [BOWEN, L.J.—The assignee of a contract obtained by fraud cannot sue on the contract.] Yes, but the plaintiffs are not assignees of the covenant; they are assignees of the estate to which the covenant is incident, and so they are not bound by the equities of their predecessor; there is no assignment of the covenants, they run with the land. The deeds show a good title in the plaintiffs; therefore, if the plaintiffs are to be set aside, it must be by means of something dehors the deeds. The defendants are estopped, as between themselves and every person who may innocently acquire the estate, from saying they had not a title to convey. It is true that in fact no estate passed from the defendants to Toward, but they are estopped from saying so. In an action by an assignee of land on a covenant which runs with the land, fraud on the part of the original grantee is no defence on behalf of the original grantor unless it is such fraud as will support a plea of non est factum. The question really is whether the deed was a good deed or not. This deed was not void: see per James, L.J., in Hunter v. Walters, 26 W. R. 218, at p. 219, L. R. 7 Ch. 75, at p. 84, referring to Kennedy v. Green, 3 My. & K. 699; Vorley v. Cook, 1 Giff. 230, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 43; and Edwards v. Brown, 1 Cromp. & J. 307. [BOWEN, L.J.—All fraud does not make a deed void; it must be such fraud as makes the mind of the person executing it a non-assenting mind.] The assignee of a covenant sues upon it to the same extent as if he were the original covenantee.

They also referred to Foster v. Mackinnon and Cuthbertson v. Irving.

Scott Fox, in reply.—The plaintiffs must show that the assignee of a covenant can sue on it when the assignor could not; and they have not done that. (1) The deed non est factum. (2) But if it was a good deed, it was voidable. (3) There is no estoppel: Hayne v. Maltby, 3 Term Rep. 438; General Finance, &c., Co. v. Liberator, &c., Building Society; Heath v. Crealock, 23 W. R. 95, L. R. 10 Ch. 22; Right d. Jefferys v. Bucknell, 2 Barn. & Ad. 278. (4) If there is estoppel, both sides are estopped; the plaintiffs cannot say both "You are estopped from saying no estate passed" and also "You have committed a breach of covenant because no estate passed"; they cannot set up both estoppel and the truth: Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is by no means an easy case, and before I proceed to deal with it I must express my sense of the very great assistance which Mr. Fox has given us by the very able manner in which he has argued it. To turn to the case—Toward cheated the plaintiffs and the defendants as well. The plaintiffs lost their money, which they had advanced to Toward, and now they say to the defendants "Pay us the money we have lost," and they are suing them for damages. Why should the defendants indemnify the plaintiffs for that loss? The short facts are these: The defendants are trustees of the real estate of the testator. For the purposes of the development of the estate and selling plots of it they employed Toward. They conveyed to Toward as a purchaser the plot of land in question in fee: that transaction was a perfectly honest transaction. Then Toward mortgaged the land he had purchased to the Bishop Auckland Building Society: that transaction also was perfectly honest. Then Toward cheated the defendants, by a trick getting from them a second conveyance of the land over again, and that enabled him to cheat someone else—namely, the plaintiffs, which he did.

Now how do the plaintiffs put the case as against the defendants? They claim through Toward. Have they any better right to relief than Toward had? I doubt it. They say they have on the ground of estoppel. Leaving aside for the moment the question of estoppel, let us see what the plaintiffs have. They have under their conveyance from Toward all that Toward had to give—that is, an equity of redemption merely. That is what he had; the land was his subject to the mortgage to the Bishop Auckland Society. As assignees of that equity of redemption the plaintiffs have no claim against the defendants, so they cannot rely upon that. They have nothing upon which to sue the defendants except the representation made through Toward to them that they, the defendants, had power to convey. But that was not a fraudulent misrepresentation, so that will not avail them. But they say to the defendants "You are estopped by your deed from denying that Toward had the estate from you," and then they say that, as incident to the estate by estoppel which they say they have got, they have the right to sue the defendants on their covenants for title. Is that so? Toward had no estate by estoppel. As between Toward and the defendants the deed was not, I think, void. The evidence does not come up to this, that there was any mistake as to the contents of the document which the defendants executed. They knew what they did, but they were induced to execute the deed by the fraud and misrepresentation of Toward. The plea of non est factum cannot be supported on behalf of the defendants, but in an action by Toward against them they would have a complete defence on the ground of fraud. I am inclined to think that the plaintiffs are in no better position than Toward for this purpose. I do not recollect any case at law in which a replication of purchase for value without notice has been held a good answer to a plea of fraud. But we are not considering the case of the plaintiffs being attacked. Is there any estoppel at all? The plaintiffs' case is that they have got something by estoppel. It is said that there is something in the deed which prevents the defendants denying that the plaintiffs have got something. I need only refer to the cases of General Finance, Mortgage, and Discount Co. v. Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society, Heath v. Crealock, and Right d. Jefferys v. Bucknell, which have all been cited in support of the defendants' contention that there is no estoppel here. In my opinion the terms of this deed are not precise enough to create an estoppel. It is not desirable to extend the doctrine of estoppel by getting out of words a meaning which they need not bear. That doctrine is one of evidence, which precludes a man from setting up the truth. If it is a question of truth, the plaintiffs' case fails. This deed does not, in my judgment, go far enough to prevent the defendants setting up the truth. The case, then, fails for three reasons: Firstly, because the plaintiffs are in no better position than Toward; secondly, because there is no estoppel; thirdly, because the defendants' misrepresentation was an innocent one.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree that the judgment of the court below must be reversed. The defendants are sued on a covenant for title. If this was a question of an ordinary covenant it is clear to my mind that the plaintiffs would take no more than Toward had, subject to any equities that might exist. It is said that this was not a void deed, only voidable; and that, I think, is correct. Then it is said there was an estoppel created. I think the case can best be decided on the ground that there is no estoppel. Estoppels by deed are not created by language except it is express. So we must look to see what the statements in the deed are which it was intended the defendants should be bound by. To be estoppels they must be perfectly clear. Recitals act as estoppels only to that extent. It is a fundamental rule that estoppels must be clear. Where, then, in this deed is there any statement that at the time of the execution of it the grantors were seised in fee? There is none. It will not be sufficient in order to create an estoppel to say that the grantor is "legally or equitably entitled": Right d. Jefferys v. Bucknell. I am quite satisfied that in this case there is no estoppel, and on that ground the case fails.

I leave open the question whether, supposing there were an estate created by estoppel, a bonâ fide purchaser for value could take advantage of the fraud under which the defendants acted; it is not necessary to settle that for the decision of this case, according to the view I take.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree that the appeal should be allowed. Mr. Warmington has satisfied me that the defendants could not here shield themselves under the defence of non est factum. But, in my opinion, they can defend themselves on the ground of no estoppel. The statements in the deed are not sufficiently precise to create estoppel. It is not stated that the defendants were owners in fee, and an inference will not do to raise an estoppel; the statement must be precise. I think there was no estoppel.

Appeal allowed.

DUCK v. MAYEU. (a.)

Tort—Joint tortfeasors—Discharge of one from liability—Right to claim against the other—Covenant not to sue—Release.

A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release so as to discharge the other.

An agreement to accept a sum of money from one of two joint tortfeasors in full discharge of his liability, without prejudice to the right to claim against the other, ought to be construed, not as a release, but as a covenant not to sue.

Appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Day, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15 by the owner of the right of representation of a dramatic piece called "Our Boys" to recover a penalty of forty shillings from the defendant for representing the piece or causing it to be represented without the plaintiff's consent.

The defendant, Miss Mayeu, who was an actress, and was in the habit of managing stage performances, was engaged by a clergyman named Wills to give a performance of "Our Boys" at the Town Hall, Wandsworth, for the benefit of a charity.

The defendant applied to the plaintiff's agent for leave to give the performance, and was told that the plaintiff's fee for granting a licence was one guinea. The performance, however, took place without the payment of any fee or the granting of any licence. The defendant herself took part in the performance. A claim was then made on behalf of the plaintiff on Mr. Wills and the defendant for the payment of five guineas in respect of the performance. At first they declined to pay, but ultimately Mr. Wills sent two guineas to the plaintiff's solicitor, and received from him a letter as follows:—"10th April, 1891. Dear Sir,—'Our Boys.' I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 9th, with cheque for £2 2s. inclosed, in respect of fee and costs, in full discharge of your personal liability in connection with Miss Marie Mayeu's performance of above at Wandsworth Town Hall on the 23rd of January, 1891. This is, of course, without prejudice to my client's claim against Miss M. Mayeu. —Yours faithfully, W. M. TILSON."

The plaintiff then commenced this action against Miss Mayeu.

Section 2 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15 provides that, if any person shall represent or cause to be represented any dramatic piece without the consent in writing of the proprietor of the right of representation, "every such offender shall be liable for each and every such representation to the payment of an amount not less than forty shillings, or to the full amount of the benefit or advantage arising from such representation, or the injury or loss sustained by the plaintiff therefrom, whichever shall be the greater damages."

Day, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for 40s.

J. Brook Little, for the defendant.—This must be treated as a case of a joint trespass, for it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature that each of a number of persons who have taken part in a performance without the proprietor's consent should be held liable consecutively. It is a rule of common law that a release of one of several joint trespassers operates as a discharge of the other, a release having the same effect in this respect as a judgment: Cocke v. Jennor, Hob. 66; Brinsmead v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 784, L. R. 7 C. P. 547. The letter of the plaintiff's solicitor was a release to Mr. Wills. The effect of it is that the plaintiff is precluded from suing Mr. Wills. There is nothing in the wording of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15 to prevent the common law rule from applying to a case of a joint infringement of a right given by the Act.

He also cited Dufresne v. Hutchinson, 3 Taunt. 117.

Morton Smith, for the plaintiff.—This is not a case of joint trespass; the cause of action against the defendant is different from the cause of action against Mr. Wills. But in any case the letter from the plaintiff's solicitor to Mr. Wills cannot be held to operate as a release so as to discharge the defendant from liability. It merely amounted to an undertaking not to sue Mr. Wills, which is a different thing from a release: Hutton v. Eyre, 6 Taunt. 289; Mayor, &c., of Salford v. Lever, 39 W. R. 85, [1891] 1 Q. B. 168; Willis v. De Castro, 6 W. R. 500, 4 C. B. N. S. 216.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) was delivered by

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first point for determination is whether the defendant has established her defence, that the plaintiff had released her joint tortfeasor, the Rev. Mr. Wills, from a joint cause of action, so as to release her therefrom, or whether what she has established is merely that the plaintiff had covenanted not to sue Mr. Wills.

It is, we think, clear law that a release granted to one joint tortfeasor, or to one joint debtor, operates as a discharge of the other joint tortfeasor, or the other joint debtor, the reason being that the cause of action, which is one and indivisible, having been released, all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released. The case of Cocke v. Jennor is distinct upon the point, and there are many subsequent cases to the same effect.

It has also been held that a covenant not to sue one of two joint debtors does not operate as a release to the other joint debtor (Hutton v. Eyre), the reason being that the joint action is still alive. We have found no case in which it has been held that a covenant not to sue releases a joint tortfeasor; and in our judgment the principle upon which it has been held that such a covenant does not release a joint debtor applies to the case of a joint tortfeasor.

The question, then, is, does the document of April 10, 1891, operate as a release of the joint cause of action against Mr. Wills and the defendant, or only as a covenant not to sue Mr. Wills? It is as follows: "April 10, 1891. Dear Sir,—'Our Boys.' I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 9th, with cheque for £2 2s. inclosed, in respect of fee and costs, in full discharge of your personal liability in connection with Miss Mayeu's performance of above at Wandsworth Town Hall on January 23, 1891. This is, of course, without prejudice to my client's claim against Miss M. Mayeu.—Yours faithfully, W. M. TILSON."

Tilson was solicitor for the plaintiff. A rule of construction for such a document was laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Price v. Barker, 4 E. & B. 760, at p. 777, 3 W. R. C. L. Dig. 206, where it was held that, in determining whether the document be a release or a covenant not to sue, the intention of the parties was to be carried out, and, if it were clear that the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved, inasmuch as such right would not be preserved if the document were held to be a release, the proper construction, where this was sought to be done, was that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release. In the case of Bateson v. Gosling, 20 W. R. 98, L. R. 7 C. P. 9, at nisi prius, the same canon of construction was applied, and it was held that, the release being, as it was, limited by a proviso reserving rights against the surety, it must be taken that it was a covenant not to sue, and not a release; and this ruling was unanimously upheld by the Court of Common Pleas.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the document of April 10, 1891, is a covenant not to sue, and is not a release of the joint cause of action, and that the defendant's defence fails in fact.

It is unnecessary to consider the true construction of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15.

In our judgment this appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Kay, L.JJ.) — July 5, 1892.

PRICE (Appellant) v. JAMES (Respondent). (a.)

Licensing law—Application for renewal—Notice of intention to oppose—Temporary authority—"Licensed person"—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42—5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14—Special case stated by licensing justices—Respondent—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

The occupier of certain licensed premises being about to leave them, the appellant obtained a temporary authority under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, to carry on the business until the next special session for transfer of licences Such session and the general annual licensing meeting being held simultaneously, the appellant applied for a transfer of the licence under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, and also for a renewal of the licence. Both applications were refused by the justices, because the appellant did not produce satisfactory evidence of good character. Notice of intention to oppose the renewal of the licence had been served on the former occupier, but not upon the appellant.

Held, that the appellant was not a "licensed person" applying for a renewal of "his licence" within the meaning of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and, therefore, was not entitled to notice of opposition to the renewal of the licence.

The superintendent of police of the division appeared to oppose the licence before the justices, and notice in writing of the appeal was given him by the appellant in accordance with 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

Held, that, the case being stated under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the superintendent of police was rightly made respondent.

Appeal of Price from an order of a divisional court (Wright and Collins, JJ.) affirming the refusal of the licensing justices of the Pontypool division of Monmouthshire to renew a licence, on a case stated by the justices under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The special case stated the following facts:—On the 18th of April, 1891, Mason, the holder of a licence for a beerhouse in Pontypool, called the Britannia Inn, which had been licensed as a beerhouse from a date prior to the 1st of May, 1869, was convicted before two justices in petty sessions for permitting gaming on his premises, and his licence was indorsed.

On the 20th of June, 1891, Mason obtained a temporary authority, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 41, s. 1, for the appellant to carry on the business until the next special transfer sessions, which would be held on the 22nd of August. Mason gave no notice of his intention to apply for a transfer of the licence to the appellant as required by section 40, sub-section (2), of the Licensing Act, 1872. At the general annual licensing meeting held on the 22nd of August, 1891, which was also a day appointed for the holding of special sessions for the transfer of licences, the appellant applied for a transfer or continuance of the existing licence of the Britannia Inn under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, until the expiration of the licensing year on the 10th of October, 1891. The application was opposed by the respondent, who was a superintendent of police for the district. The justices refused the application. The appellant then applied for a renewal of the existing licence held by Mason from the 10th of October, 1891, to the 10th of October, 1892. The respondent opposed the application, and it was refused by the justices, on the ground that the appellant had failed to produce satisfactory evidence of good character, and that the appellant was not the holder of the licence. No notice of objection had been given to the appellant, but notice was given to Mason, the holder of the existing licence.

The question for the court was whether the appellant was entitled to notice of objection under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the justices.

The case also raised a question with regard to the appellant's application for a transfer of the licence, but counsel for the appellant admitted that they could not argue against the justices' decision on that point.

Jelf, Q.C., and Paterson (Glascodine with them), for the appellant.—The appellant was entitled to have notice of objection under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for he was at the time of the licensing sessions a licensed person within that section by reason of the temporary authority which had been granted him under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, and the proviso at the end of that section shows that the position of persons under that section is to be the same as that of a licensed person. Even if the appellant is not, strictly speaking, a licensed person within section 42, Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638, and Reg. v. Powell, 39 W. R. 574, 630, [1891] 2 Q. B. 693, show that there may be the renewal of a licence which is not held by the applicant. Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool was a case under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, which only gives power to grant licences, not to renew them, and in that case it was held that an occupier not holding a licence was entitled to renewal. [They also referred to Reg. v. Thomas, 40 W. R. 478, [1892] 1 Q. B. 426.] Secondly, the superintendent of police is not the proper respondent. This is a case stated by licensing justices under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and the justices ought to have been the respondents.

Poland, Q.C., and W. Daniell, for the respondent, on the last point only.—Though the case is stated under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the procedure is to be as provided by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, which says that "the other party to the proceeding" shall be the respondent. The justices rightly considered that the superintendent of police, who was opposing the renewal, was the other party. The justices themselves are not parties to the proceedings. It is the common practice in such cases for the superintendent of police to appear and oppose the licence.

Paterson replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a person named Mason, who was the occupier of the premises and the holder of the licence, left the premises, and the appellant became the occupier of the house by arrangement with him. At the annual licensing meeting the appellant made two independent applications to the justices. His first application was made under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, that Mason's licence should be transferred to him. I may here observe that the term "renewal" used in the judgment in Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool with reference to this section appears to me not an inapt expression to use in speaking of an application for the continuance to the occupier of premises of the licence held by a former occupier, though possibly it would have been more accurate to have spoken of a "grant," which is the word used in the section. I do not agree that the decision in Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool made any alteration in the established law and practice on this subject. The magistrates had authority to hear and deal with that application of the appellant as they thought right. They did entertain the application, but it failed, because the appellant did not produce the necessary vouchers of character. The appellant then fell back on his second application, which was for a renewal of the licence to him under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872. What licence could the appellant have renewed under that section? He could not get a renewal of Mason's licence, but only of a licence which he himself might hold. The section is as clear as possible. It says, "Where a licensed person applies for the renewal of 'his' licence." Therefore the very first thing the appellant had to do in order to give the magistrates jurisdiction was to show that he was "a licensed person," and until he had proved that the magistrates could not entertain the application. In my opinion, however, he had no licence, and therefore he could not ask to have it renewed. But it was argued that, although he had not a licence, yet he held, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, what was equivalent to a licence within the meaning of section 42. If you read that section it is apparent that what is given there is not a licence at all, but is quite distinct from a licence. The section provides that under certain circumstances a person may be authorized to use, exercise, and carry on the business of licensed victualler, and the authority so granted is to be in force only till the next ensuing special sessions for the transfer of licences. That is not a licence in the sense in which the word is used in the Licensing Acts; it is not granted at the licensing sessions, and only lasts until the next licensing sessions. The person who holds this temporary authority may apply for a licence when the licensing day arrives, and that was the appellant's first application in this case which was properly adjudicated on.

As to the appellant's second application under section 42 of the Act of 1872, the moment the magistrates ascertained that the appellant held no license at all they were bound to say that they could not entertain his application. The cases, Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool and Reg. v. Powell, which were relied on in the argument for the appellant are not in point here. I think the decision of the justices was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

On the question as to whether the chief constable was the proper person to be made respondent in this case, I think that he was. It has always been the practice for the magistrate to allow any person interested in the welfare of a neighbourhood to object before the magistrates to the granting of a licence, and if a case is stated, that person would be properly made respondent if he chose, and, if unsuccessful, would be liable to pay the costs.

In this case the chief constable, who is generally the person who makes objections, was rightly made the respondent.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant's first application was made under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and the effect, if he had been successful, would have been to enable the appellant to continue in Mason's shoes, by virtue of a grant of a licence. It is immaterial in this case to say whether it would have operated as a renewal or a transfer, because the magistrates refused it. The appellant then fell back on his second application, which was an application by a licensed person for the renewal of his licence under section 42 of the Act of 1872. His object was to escape from the objections which had been made to his first application. If he could show that he was asking for a renewal of his licence, then, no notice of objection having been served upon him, he would come within sub-section 2 of section 42, which says that no objection to the renewal of any licence shall be entertained unless notice of objection has been served on the holder of the licence. The magistrates, however, came to the decision that he was not within section 42, and was not applying for a renewal of a licence of his own. As a matter of fact he simply held a temporary authority to carry on the business which he had obtained a short time before, and which lasted until the holding of the special sessions.

It is obvious that this appeal must fail unless the appellant can satisfy us that he was a "licensed" person applying for a renewal of "his" licence. In the first place it was contended that the appellant's second application was for the "renewal" of a licence. I am doubtful whether that was so. Then we were asked to consider the case of Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool and other cases in which applications under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, had been spoken of by the courts as applications for transfer or renewal of licences. Upon the authority of those cases it was said that this was an application for the renewal of a licence because it was an application for the grant of a licence by an occupier of premises which had been previously licensed. This argument is of no avail unless it can be shown that the appellant was "a licensed person" applying for the renewal of "his" licence within section 42. In my opinion that was not the case, for by the Act of 1872 a licence is defined as a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors granted by justices in pursuance of the Intoxicating Liquors Licensing Act, 1828, &c. The appellant was not holding a licence of that sort. He had only got a temporary authority to carry on the business under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1. It was argued that he was a licensed person because of certain obligations thrown on him by the proviso of that section, and because otherwise he would come within the penal enactment in section 3 of the Act of 1872. The answer to that argument is to be found in the section which confers the temporary authority. The person who receives a temporary authority is entitled to carry on the business of a licensed victualler on the premises, and becomes a licensed person so far as is necessary to prevent him being liable to the penalties laid down by section 3 of the Act of 1872. But section 1 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44 draws a broad line between the rights and the liabilities of the holder of a temporary authority. He has imposed upon him all the duties and obligations of a licensed person, but he does not become a licensed person: he does not obtain a licensed person's rights or his licence. Further, in order to come within section 42 the appellant must show that he is applying for the renewal of "his" licence. We were told that the word "his" is unimportant, and must be construed as if it was "a." In my opinion the word "his" in that section is important, for the object of the section is to relieve a person applying for the renewal of his licence from certain obligations which were in such a case thought to be oppressive, but it does not follow that the same considerations would apply to the application for the renewal of "a" licence. In some sections of the Act, for example in the interpretation clause, the expression "renewal of a licence" is used as meaning a licence granted by way of renewal; but in this section it is confined to cases where a man is applying for the renewal of his own licence. Therefore that argument on the behalf of the appellant fails.

As to the question whether the proper person has been made respondent, it would be remarkable if there were to be a special case and no one could be made respondent. It is obvious that the justices who state the case ought not to be the respondents. In my opinion any person who is interested in the matter and has been heard before the justices may be made a respondent, and that was the case with the superintendent of police, who is respondent in this case. The case is stated under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, with which the provisions of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 43 are incorporated, and although under that Act proceedings were between complainants on one side and accused persons on the other, nevertheless under the Summary Jurisdiction Act there must be a respondent, and the respondent would be the other party to the proceedings, who in this case was the superintendent of police.

For these reasons I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant's application for a renewal of the licence formerly held by Mason was refused by the justices, and it is contended that that refusal was wrong because the appellant had no notice of objection under section 42, sub-section (2), of the Licensing Act, 1872, and therefore it is said the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the objection. In my opinion section 42 does not apply to this case. The appellant never had a licence unless the temporary authority, as it is called, which was granted to him under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, amounted to a licence, and I think it is clear that it did not. That temporary authority is distinguished from what is in the same statute called a licence. One answer to this proposition would be that if the temporary authority is a licence, then there would be two licences in existence in respect of the same premises at the same time. Therefore the appellant was not a licence-holder within section 42, and was not entitled to notice of objection. As to the cases of Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool and Reg. v. Powell, they do not affect this case. All that the first of those cases decided was that the person in occupation of the premises at the time of the general licensing sessions was within 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, and was entitled to apply for the grant of a licence to himself from the expiration of the existing licence, which might for the purpose of the argument in that case be called a renewal of a licence, that is to say, a renewal of the previously existing licence. Reg. v. Powell followed Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, but decided that the occupier of premises who had obtained a licence under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, at a special transfer session, and who had not applied for a renewal of the licence, was not entitled after the expiration of the licence to obtain a grant of a licence at another special transfer session.

I entirely agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J., on the question as to the proper person to be made respondent.

In re GREY.

GREY v. EARL OF STAMFORD. (a.)

Will—Specific devise of English real estate—Children—Child legitimated by subsequent marriage—Domicil—Foreign law.

The testator specifically devised a share of real estate, and also a share of personalty, to trustees upon trust for his son, Harry Grey, for life, and then for his children. Harry Grey, who afterwards became Earl of Stamford, acquired a domicil at the Cape of Good Hope, and died there, leaving one son, John, born before marriage, and other children born in wedlock. According to the law of the Cape, John was legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his father and mother.

Held (following the cases of In re Goodman's Trusts, 29 W. R. 586, 17 Ch. D. 266, and Andros v. Andros, 32 W. R. 30, 24 Ch. D. 637), that John Grey was entitled to share in the personalty, and that the rule laid down in Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 2 Cl. & Fin. 57, 7 Cl. & Fin. 895, that an ante natus son could not inherit English land, related only to the descent of land on an intestacy, and did not affect the case of a devise to children, and that John was, consequently, entitled to share in the specific devise of real estate.

Originating summons.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Rev. Harry Grey, by his will, dated the 10th of April, 1847, gave, devised, and bequeathed "all that my messuage, farm, and lands called Great Heatley Heath Farm, in the parish of Lynn, in the county of Chester, with all the rights and appurtenances thereto belonging, subject to, and charged nevertheless with, a certain mortgage debt of £4,000 now secured thereon, together with the interest thereof, if any, which shall be due at the time of my decease unto my seven children," by name, including Harry Grey, "their heirs and assigns, equally to be divided between them as tenants in common." The testator gave the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, conversion, and investment, and "to pay and divide all the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities in equal shares between and amongst all and every my present and future born children and child who, being a son or sons, shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, shall respectively attain that age or be married under that age with the consent of the trustees for the time being acting in the execution of this my will; the same shares to be paid or transferred to or for the benefit of my said sons and daughters respectively at the respective times aforesaid."

On the 5th of September, 1848, the testator made a codicil to his will, and it was on the words of that codicil that the question in dispute arose. He directed that "as to the share of my property bequeathed by my will to my eldest son Harry, I vary the bequest thereof as follows: First, I declare that the word share in this codicil shall be understood to mean all real and personal property which my said son may at any time after my decease be entitled to claim or receive under my will. I hereby direct my executors forthwith to transfer the share of my said son Harry to the Rev. T. G. Clerk, Vicar of Woodmancote, Hampshire, and my son George Grey, who shall stand possessed of the same upon the following trusts—namely," for investment and for his son Harry during his life, and after his death and subject to an annuity to his widow "in trust for all his children, to be paid to them respectively when and as they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, and to be divided between them in equal shares, the class of children to include those born after my decease as well as those born previously, their shares to vest at the expiration of six months after the decease of my said son."

By a subsequent codicil the testator revoked the gift of an annuity to Harry Grey's widow, but did not otherwise alter the will or first codicil.

The testator died on the 26th of March, 1860.

Harry Grey went to the Cape of Good Hope in 1856, and resided there till his death, on the 19th of June, 1890, having, as his lordship held on another branch of the case, acquired a domicil in that country. In 1883 he succeeded to the Earldom of Stamford. He had married three times, but by his first two wives he had had no issue. By his third wife, whom he had married in 1880, he had had a son, John Grey, born in 1877, and other children born since the marriage.

According to the Roman Dutch law of the Cape, John Grey was legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his father and mother.

The question which arose upon this summons was whether John Grey ought to be included in the class of "children" of Harry Grey so as to take a share of the real estate specifically divided, and the proceeds of sale of real estate and the personalty.

Buckley, Q.C., and A. Young, for Lady Mary Grey, daughter of the Earl of Stamford, and born after marriage.—John Grey is not entitled to a share of the real estate. As his father was domiciled at the Cape and subsequently married his mother he is legitimated by the law of the country, and under ordinary circumstances would have a right to share in the personalty: Boyes v. Bedale, 12 W. R. 232, 1 H. & M. 798; In re Goodman's Trusts, 29 W. R. 586, 17 Ch. D. 266. That rule, however, does not apply to real estate, for to share in it a child must be legitimate according to the law of England: Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, 7 Cl. & Fin. 895. Although that case had reference to the right to inherit land where there was an intestacy, the principle applies to land specifically devised. The will must consequently be read as if it contained a declaration that the real estate was to go to children legitimate according to the law of England; and so, the word "children" having been already construed in a particular way, the same construction must be applied to the bequest of personalty instead of the ordinary rule, and as, under these circumstances, John Grey does not come within the description of "children," he takes nothing at all under the will.

Hastings, Q.C., and Rolt, for John Grey.—The rule with regard to personalty is well settled, that children means children legitimate by the law of the domicil, and it cannot be set aside in the way suggested. We are clearly entitled to a share, and as we agree that the word "children" must receive the same construction throughout the will we are also entitled to a share of the real estate. The ratio decidendi of the cases cited is applicable to a specific devise of land as well as to a bequest of personalty: Skottowe v. Young, 19 W. R. 583, L. R. 11 Eq. 474. Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill deals only with the case of descent on an intestacy. Where personalty is concerned the court can look at the law of the domicil to ascertain the class who are to take as children. The testator can never have intended that, merely because he had real estate as well, that class was to be cut down to children legitimate according to the law of England.

F. Mackarness, for the executors of Lord Stamford's will.

STIRLING, J.—The question I have now to dispose of arises in this way. [His lordship referred to the will and codicil and continued:] The question arises on the meaning of the word "children" in the codicil. I have held that Harry Grey, otherwise Earl of Stamford, became domiciled at the Cape of Good Hope. By a lady whom he married there he had a son born before marriage, and the question is whether he is to be included in the "children," the evidence being that by the law of the Cape of Good Hope he was legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents. The question has been considered in several cases of late years. Amongst others I will refer to Andros v. Andros. [His lordship read the headnote to that case, and proceeded:] Kay, J., went through all the authorities, and that fact renders an examination of them by me unnecessary, and the ratio decidendi appears from the following passage in 24 Ch. D., at p. 639:—"A bequest in an English will to the children of A. means to his legitimate children, but the rule of construction goes no further. The question remains, Who are his legitimate children? That certainly is not a question of construction of the will. It is a question of status. By what law is that status to be determined? That is a question of law. Does that comity of nations which we call international law apply to the case or not? That may be a matter for consideration, but I do not see how the construction of the will has anything to do with it. The matter may be put in another way. What did the testator intend by this gift? That is answered by the rule of construction. He intended A.'s legitimate children. If you ask the further question, Did he intend his children who would be legitimate according to English law, or his actual legitimate children? how can the rule of construction answer that?" Then after considering the authorities he says, at p. 642: "The law, as I understand it, is that a bequest of personalty in an English will to the children of a foreigner means to his legitimate children, and that, by international law, as recognized in this country, those children are legitimate whose legitimacy is established by the law of the father's domicil. Thus ante nati whose father was domiciled in Guernsey at their birth, and subsequently married the mother so as to make the ante nati legitimate by the law of Guernsey, are recognized as legitimate by the law of this country, and can take under such a gift." That case lays down the rule with regard to a gift of personalty. In Skottowe v. Young the Vice-Chancellor dealt with a gift of land in England upon trusts to sell and apply the proceeds as personalty, and the same rule was applied by him to that gift as was adopted by Kay, J., in Andros v. Andros. Skottowe v. Young is recognized as an authority in In re Goodman's Trusts, therefore, so far as this case refers to a gift of pure personalty or land devised upon trust for sale, the point is covered by authority.

There remains the case of a specific devise of real estate. As to that there is no authority in point, and I have taken time to examine more carefully the case of Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill to see if there is anything in that case which conflicts with the decision in Andros v. Andros, and I have satisfied myself that there is nothing. I adopt the rule in Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, which is recognized by James, L.J., in In re Goodman's Trusts, 17 Ch. D. 266. He says at p. 298: "In that case we have the careful and elaborate judgment of the judges summoned to advise the House of Lords, and in that judgment or advice there are two distinct propositions clearly and distinctly enunciated. The first was that the claimant was for all purposes and to all intents legitimate. The second was that such legitimacy did not necessarily, and did not in fact in that case, include heirship to English land. The first proposition was accepted by the law lords without any doubt or question; the second was questioned. After further reference to the judges and further hearing, the case was at last determined in accordance with the second proposition; but the first proposition has never been really questioned." Now, it seems to me upon examination of Doe d. Birtwhistle v. Vardill that the rule there laid down relates only to the descent of land on an intestacy, and does not affect the case of a devise in a will to children. In my opinion, therefore, the son, John Grey, is entitled to share both in the gift of real estate to Harry Grey and also to the proceeds of sale of the realty.

Company—Winding up—Examination—Official receiver—Report—Suggestion of fraud—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 8, sub-sections (1), (2), (3).

To obtain an order under section 8, sub-section (3), of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the official receiver need not state in his further report in terms that, in his opinion, fraud has been committed by persons in the promotion or formation of the company, but it is sufficient if the facts mentioned in the report (a) suggest fraud by some person or persons who have taken part in the formation, or been directors, of the company, and (b) that the persons to be examined come within the category of a person who has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company.

The object of section 8, sub-section (3), in such a case is to find out whether such fraud as the facts suggest has or has not been committed.

In re Trust and Investment Corporation of South Africa and In re Bertram Luipaards Vlei Gold Mining Co., 40 W. R. 689, discussed.

Applications had been made in the winding up of the above-mentioned company for the public examination of certain persons, when Vaughan Williams, J., reserved judgment.

The question arose under section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which enacts—

Sub-section (1). "Where the court has made an order for winding up a company the official receiver shall, as soon as practicable after receipt of the statement of the company's affairs, submit a preliminary report to the court—(a) as to the amount of capital issued, subscribed, and paid up, and the estimated amount of assets and liabilities; and (b) if the company has failed, as to the causes of the failure; and (c) whether in his opinion further inquiry is desirable as to any matter relating to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company, or the conduct of the business thereof."

Sub-section (2). "The official receiver may also, if he thinks fit, make a further report, or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company, or by any director or other officer of the company in relation to the company since the formation thereof, and any other matters which, in his opinion, it is desirable to bring to the notice of the court."

Sub-section (3). "The court may, after consideration of any such report, direct that any person who has taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company, shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose, and be publicly examined as to the promotion or formation of the company, or as to the conduct of the business of the company, or as to his conduct and dealings as director or officer of the company."

The facts are stated in the judgment.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., now delivered judgment to the following effect:—These are two applications for an order for examination under section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. The Court of Appeal decided in In re Trust and Investment Corporation of South Africa and In re Bertram Luipaards Vlei Gold Mining Co., 40 W. R. 689, that the decision in Ex parte Barnard, In re Great Kruger Gold Mining Co., 40 W. R. 625, did not mean that the official receiver must, in order to obtain an order under section 8, sub-section 3, state in his report that some fraud had been committed by the person to be examined, but only that a report that some fraud has been committed is necessary, and that it is further necessary that the official receiver shall make a report that X. Y. Z., or whoever the people in his schedule may be, are persons who fill the characters enumerated in clause 3—that is to say, that they are persons having taken part in the promotion or formation of the company or have been directors or officers of the company. Lindley, L.J., goes on to say:—"In each of these cases we have two reports which are plain enough—not only a report under sub-section 1, that further inquiry is desirable as to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company, or the conduct of the business thereof, for these companies appear to be swindles; but a further report under sub-section 2, which shows that in the opinion of the liquidator frauds have been committed in the promotion or formation of the company." Then Lopes, L.J., says:—"There must be a report that, in the opinion of the official receiver, a fraud has been committed by somebody; but that the particular person or persons who were parties to it need not be named in order to apply this section." A. L. Smith, L.J., says that, in his judgment, there must be a report of the official receiver showing that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by some person or persons who has or have taken part in the promotion of the company, or has or have been a director or officer of the company, and that the person to be examined comes within the category of a person who has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company or has been a director or officer of the company.

It will be observed that in these cases the official receiver did not by his report say in so many words that in his opinion any fraud had been committed, but the Court of Appeal nevertheless made the order. I infer from this that the Court of Appeal did not mean that the official receiver need, in his report, say in terms that in his opinion fraud had been committed by persons in the promotion or formation of the company; but that it is sufficient if the facts mentioned in the report suggest fraud by some person or persons who have taken part in the promotion of the company or have been directors of the company, and that the persons to be examined come within the category of a person who has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has been a director or officer of the company. Now, I have to see whether these two conditions have been complied with in the present case. There is no statement in the report that in the opinion of the official receiver fraud has been committed in the promotion or formation of the company, or as to the conduct of the business of the company; but there is a statement of facts which is suggestive that some fraud may have been committed, and as the object of the section manifestly is to find out whether such fraud as the facts suggest has been committed, I think that I ought to make the order asked for.

I will now deal with the reports in the present case—the first report and the final report. In the first report, of the 13th of August, 1892, not only is there no statement that fraud has been committed, but there is no statement of facts suggestive even of fraud. Of the second report, of the 23rd of August, for the most part the same may be said, but paragraphs 9, 10, and 12 are as follows:—"(9) The business purchased was an old-established one, but if the bank overdraft—

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£4,345 15s. 3d.—had been included among the liabilities it was insolvent at the time of the negotiations for sale. An arrangement was, however, made by which this item was to be omitted, and, in consideration of the bank agreeing to the proposed transfer, C. Laxon, who was to receive debentures to the nominal amount of £1,500, as the vendors' nominee, undertook to guarantee the bank to a similar amount. (10) William Laxon admits that the whole of the liabilities of the business were paid by the company, and that they exceeded by about £300 (the amount of one week's purchase) the amount entered as owing, but stated that this omission was accidental. (12) It is stated that entries have been made in the books of the company in order to conceal its true position, and that moneys have been improperly drawn by one of the directors." As I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal when it is stated that the report must show that fraud has been committed in the promotion or formation of the company, or, I presume, in the conduct of the business of the company, it did not mean that the report must state in terms that fraud had, in the opinion of the official receiver, been committed, but only that the facts should be stated which suggested fraud. It was not intended to say that the official receiver must state the fact of fraud, the existence of which it is one object of the examination to ascertain.

Practice—Appeal from county court—Notice of motion, service of—Service upon London agent of country solicitor—Remitted action—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 33, r. 1.

An action was commenced in the High Court, and upon the writ, the address of the plaintiff's solicitor, who carried on business in the country, as well as that of the London agents, were indorsed as addresses for service.

The action was remitted to a county court under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and upon the particulars lodged by the plaintiff with the registrar under ord. 33, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1889, the address of the country solicitor alone was indorsed as the address for service.

After the trial of the action the defendant served a notice of appeal from the judgment of the county court judge upon the London agents of the solicitor for the plaintiff.

Held, that the address for service indorsed upon the plaintiff's particulars was substituted for the addresses for service indorsed upon the writ, and that, therefore, the service of the notice of appeal upon the London agents was bad.

The appeal was ordered to be heard under ord. 59, r. 16, as there had been a slip, and the point was a fresh one, but the court felt considerable difficulty in making the order.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Sir R. Harington, sitting at the county court of Worcester holden at Stourbridge. The question was whether, after an action had been remitted from the High Court to the county court, a notice of appeal from the decision of the county court judge could be served on the London agents of the plaintiff's solicitor.

The plaintiff's solicitor carried on business in the country. Upon the writ, which was issued in the High Court, was indorsed the name of the London agents of the plaintiff's solicitor, and their address was mentioned as well as that of the country solicitor as addresses for service.

The action was remitted to the Worcester County Court, and a few days later the plaintiff lodged with the registrar the documents and statements required by ord. 33, r. 1, of the County Court Rules, 1889, which provides that "where by order of the High Court of Justice any action or matter is remitted or transferred to a county court, the plaintiff shall lodge with the registrar thereof the order, or a duplicate thereof, and the writ, together with the pleadings, affidavits, and other documents filed in the High Court, or copies thereof; and also a copy or copies of any affidavit or affidavits on which the order was made, and also a statement of the names and addresses of the several parties to the action or matter, and their solicitors, if any, and a concise statement of the particulars of claim, such as would be required upon entering a plaint, signed by the plaintiff or his solicitor, and the registrar shall thereupon enter the action or matter for trial, and give notice to the parties of the day appointed for such trial, by post or otherwise, ten clear days before such day, and shall annex to the notice to the defendant a copy of the particulars."

The registrar thereupon, in accordance with the rule, gave notice to the parties of the day appointed for the trial and annexed to the notice to the defendant a copy of the plaintiff's particulars. Upon the plaintiff's particulars was indorsed the name of the country solicitor, and his address alone was mentioned as the address for service.

The action having been tried, the defendant served notice of appeal from the judgment of the county court judge on the London agents of the plaintiff's solicitor.

Macaskie, for the respondent.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. The service of notice of appeal upon the London agents of the plaintiff's solicitor was bad: Powell v. Thomas, 39 W. R. 224, [1891] 1 Q. B. 97; Bowles v. Drake & Co., 30 W. R. 333, 8 Q. B. D. 325. The court has a discretion to hear the appeal, but this is not a case in which they will do so. The mistake has arisen through ignorance of the effect of section 65 of the County Courts Act of 1888: Reg. v. Sir Rupert Kettle and Brown, 17 Q. B. D. 761, 34 W. R. Dig. 50.

Ernest Pollock, for the appellant.—Powell v. Thomas does not apply. If there is any irregularity the respondent has waived it by appearing. [BRUCE, J.—He was quite right to appear.] The court has an absolute discretion to hear the appeal: Cusack and Another v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 39 W. R. 244, [1891] 1 Q. B. 347.

BRUCE, J.—The question is whether the notice of appeal was properly served. No doubt if the action had remained in the High Court service of the notice upon the London agent would have been proper. But the action was remitted to the county court. Thereupon, under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, all the proceedings were sent down to the county court. The plaintiff was bound by the County Court Rules to file the proceedings in the county court with the registrar. This had been done. At the bottom of the particulars was the name of the country solicitor. The registrar had to forward a copy of the particulars to the defendant. When the address of the country solicitor was given in the particulars, this was the address for service. After the notice was given, in this way, of a fresh address for service, I think that the service of notice of appeal upon the London solicitors was bad.

It is said that this point has not arisen for decision before. I do not think it requires any case. The Act is plain enough. It says that all proceedings shall be taken in the county court. There has been a slip, and we will hear the appeal. But we have felt some difficulty. It is important that rules should be observed.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur.

The appeal was then heard.

WILLIS v. WELLS. (a.)

Friendly society—Dispute—Member—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 22.

A dispute does not come within the rules of a friendly society as to the settlement of disputes between members and the society if the dispute relates to a claim made by a party to be a member of the society, which claim is denied by the trustees of the society.

Application by the plaintiff for an interim injunction to restrain the members and officers of a friendly society called the New Union Society from excluding the plaintiff from the meetings and benefits of the society, and from refusing to accept his subscriptions.

The defendants were the trustees of the society, and the plaintiff by his writ claimed a declaration that he still was a member of the society, and an injunction in the terms set out above. The plaintiff had been a member of the society for fifty years. From November, 1889, to February, 1891, he had been in receipt of sick pay, being prevented through illness from working. In February, 1891, the plaintiff gave notice to the society that he was sufficiently recovered from his illness to be able to resume work, and he therefore declined the acceptance of further relief. A short time afterwards the plaintiff received a notice from the society informing him that he had been fined £14 for infringing the rules of the society by not procuring a medical certificate before returning to work, and that a resolution had been passed that he would be expelled the society if he did not pay the fine. The plaintiff refused to pay the fine. On the 2nd of March the plaintiff attended a quarterly meeting of the society and tendered his subscription, which he was told would not be accepted unless the fine of £14 was paid. Some correspondence then ensued, which the defendants refused to consider, because, as they stated in their affidavits, in their opinion the plaintiff had ceased to be a member of the society. The plaintiff accordingly brought this action.

Rule 27 of the society's rules was as follows: "All disputes which may arise between any member, or person claiming under or on account of any member, and the trustees, treasurer, or other officer of the committee thereof, shall be referred to and decided by justices of the peace pursuant to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 115, s. 24."

Section 22, sub-section (c), of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, provides that where the rules of a society direct that disputes shall be referred to justices, the dispute shall be determined by a court of summary jurisdiction.

Scott Fox, for the plaintiff.—This is not a dispute between a member and the society. The plaintiff is no longer a member of the society, for he has been expelled. The case is not, therefore, a dispute within the rules and section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and the plaintiff has a right to bring this action in the High Court: Prentice v. London, L. R. 10 C. P. 679, 24 W. R. Dig. 8.

He also cited In re Royal Liver Friendly Society, 36 W. R. 7, 35 Ch. D. 332.

C. C. Scott, for the defendants.—This is a dispute between a member and the society. It is the contention of the plaintiff that he is still a member, and he cannot argue that he is not a member.

He referred to The Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Kent, 32 W. R. 681, 9 App. Cas. 260.

GRANTHAM, J.—The question for our decision in this case is whether the plaintiff is justified in taking proceedings against the defendant in the way that he has done, and it is not necessary for us to inquire into the merits of the case. The Friendly Societies Act, 1875, provides a cheap and expeditious method of settling disputes between members of these societies, but persons cannot be precluded from exercising their right of coming to the High Court unless that right has been in terms taken away by statute. In cases of disputes between members and the society, it is common ground that the cheaper tribunal is to be resorted to, but in the present case the question is, Is the plaintiff a member of this society? I have come to the conclusion that under the circumstances he is not now a member. The case of Prentice v. London, which was cited during the argument, seems to me to be exactly in point. In that case Lindley, L.J., said: "The object of the provision in question was the easy settlement of internal disputes between the trustees and officers of the society and its members. That assumes the parties both to be members of the body. If the matter in controversy is whether the party is a member or not, that clearly is not a matter of internal judgment." Coleridge, C.J., used language to the same effect. Being of opinion, then, that the plaintiff is not a member of this society, I think that this is not the kind of dispute which was intended to be confined to a court of summary jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff is right in bringing this action in the High Court.

CHARLES, J.—I agree.

Order accordingly.

OPPENHEIM v. SHEFFIELD, (a.)

Practice — Interrogatories — Exhibited unreasonably — Prolix or unnecessary — Power to set aside or strike out part of a set — Ord. 31, r. 7.

Ord. 31, r. 7, deals with two cases—first, where interrogatories are exhibited which are in themselves unobjectionable, but, by reason of the circumstances of the case, it would be unreasonable or vexatious to call upon the party interrogated to answer them; secondly, where interrogatories are in themselves objectionable by reason of being prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. In the first case, all or any of the interrogatories may be set aside by a judge's order; in the second case, all or any may be struck out.

Where any party objects to answer interrogatories on any of the grounds mentioned in rule 7, he is entitled to apply for an order under the rule, and cannot be required to take his objection in his affidavit in answer.

The fact that leave has been obtained to administer interrogatories is not a bar to an application under either part of the rule.

If the judge considers a set of interrogatories to be as a whole prolix, oppressive, or unnecessary, he has power to strike them all out, though some of them may be unobjectionable.

McIlroy v. Duncan, W. N., 1884, p. 48, and Sammons v. Bailey, 38 W. R. 605, 24 Q. B. D. 727, overruled.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of a divisional court affirming an order of a judge at chambers setting aside certain interrogatories.

The action was brought in respect of money alleged to have been paid by the plaintiffs as stockbrokers for the defendant at his request and commission. The defendant said that the plaintiffs did not pay the money for him or at his request, and that no commission was due; and by way of counter-claim he alleged that he employed the plaintiffs as his stockbrokers to buy and sell various stocks and shares for him; that the plaintiffs from time to time rendered him accounts which included various overcharges and omitted various sums received by the plaintiffs for his use, and that he, on the representation of the plaintiffs, paid them large sums of money in respect of such accounts, and he claimed an account of all the purchases and sales made by the plaintiffs on his behalf, and payment of the amount found to be due from the plaintiffs to him on taking such account.

The defendant obtained leave to administer interrogatories for the examination of the plaintiffs, and after the delivery of the plaintiffs' reply, which stated that the accounts referred to in the counter-claim had been agreed to and settled, a set of seventeen interrogatories were exhibited by the defendant. These interrogatories were directed to the support of the defendant's counter-claim, and inquired in great detail into the particulars and circumstances of the purchases and sales effected by the plaintiffs, and the manner in which the sums charged to the defendant were arrived at, and suggested that the plaintiffs had dealt with the defendant as principals and not as stockbrokers.

The plaintiffs took out a summons under ord. 31, r. 7, asking that the interrogatories might be set aside or struck out. The master dismissed the summons, saying that any objection to answer any of the interrogatories might be taken in the plaintiffs' affidavit in answer; but, on appeal, Day, J., made an order setting aside the interrogatories. The Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) affirmed the judge's order, being of opinion that the interrogatories were prolix, oppressive, and unnecessary.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Morten, for the defendant.—The master's order ought to be restored. The proper course is for the plaintiffs to take their objection in their affidavit in answer, under rule 6, which alone applies where, as here, leave has been obtained to interrogate. Rule 7 is divided into two parts. Under the first part a set of interrogatories may be set aside on the ground that it has been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously. But that only applies where interrogatories should not have been exhibited at all, and then only in cases where leave has not been obtained to exhibit them. This was expressly decided by Field, J., at chambers in McIlroy v. Duncan, W. N., 1884, p. 48: see also Gay v. Labouchere, 27 W. R. 413, 4 Q. B. D. 206. The second part of the rule provides for striking out interrogatories which are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. The settled practice now is to strike out all or none. It has been held in Sammons v. Bailey, 38 W. R. 605, 24 Q. B. D. 727, that there is no power to strike out part of a set. In Allhusen v. Labouchere, 27 W. R. 12, 3 Q. B. D. 654, the principle is laid down that it is the duty of the party who objects to interrogatories to specify which particular interrogatories he objects to. Here the plaintiffs could not have successfully objected to all the interrogatories, for some are clearly admissible. Therefore the judge at chambers ought to have let all the interrogatories stand and left the plaintiffs to take their objection in their answer, in accordance with the decision in Sammons v. Bailey. Otherwise those interrogatories which are perfectly admissible will be struck out as well as those which are objectionable.

Horne Payne, Q.C., and McIntyre, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon to argue, but cited Cawley v. Burton, 32 W. R. 33.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the defendant, having set up a counter-claim, obtained leave to administer interrogatories; and a set of interrogatories were accordingly delivered to the plaintiffs. The judge at chambers either set aside or struck out the whole of them. The Divisional Court have affirmed the judge's order, and the question for us is whether we agree with their decision. They acted under ord. 31, r. 7. They knew what the issue between the parties was, and they had before them the interrogatories which had been delivered by the defendant. They had to consider what burden was put on the plaintiff by the delivery of these interrogatories. They thought that there was thereby put on him the burden of answering a prolix, oppressive, and unnecessary set of interrogatories. Therefore, without inquiring whether a few of them might not have been answered, they said as a whole they were prolix and unnecessary, and ordered them to be set aside.

Ord. 31, r. 7, seems to me to contemplate two cases. The first case is where there are interrogatories, which may be in themselves unobjectionable, but by reason of some of the circumstances of the case, as, e.g., the stage in which the proceedings are, it would be unreasonable or vexatious to order the party to answer them. It is contended that where there are any such interrogatories included in a set you cannot set them aside unless you set aside all the others. Is there any ground for that contention? The words of the rule are:—"Any interrogatories may be set aside on the ground that they have been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously." I am of opinion that the meaning of that is, all or any that are exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously may be set aside. The second case is where interrogatories are objectionable in themselves. The section proceeds—"or struck out on the ground that they are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous." The nominative case is the same in both cases, viz., "any interrogatories." This part of the section, as well as the first, must apply to all or any. If as a whole the interrogatories are prolix or unnecessary, you may strike them all out. If some are prolix or unnecessary you may strike out those that are so. But a narrow construction is sought to be put on this part of the section; it is said that unless each individual interrogatory is prolix and unnecessary there is no power to strike out the set. I see no reason for that construction. If one interrogatory is enough, and a great number are asked, is not the set as a whole prolix?

It is said that objection ought to be taken in the affidavit in answer. But this rule has nothing to do with the answer. It is clear that under this rule objection may be taken before any answer is given.

Two cases were cited. The first was a decision of Field, J., at chambers. I do not agree with that decision. It seems to me that the learned judge construed the new rule as though it were in the form of the old rule. The other case was Sammons v. Bailey. There the Divisional Court thought that on an application such as the present the judge must strike out either all the interrogatories or none, and that, unless all were bad, any objection might be taken in the answer. I see no reason for that. The true construction seems to be that if the judge thinks the interrogatories as a whole are prolix, oppressive, or unnecessary, he may strike out the whole of them. I do not say he must do so, but he may if he thinks right. On the other hand, I think he may go through the interrogatories one by one, striking out those which he thinks ought not to be allowed, and leaving those which he thinks ought to be answered.

Perhaps the two parts of the rule may overlap one another, and there might be a case which came within both. In such a case I think the judge may act under either part of the rule.

The Divisional Court had a right to look at these interrogatories as a whole, and say whether, as a whole, they were prolix or unnecessary. They thought they were, and set aside the whole set. I think they were right.

The case of Allhusen v. Labouchere seems to me to draw the very distinction which I have drawn. There is nothing in that case which says you may not look at a set of interrogatories as a whole and set them aside on the ground of being prolix, although some of them may be admissible.

LOPES, L.J.—This case comes within rule 7 of order 31. It does not come within rule 6, which has nothing to do with an application to a judge. Rule 7 requires careful consideration, as it is not very easy to interpret. I am of opinion that it applies to two states of things, two sets of circumstances. The first part deals with the exhibition of interrogatories; the judge has to consider whether, having regard to the stage in which the action is, and looking at the interrogatories which have been exhibited, it would or would not be unreasonable or vexatious to order them to be answered. The second part deals with a different state of things—viz., where objection is taken to the nature or character or effect of the interrogatories themselves. The judge is authorized to set aside the interrogatories where they are unreasonably or vexatiously exhibited; he is authorized to strike them out where they are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. The rule begins with the words "any interrogatories"; that means all or any individual interrogatories. The first part contemplates the setting aside of all or any of the interrogatories, and the second part, which refers to the same nominative, contemplates the striking out of all or any of the interrogatories. In this case the judge ordered the interrogatories to be set aside en bloc. The Divisional Court thought they were so prolix and unnecessary that they ought to be struck out, and they affirmed the judge's order. I am of opinion that they were right in so doing. It is said there is no power to set aside or strike out a set of interrogatories where leave to administer interrogatories has been obtained. But I cannot see in the rules any suggestion of such a distinction. When leave is obtained, the only thing the judge decides is that the case is a proper one in which to allow interrogatories to be administered, but he has no idea what the interrogatories will be.

As to the cases, I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that McIlroy v. Duncan cannot be supported. I also disagree with the judgment of Grantham, J., in Sammons v. Bailey. He thought that where a judge is asked to strike out interrogatories, he is bound either to strike out all or none. I cannot read the rule in that way.

KAY, L.J.—I also think that rule 7 is intended to deal with two things—viz., first, an unnecessary or vexatious exhibition of interrogatories, and, secondly, interrogatories themselves, when they are prolix, oppressive, unnecessary, or scandalous. In the first case, the rule says they may be set aside, in the second they may be struck out. That in either case the rule applies to all or any of the interrogatories is made clear by the history of the rule. In the original rules under the Judicature Act, rule 5 of order 31 provided for striking out interrogatories on certain specified grounds, "or on any other ground." Then in the rules of 1878 a distinction was drawn between an application "to set aside the interrogatories"—that is, the whole set—"on the ground that they have been exhibited unreasonably or vexatiously," and an application "to strike out any interrogatory or interrogatories on the ground that it or they is or are scandalous." Then came the present rule, in which I think the language has been designedly altered in order to give the judge a larger discretion. The judge may now, if he is acting under the first part of the rule, set aside all or any of the interrogatories; if he is acting under the second part of the rule, he may strike out all or any of the interrogatories. Here the judge's order was to set them all aside. The application was in the alternative, and he might well have thought that it was vexatious to exhibit them at that stage of the proceedings. The Divisional Court seems to have thought that they were prolix, oppressive, and unnecessary, and that on that ground they had been rightly disallowed. It was decided in Allhusen v. Labouchere that where a judge can see that a set of interrogatories taken as a whole are an abuse of the process of the court, he may disallow them all. I cannot dissent from the view taken in this case by the Divisional Court. I think it was no answer to this application to say there were some interrogatories here and there in the set to which an answer might have been allowed.

HESELTINE v. SIMMONS. (a.)

Bill of sale—Validity—Form in schedule—Untrue statement of consideration—"Term for the defeasance of the security"—Agreement to have prior recourse to other securities—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 9; Form in Schedule.

A bill of sale, given by way of security for an advance, was expressed to be made in consideration of a sum of money paid by the grantee to the grantor. At the time of the execution of the bill of sale an agreement was made between the grantor and the grantee that the grantee would not enforce the bill of sale until certain other securities in the hands of the grantee were first realized or attempted to be realized. This agreement was not inserted in the bill of sale. In an action by the grantor to have the bill of sale declared void and delivered up to be cancelled, upon the ground that it was void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule, the grantee counter-claimed for the principal sum and interest under a covenant for repayment by the grantor contained in the bill of sale. At the trial it was proved that the consideration was not truly stated.

Held, first, that the untrue statement of the consideration did not make the bill of sale void under section 9, as not being in accordance with the form, but only made it void within section 8 in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein; and, secondly, that the agreement that the bill of sale should not be enforced until the other securities were realized or attempted to be realized was not a "term for the defeasance of the security" within the meaning of those words in the form, and that, therefore, the non-insertion of this agreement in the bill of sale did not make the bill of sale void under section 9.

Held, therefore, that the covenant for repayment by the grantor remained unaffected, but that, as the other securities had not been exhausted, the counter-claim was premature.

Appeal from the judgment of Denman, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the grantor of a bill of sale given by way of security for the repayment of £400 and interest thereon, against the grantee to restrain the latter from seizing the goods comprised in the bill of sale, and to have the bill of sale declared void and delivered up to be cancelled. The defendant counter-claimed for the principal money and interest due under the covenant by the grantor to repay contained in the bill of sale. The bill of sale was stated to be given in consideration of a sum of £400 paid by the defendant to the plaintiff. The learned judge found as a fact that the £400 was advanced to the plaintiff's father and not to the plaintiff, the plaintiff being merely a surety, and that therefore the consideration was not truly stated. An agreement was also made between the plaintiff and the defendant at the time of the execution of the bill of sale that the defendant would not enforce the bill of sale until certain other securities then given to him for the same debt were first realized or attempted to be realised. This agreement was not inserted in the bill of sale. No attempt had been made to realize these securities at the time this action was brought.

The learned judge held that the bill of sale was absolutely void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as not being in accordance with the form in the schedule upon two grounds:—(1) That the consideration was not truly stated, and (2) that the agreement not to enforce the bill of sale until the other securities were realized was a "term for the defeasance of the security," and ought to have been inserted in the bill of sale. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the claim and counter-claim.

The defendant appealed.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment. The following authorities were cited:—Upon the first point: Swift v. Pannell, 31 W. R. 543, 24 Ch. D. 210; Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2. — The judgment of the COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ.) was read by KAY, L.J.—This action is brought by the grantor of a bill of sale seeking to have it cancelled. The defendant counter-claims for the amount due upon the covenant in the bill of sale. Judgment has been given for the plaintiff upon the claim and counter-claim. The defendant, the grantee of the bill of sale, appeals. The contention of the plaintiff is that the bill of sale is wholly void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, because it is not in accordance with the form given in the schedule to that Act. On the face of the bill of sale no deviation from that form can be pointed out. But it is said that is not enough. Although apparently in complete accordance it is shown by evidence—(1) that the consideration is not truly stated because the amount was not lent to the plaintiff, but to his father, and (2) that the bill of sale omits a condition upon the faith of which it was executed—viz., that it should not be enforced until all other securities and remedies of the grantee had been exhausted. The question, therefore, is whether section 9 of the Act of 1882 contains anything requiring accuracy of statement of the consideration, or requiring a statement of the whole bargain. I will deal with the two objections separately.

First, does the untrue statement of the consideration avoid the bill of sale under section 9? Section 8 of the Act of 1882 expressly deals with an untrue statement of consideration, and provides that the consequence of this shall be that "such bill of sale shall be void in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein." If the bill of sale, as in this case, contains a covenant to pay in addition to an assignment of chattels, the covenant would not be avoided by this section. Section 9 avoids a bill of sale "given by way of security for money," if not made in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act. That form, so far as relates to the consideration, runs thus:—"In consideration of the sum of £ now paid to A. B. by C. D., the receipt of which the said A. B. hereby acknowledges"; and then follow in brackets these words:—"[or whatever else the consideration may be]."

Those last words in brackets, it is argued, show that the consideration must be truly stated But it must be remembered that section 9 deals only with form: Thomas v. Kelly; and the bracketed words may be satisfied by treating them as making the form flexible enough to allow the statement of some consideration other than a mere payment of money, as, for example, the delivery to the grantor of goods the price of which was to be secured by the bill of sale. Any larger meaning, such as that suggested by the argument, would make the provision in section 8, that the consideration must be truly stated or that the bill of sale should be void as to the personal chattels comprised in it, not only useless, but inconsistent. There would on that construction be two sections, 8 and 9, one immediately following the other, the former making the bill of sale partially void, and the latter making it wholly void for the same reason—that is, the untrue statement of the consideration. It is suggested that section 8 of the Act of 1882 applies to bills of sale of all kinds, whether given as security for money or not, and that section 9 applies only to bills of sale given as security for money, and that the apparent inconsistency may thus be reconciled. But I think that a careful consideration of the two Acts of 1878 and 1882 shows that this is not the case. The former of these statutes only avoided bills of sale against execution creditors and trustees in bankruptcy of the grantors if not duly registered. But it included all bills of sale, whether for security of money or absolute transfers. That statute did not affect their validity as between grantor and grantee. The statute of 1882 avoided the bills of sale to which it refers, even as between grantor and grantee. But it only refers to bills of sale given as security for money. Section 3 expressly provides that "this Act shall not apply" to other bills of sale. Consequently the repeal by section 15 of sections 8 and 20 of the previous Act, though in terms absolute, must be confined to a repeal of those sections only as to bills of sale given as a security for money. The repeal does not apply to other bills of sale. The result is that bills of sale not given as security for money are still governed by sections 8 and 20 of the former Act. It follows that section 8 of the Act of 1882 only applies to bills of sale given as security for money, and the supposed distinction in this respect between sections 8 and 9 does not really exist. This was so held by Fry, L.J., in Swift v. Pannell, and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of that decision.

The other objection is that there was a condition agreed on which is not stated in the bill of sale, and this omission, it is argued, deviates from that direction in the form which requires the insertion of "terms . . . which the parties may agree to for the . . . defeasance of the security." The omitted term here was not, in my opinion, for defeasance. It was an agreement by the grantee to exhaust other securities given him for the same debt before resorting to this. It is argued that if he did so that would defeat this security to the extent of the payment so made. That is a complete misapprehension of the word defeasance. A debt is not defeated by being paid. A security is not defeated by payment of the debt. There is nothing in the alleged agreement which defeats any of the provisions of this deed. It is a mere condition by which the grantee for the benefit of the grantor arranges the order in which he will realize his securities. Then it is argued that even if it is not a defeasance, but only a condition, it is within the word "defeasance" as used in the form. But in section 10, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1878, which is to be read with the Act of 1882, "defeasance" is contradistinguished from "condition," and it is provided that every defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust, subject to which the bill of sale is given, shall be written in it, or the registration shall be void. Therefore, whatever may be the consequence of omitting the condition, it does not seem to me to be a breach of section 9 of the Act of 1882. If it is only a breach of section 10 of the Act of 1878, the consequence would seem to be that the registration is void—that is, the bill of sale must be treated as an unregistered bill of sale, the effect of which under section 8 of that Act would be that it would be void "so far as regards the property in or right to the possession of any chattels" comprised therein, and in the possession of the grantor at the time of execution, as against execution creditors or trustees in bankruptcy of the grantor, but valid as to everyone else. Apparently that section would not make void the covenant for payment of the debt. But as section 8 of the Act of 1878 is repealed as to bills of sale for securing money, such a bill of sale is now to be treated as though it were unregistered under section 8 of the Act of 1882. The consequence is that it is void against everyone as to the chattels comprised in it, but no further, and the covenant for payment which it contains is unaffected by this section.

The difference between sections 8 and 9 of the Act of 1882 is that section 8 avoids bills of sale which do not comply with its provisions only in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein; section 9 altogether avoids bills of sale which are not made in accordance with the form in the schedule. This difference was recognized in Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408, where it was held by the Court of Appeal that a covenant in a bill of sale for security of money which did not comply with section 9 was avoided, as well as the rest of the bill of sale. In Woodward v. Heseltine, 39 W. R. 405, [1891] 1 Ch. 464, the Court of Appeal was of opinion that the description of the grantee on the face of the bill of sale was so ambiguous that it was uncertain whether the grantee was a corporation or an individual, and that this was not in accordance with the form, which certainly requires a clear and definite description of a grantee upon the face of the document. The House of Lords dissented from this, construing the bill of sale to mean that the grantee was an individual whose name and address were distinctly given—Simmons v. Woodward, 40 W. R. 641, [1892] A. C. 100. Some of the language of the learned lords, detached from the context, has been used on both sides in this case to support the opposite arguments. I think that the point we have now to decide was not decided or intended to be decided by the House of Lords, and that their judgments do not assist either side in this controversy. The result is that the covenant in this deed is not invalidated by the Bills of Sale Acts.

But there is another consideration which makes the counter-claim in this action improper. The learned judge has found that the grantor executed this bill of sale "upon a complete understanding between the parties at the time that this document should not be made available against him or his goods until all the other documents, many of which were at that time handed over to the defendant, were realized, or attempted to be realized, and realization should have failed"; and he finds that this was "a substantial part of the bargain between the parties at the time." The point is distinctly taken by the fifth paragraph of the defence to the counter-claim. The agreement so pleaded seems to me not inconsistent with the bill of sale. It is strictly a collateral agreement. There is no statute requiring it to be in writing, and if there were it would probably be considered fraudulent to insist upon it after the whole contract had been partly performed by executing the bill of sale upon the faith of this agreement by the grantee: Morgan v. Griffith, 19 W. R. 957, L. R. 6 Ex. 70:

Erskine v. Adeane, 21 W. R. 802, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 756. The judgment must therefore be varied by declaring that the bill of sale is void in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein. This leaves the covenant unaffected, but as it appears from the evidence that the other securities were not exhausted, the counter-claim is premature, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

A testator, by a codicil to his will, devised as follows:—"I devise the cottage and garden walled round, bought by me from John Lewis Parry Evans, to the said J. H. absolutely." At the date of the codicil he was seised in fee of the property so devised. He subsequently sold the property, taking a mortgage of it from the purchaser to secure part of the purchase-money. He died during the continuance of the mortgage.

Held, that the benefit of the mortgage debt did not pass to J. H. under the devise.

Decision in Moor v. Raisbeck, 12 Sim. 123, approved, though dicta therein not approved.

Appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

By his will, dated the 24th of September, 1878, Thomas Clowes devised as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all those two dwelling-houses and the vacant land adjoining, situate at Llandrillo-yn-Rhos, near Colwyn, in North Wales, recently bought by me from Benjamin Sugden, to James Hudson and Edward Hudson, sons of my sister, Ellen Hudson, as joints tenants, absolutely." The will contained a devise and bequest of "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my real estate and personal estate" to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and distribution among his sisters' nephews and nieces. By a codicil, dated the 7th of April, 1883, the testator declared as follows:—"I revoke the devises in my said will contained to James Hudson and Edward Hudson of the two dwelling-houses at Llandrillo-yn-Rhos, and devise the same, and also the cottage adjoining thereto and garden walled round, bought by me from John Lewis Parry Evans, to the said James Hudson absolutely."

By an indenture, dated the 11th of July, 1888, the testator conveyed by way of sale, in consideration of the sum of £1,220, the cottage and garden comprised in the devise to James Hudson to Herbert Bliss Hill in fee simple.

By an indenture of the 12th of July, 1888, H. B. Hill conveyed the premises to the testator by way of mortgage to secure the sum of £900 and interest.

The testator died on the 6th of October, 1889, and the will and codicil were duly proved.

After the testator's death the mortgage debt was paid off to the testator's executors and the property had been reconveyed by them to the mortgagor.

James Hudson claimed that the benefit of the mortgage had passed to him on the testator's death by virtue of the devise in the codicil, and that he was entitled to the money secured thereby.

The executors and trustees of the will and codicil of the testator applied by way of originating motion before the Vice-Chancellor for determination of the question whether, in the events which had happened, any, and what, interest passed to James Hudson under the devise.

The Vice-Chancellor held that James Hudson was entitled to the principal money secured at the date of the testator's death on the cottage and garden devised to him by the codicil.

The residuary legatees appealed.

By section 23 of the Wills Act it is provided that "no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death."

By section 24 it is provided that "every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

Hopkinson, Q.C., and Bather, for the appellants.—James Hudson takes nothing under the devise. Even before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it is questionable whether the legal estate going to the devisee would have carried the right to the money with it. The devisee would have taken the estate, but only as trustee for the person entitled to the money. It is the mortgagor, not the mortgagee, who is really the owner of mortgaged land; the mortgagee only has the money. Moor v. Raisbeck, 12 Sim. 123, is a strong case in the appellants' favour.

They also referred to Saxton v. Saxton, 28 W. R. 294, 13 Ch. D. 359.

Farwell, Q.C., and Astbury, for the respondent, James Hudson.—The question turns on the true reading of sections 23 and 24 of the Wills Act. You are to read the will as if made on the day of death. You inquire what property the testator had on the day of his death, and it is immaterial what took place between the actual time of making the will and the death. If it had been a question before the Conveyancing Act, it might have been that the testator meant to give merely the legal estate; but since that Act, unless the devise passes the money to the devisee it passes nothing at all, which would be giving no effect at all to the devise; and some effect must, if possible, be given to it. In Woodhouse v. Meredith, 1 Mer. 450, a devise of "all my freehold, copyhold, and leasehold messuages, farms, lands, and tenements in the town of Kensington," when the testator was only mortgagee, was held to pass the mortgage money. A mortgagee has, in fact and in law, an interest in the land. Money advanced on mortgage is an interest in land. A general devise of land will not pass a mortgage debt, but a particular devise, as here, will: Theobald on Wills, 3rd ed., 160. [BOWEN, L.J.—A mortgage debt is not, I think, an interest in land, though it is made so for certain purposes. If it were so universally, a general devise of land would pass it.] The case of Airey v. Bower, 35 W. R. 657,

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

12 App. Cas. 263, shows that Moor v. Raisbeck was not rightly decided.

They also referred to Cox v. Bennett, L. R. 6 Eq. 422, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 183; Saxton v. Saxton; In re Russell, Russell v. Chell, 30 W. R. 454, 19 Ch. Norris, for the trustees, was not called on.

Hopkinson, Q.C., in reply.—Farrar v. Earl of Winterton, 5 Beav. 1, is on the same lines as Moor v. Raisbeck, so that case does not stand alone. The testator was never in possession as mortgagee. The word "absolutely" is quite inapt to pass such an interest as that which a mortgagee has in the land. You are not at liberty to strain the Wills Act so as to say it does not matter what has happened between the date of the will and the death: In re Lane, Luard v. Lane, 28 W. R. 764, 14 Ch. D. 856. Moor v. Raisbeck is supportable, not only as an authority of long standing, but also on principle, leaving out what Shadwell, V.C., says as to the will being revoked by "an act as aforesaid" under section 23 of the Wills Act.

He further referred to In re Gibson, Mathews v. Foulsham, 14 W. R. 818, L. R. 2 Eq. 669, per Wood, V.C.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion the view taken by the learned Vice-Chancellor was wrong. The short ground upon which I think the case should be decided is this, viz., that under a devise of land money does not pass. Any attempt to get out of this proposition must be an ingenious attempt to read the 23rd and 24th sections of the Wills Act and section 30 of the Conveyancing Act in a particular way to suit such attempt.

The testator, by a codicil, devised "the cottage adjoining" certain premises which he gave to the same devisee, "and garden walled round, bought" by him "from John Lewis Parry Evans to the said James Hudson, absolutely." Now suppose that at the time of making the codicil the testator had not been seised in fee as owner, as he in fact was, but had been only mortgagee of the property devised—I leave out for the present any question of the effect of the Conveyancing Act—, could any one then say that the mortgage money would have passed? In my opinion, certainly not, notwithstanding the reliance placed by the respondent's counsel on Woodhouse v. Meredith. That is plain and not to be disputed. But, of course, the determination of a matter may depend on circumstances, and that was the case of Woodhouse v. Meredith. In that case it would have been ridiculous to say the testator was passing only the legal estate.

When the testator in the present case made the codicil he was seised in fee of the property in question. He then subsequently sold it and took a mortgage of it for a portion of the purchase-money. Again, I leave out of sight any question as to the Conveyancing Act, and I ask, What is the effect of the 23rd and 24th sections of the Wills Act in these circumstances? That Act is to apply to the state of things existing at the time of the death. The effect is, in my opinion, to make Hudson devisee of the land, but as a trustee for the person beneficially entitled. That, as it seems to me, is the true effect of the Wills Act. If authority is wanted, it is to be found in the case of Moor v. Raisbeck, which covers the present case; the decision there was right, though some of the observations in the judgment, as to revocation, may not be supportable. Then there was the case of Farrar v. Lord Winterton to a similar effect.

But then the respondent says that the Conveyancing Act comes in, and that the effect of that is that if the money does not pass, nothing at all passes to the devisee, inasmuch as by section 30 of the Act the legal estate, notwithstanding the devise, goes to the legal personal representatives; and that so the devise would be inoperative, whereas you must, if possible, give effect to every part of a will. That argument might be all very well if the testator had been mortgagee at the time he made the codicil, but not under the circumstances which really existed in this case.

The appeal must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I entirely agree with the view Lindley, L.J., has expressed.

Originating summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the Rev. Richard Martin, one of the executors and trustees of the will and codicil of the testatrix, Anne Sturges Bourne, for the determination by the court of the following questions:—(1) Whether the stamp duty, which under section 27 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, had become payable in respect of the estate of the testatrix, ought to be paid by the defendant, George Edward Martin, alone, as the residuary legatee under the will and codicil, or whether such stamp duty ought to be paid rateably by the defendant, George Edward Martin, and by such of the children and issue of the Rev. George Martin and the Rev. Wm. Martin respectively as take a share under the trusts of the will and codicil; (2) the like question as to the estate duty payable under section 5 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testatrix, who died on the 9th of December, 1891, by her will, dated the 18th of March, 1870, after appointing the defendant, George Martin, and William Martin executors and trustees thereof, and after certain pecuniary bequests and specific gifts of real and leasehold estates, devised and bequeathed all other her real estate whatsoever and wheresoever situate, and certain specific sums of Reduced and New Three Per Cents., and all other moneys and investments representing the residuary personal estate and the proceeds of sale of the real estate of her late father, and also a certain sum of Consols to which she was entitled under the marriage settlement of her late father, to her executors upon trust for sale and conversion, and upon trust to divide the moneys arising therefrom equally between the children and issue of the Rev. George Martin and the Rev. William Martin as in the said will mentioned. And the testatrix gave all the residue of her personal estate and effects to George Edward Martin absolutely. By a codicil dated the 10th of September, 1890, the testatrix revoked the appointment of William Martin as executor and trustee, and appointed the plaintiff a trustee and executor in his place.

Badcock, for the residuary legatee.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, by section 27 imposed a new duty in place of the duties imposed by the Act of the preceding year, but did not declare by whom the duty was to be borne. The present case is therefore governed by In re Croft, Deane v. Croft, 40 W. R. 425, [1892] 1 Ch. 652, where Kekewich, J., decided that in the absence of any express direction it was to be assumed that each part of the estate should bear its aliquot part of the duty. By section 41 of the Act of 1881 the Legislature relieved certain persons of certain duties, and that section must have been meant to relieve the person who, under the old law, would have been charged. The old probate duty would no doubt have been borne by the residuary personal estate: Trethewy v. Helyar, 4 Ch. D. 53, 25 W. R. Dig. 324. The Act now excepts debts and funeral expenses from the inventory and alters the order of administration. The estate duty under the Act of 1889 stands on exactly the same footing as the probate duty, and is not payable out of the residue.

C. Gurdon, for the specific legatees and specific and residuary devisees.—In re Croft, Deane v. Croft has no bearing on the present case, for there the duty was payable under a settlement and not under a will, and the contest was not between specific and residuary legatees, but between persons who were entitled to a fund which must bear the duty in any event. Trethewy v. Helyar and Fenton v. Wills, 26 W. R. 139, 7 Ch. D. 33, show that the costs of administration are payable out of the general residuary personal estate, and not out of lapsed shares in exoneration of the general residue. The probate duty, or rather the affidavit duty, is a testamentary expense included in the costs of administration; it is a necessary payment which the executor or administrator must make before he obtains administration. The estate duty is in the same category, and is intended only to be an increase of the duty on the inventory. [STIRLING, J.—Is there any decision as to the incidence of the old probate duty?] No. Section 41 of the Act of 1881 merely grants a cesser of the legacy duty at one per cent. The duty should in each case be paid out of the general residue, and not apportioned among the specific legatees.

Badcock replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 29.—STIRLING, J.—The will is of the simplest character. [His lordship read the will, and continued:—] The residuary devise is in fact, according to the well-known decision in Heneman v. Fryer, 16 W. R. 162, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 420, a specific devise. The will, therefore, amounts to a specific gift of property partly realty and partly personalty, followed by a gift of the residue of the testatrix's personal estate. The question simply is whether the duties are payable in part out of the property specifically given, or whether they must be paid entirely out of the residuary personal estate. Now let us consider how the law stood before the passing of the Acts mentioned in the summons. Down to 1880 there was payable by the executor or administrator a probate duty, which was a stamp duty imposed by the Act 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, and certain other Acts incorporated therein by reference. The general effect was that the executor was compelled to stamp the probate or letters of administration with a stamp which denoted payment of duty upon property of a certain value subject to the probate: see 41 Geo. 3, c. 86, s. 3. Then how, under the old law, was that paid? The Acts which impose the duty contain no directions as to the property out of which it is payable. In that respect they are very different from the Legacy Duty Act, 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, ss. 6 and 24, which contains elaborate provisions which show that the duty is to fall upon the legatee. There is no question as to how probate duty was in fact paid under the old law. According to the regular practice it was paid out of the general residuary personal estate. It was a testamentary expense which had to be incurred by the executor in order to obtain a valid probate, which was the root of his title, and the burden of it did not fall upon the specific legatees, and still less upon the specific devisees. Counsel have not been able to find any authority which shows that the practice was not the right one, and I am not surprised that that should be so, as upon principle it is clear that it was right. The principle on which it was based was laid down by Lord Selborne in Robertson v. Broadbent, 32 W. R. 205, 8 App. Cas. 812. He says this: "The principle of the exemption of personal estate specifically bequeathed is that it is necessary to give effect to the intention apparent by the gift. If the bequest is of a particular chattel, such as a horse or a ship, it is manifest that the testator intended the thing itself to pass unconditionally, and in statu quo, to the legatee; which could not be if it were subject to the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and pecuniary legacies."

I may mention as an illustration of that, what we know to have been the law as to specific bequests charged with incumbrances. Before Locke King's Act the specific devisee was entitled to have the incumbrance upon the property devised to him, discharged out of the testator's personal estate. That has been altered as regards incumbrances upon real estate subsisting at the death of the testator, but the Act does not apply to personal estate, as to which the old law still applies, as is shown by the judgment of the late Master of the Rolls in Bothamley v. Sherson, 23 W. R. 848, L. R. 20 Eq. 304, 314. If the general personal estate is insufficient, the executor or administrator would be entitled to be indemnified out of such funds as come to his hands by virtue of the probate, and in such a case and in this way, the specific legatee might be called upon to pay or contribute to the payment of the probate duty, but unless the general personal estate fails, the specific legatees are not chargeable with it.

The law was first altered by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1880 (43 Vict. c. 14), which simply altered the scale of duties, section 9 substituting new duties for old ones. Then came the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. c. 12), section 27 of which imposed new duties upon probates of wills and letters of administration in substitution for those payable under the former Act. Section 28 gave to the executor or administrator a power which he had not before, to deduct the aggregate amount of the debts and funeral expenses from the value of the estate in estimating the amount chargeable with duty. Section 29 makes provision as to the affidavit required from the person applying for the probate or letters of administration. Section 30 provides that the probate or letters of administration are to bear a certificate showing that the affidavit has been delivered, and if liable to duty, duly stamped, and stating the gross value of the estate. Section 38 imposed fresh stamp duties upon property passing under voluntary settlements and by donationes mortis causâ. Section 41 provides that "in respect of any legacy, residue, or share of residue payable out of or consisting of any estate or effects according to the value whereof duty shall have been paid, on the affidavit or inventory or account in conformity with this Act, the duty at the rate of one per cent. imposed by the Act 55 Geo. 3, c. 184 shall not be payable. And in respect of any succession to property according to the value whereof duty shall have been paid, on the affidavit or inventory or account in conformity with this Act, the duty at the rate of one per cent. imposed by the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), shall not be payable."

In this Act there is not to be found, any more than in the Probate Act, any intimation as to how the probate duty is to be paid, and it seems to me that the principle which governed the incidence of the old duties must govern these new ones which are substituted for the old duties by the modern Act, section 26 of which makes the old principle applicable to them. It is contended, however, that the present case is governed by In re Croft, Deane v. Croft. If I thought that that case were in point, I should consider it my duty to follow it, but in my opinion it is not in point. It relates to the duty imposed by section 38 upon voluntary settlements. It does not relate to the incidence of the duty as between specific and residuary legatees in the ordinary sense, but between appointees of various parts of a specific fund. In that case Kekewich, J., come to the conclusion that, in the absence of any provision by the Legislature as to the incidence of the duties, regard must be had to the intention of the testator. It seems to me that that general principle is not applicable as between specific and residuary legatees, and that the general principle laid down by Lord Selborne in Robertson v. Broadbent governs the case, and the specific legatees are entitled to their property free from the duty.

Reliance was placed upon section 41 of the Act of 1881, and it was said that that section indicates that the legacies are to bear their share of the duty because in some cases it releases legacies from the legacy duty formerly borne by them on the ground of their being liable to the increased probate duty imposed by the Act. That is a section of a limited application; it only applies in cases where the duty is payable at one per cent.—i.e., when the persons who take the benefits under the will are the testator's family. No doubt the Act relieves the specific legatees as well as the residuary legatee, but I apprehend that I cannot infer from that, that it was the intention of the Legislature that the incidence of the duty should be altered. If the estate were insufficient the specific legatees might be called upon to bear the duty, and if they were persons who were liable to pay one per cent., then the intention of the Legislature seems to be that they should be relieved. I think that the incidence of the duty remains as under the old Acts, and no part of it ought to fall upon the specific legatees so long as there is any general residue.

The second question is as to the estate duty which is payable under section 5 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 Vict. c. 7). Sub-section 5 of that section provides that the duties imposed by the section "are to be in addition to the stamp duties charged on the affidavit required from persons applying for probate or letters of administration in England or Ireland . . . and in addition to the stamp duties charged on such accounts of personal and movable property as are specified in section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by this Act." That is simply an addition to the stamp duty, and it was admitted at the Bar, that for the purpose of the present application no distinction could be made between the duties chargeable under section 27 of the Act of 1881 and those chargeable under section 5 of the Act of 1889. I think the same rule applies in the case of this duty, and it must be paid by the residuary legatee alone.

EASTON v. PENNY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Customary freehold—Lease—Notice to determine—Surrender by operation of law—Settled Estates Act, 1877—Settled Land Act, 1882—Licence of lord.

A testator, being entitled to a customary freehold held of a manor, according to the custom of which tenants could not grant leases for longer than a year and a day without the licence of the lord, devised the tenement by will to trustees upon trust for his widow for life, with remainder to his son. The testator died in December, 1877, having on the 15*th of June,* 1877, with the licence of the lord, let the premises in question to the two defendants, T. P. and T. S. P., on a repairing lease for twenty-one years from the 20*th of December,* 1876, at a yearly rent of £130, determinable at the end of fourteen years by one year's notice to the lessor, his representatives or assigns, expiring with that year.

On the 21*st of December,* 1889, T. S. P., one of the defendants, gave the testator's widow, who had been permitted by the trustees to receive the rents directly, notice of the defendants' intention to quit the premises on the 25*th of December,* 1890; and on the 13*th of August,* 1890, the widow purported to lease the premises for a term of seven years to the defendants, but without the licence of the lord, at a rent of £100, and with less onerous covenants. The widow died, and the trustees of the will brought this action, claiming that the original lease of the 15*th of June,* 1877, had never been duly determined, and that the new lease of the 13*th of August,* 1890, was inoperative.

Held, that the notice of the 21*st of December,* 1889, was bad, not having been served on the "representatives or assigns" of the lessor, and that the widow, the life tenant, had not in any way been constituted the agent of the trustees to receive such notice.

Held, also, that there had been no surrender of the old lease by operation of law by the purported grant of the new lease, the rule as to surrender not applying where the new lease is void or voidable; and that neither the Settled Estates Act, 1877, or the Settled Land Act, 1882, applied.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

as no trustees had been appointed to perfect the transaction under the latter Act; and, lastly, that, in any event, section 56 of the Settled Estates Act rendered necessary the licence of the lord to the grant of a new lease.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by the trustees of the will of Robert Herniman for a declaration that an indenture of lease of the 15th of June, 1877, had not been determined, and was a subsisting lease and binding on the defendants; and for a declaration that another lease of subsequent date—namely, the 13th of August, 1890—was inoperative, and for an order to have the same delivered up to be cancelled.

The point in dispute was whether the lease of the 15th of June, 1877, had been duly determined by the defendants, and a new lease of the same premises properly granted.

Robert Herniman was entitled to the freehold and inheritance, according to the custom of the manor of Taunton Deane, in Somerset, of a dwelling-house and yard, the subject of this action. According to the custom of that manor tenants had power to grant leases for one year and a day, but not for a longer term without the licence of the lord. By an indenture dated the 15th of June, 1877, with the licence of the lord of the manor, and made between Robert Herniman of the one part and the defendants, Thomas Penny and Thomas Stubbs Penny, of the other part, the customary freehold premises were demised to the defendants for a term of twenty-one years from the 25th of December, 1876, determinable as therein mentioned, at a yearly rent of £130. The defendants jointly and severally covenanted amongst other things to pay the rent, and to repair, paint, support, uphold, and maintain, both externally and internally, all buildings of every kind then standing or built upon, or thereafter during the said term to be erected upon the premises, or any part, and all the roofs, fences, and gates belonging to the premises in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner. The lease also contained a covenant "that if the said lessor or the said lessees, or their respective heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be desirous to determine the said term of twenty-one years at the expiration of the fourteenth year thereof, then and in such case it shall be lawful for him or them, or his or their representatives or assigns, so to do, on giving to the other of them, or his or their representatives or assigns, one year's notice in writing of such, his, or their desire, and thereupon, at the expiration of such fourteenth year; and upon due performance of the covenants herein contained up to the expiration of such fourteenth year, these presents, and all and singular the covenants and clauses herein contained, shall cease and determine and be utterly void."

Robert Herniman died on the 16th of December, 1877, and by his will, bequeathed his residuary freehold, customary freehold, and leasehold estates to the use of the plaintiffs Richard Easton and Henry Barker and of one Alfred Herniman, their heirs, executors, and administrators, in trust for the testator's wife, M. A. Herniman, during her widowhood, and after her death or remarriage for Alfred Herniman, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. The plaintiffs R. Easton and H. Barker and A. Herniman were admitted tenants of the customary freehold premises on the 28th of April, 1879. Alfred Herniman died on the 20th of March, 1880, having by his will, dated the 4th of December, 1878, devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate, including the said customary freehold, to the plaintiffs C. E. Herniman and E. Dyer.

Mrs. M. A. Herniman, the widow of Robert Herniman, as the life tenant under the will of Robert Herniman, was permitted by the trustees of the will to receive the rents of the property directly, without the intervention of the trustees, but did not otherwise exercise any control or management of the property.

On the 21st of December, 1889, the defendant Thomas Stubbs Penny alone gave Mrs. M. A. Herniman notice of his intention to quit the premises on the 25th of December, 1890. The plaintiffs alleged that this notice was bad, on the ground that Thomas Stubbs Penny was not the agent of the other defendant, Thomas Penny, for the purpose of giving such notice, nor was M. A. Herniman the representative or assign of Robert Herniman within the meaning of the covenant.

On the 16th of June, 1890, T. S. Penny sent to the plaintiffs R. Easton and H. Barker another notice in the following terms:—

"To Messrs. R. Easton and H. Barker, trustees of the will of the late Mr. R. Herniman.

"Gentlemen,—I hereby give you notice of my intention to quit and yield up possession of the yard, shop, cottages, &c., which I now rent, situate in East Reach, Taunton, at Christmas next. I sent a similar notice to Mrs. H. prior to Christmas last.

"Kindly acknowledge receipt of this notice and oblige."

By an indenture of the 13th of August, 1890, expressed to be made (but without the licence of the lord of the manor) between the said M. A. Herniman of the one part and the defendant T. S. Penny of the other part, after reciting that under the will of the said R. Herniman the said M. A. Herniman was entitled to possession or to the receipt of the rents and profits of the hereditaments thereby demised, for her life (determinable by her future marriage), it was witnessed that in consideration of the rent thereby reserved and of the lessee's covenants thereinafter contained, the said lessor, in exercise of the power for that purpose given to her by the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and of all other powers (if any) her thereunto enabling, demised the said customary freehold premises unto the said lessee to hold from the 25th of December, 1890, for the term of seven years at the yearly rent of £100 thereby reserved, and at the further rent in respect of insurance thereby also reserved, and under and subject to the covenants by the lessee, and the conditions therein contained. And the defendant T. S. Penny thereby covenanted, amongst other things, to pay the said rent of £100 and the further rent, and to repair, support, uphold, and maintain the interior of all buildings of every kind then standing or built upon, or thereafter during the said term to be erected upon the said premises, or any part thereof. And M. A. Herniman covenanted to repair and keep in good repair and condition the roofs of all the buildings upon the said premises, and the windows and outer doors thereof.

M. A. Herniman died on the 6th of October, 1890.

Neville, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiffs.—The original lease has not been determined by the notice given for the following reasons:—(1) The estate for widowhood of Mrs. M. A. Herniman is not an estate for life within the meaning of the Settled Estates Act, 1877. (2) There has been no licence by the lord of the manor for this lease, and by section 56 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, it is enacted that "nothing in this Act shall authorize the granting of a lease of any copyhold or customary hereditaments not warranted by the custom of the manor without the consent of the lord, nor otherwise prejudice or affect the rights of any lord of a manor." (3) There has been no surrender of the lease by operation of law. (4) There has been no express surrender of the lease under section 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, because Mrs. Herniman was not a tenant for life within that Act.

Haldane, Q.C., and Badcock, for the defendants.—There has here been surrender of the old lease by operation of law, the grant of the new one in effect so operating. A surrender need not be by deed, as the Statute of Frauds has not altered the old law in this respect. The acts from which the surrender has arisen are that the parties have agreed to the term being put an end to, and on that basis their position has been altered: Davison v. Gent, 5 W. R. 229, 1 H. & N. 74. The life tenant has the power of accepting surrenders under section 13 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and of granting a new lease under the Settled Estates Act. But it is said M. A. Herniman was not a tenant for life within the words "any person entitled to the possession or to the receipts of the rents and profits of any settled estates for an estate for any life" within section 46 of the Settled Estates Act. Lord Coke, however, in 42*a*, lays down that an estate during widowhood is an estate for life. Blackstone, vol. 2, cap. 8, p. 121, says the same thing. [ROMER, J.—Under which Act, assuming she is a tenant for life, can she accept surrenders?] Under both Acts, and it is not necessary that under the latter Act there should be trustees appointed. Again, it is said the property is copyhold, and that a licence from the lord is necessary. The absence of such a licence only gives a right of forfeiture, and the lease is good until forfeiture is effected: Scriven, 5th ed., p. 338. Further, in 1842 the manor was severed, and hence the lord's rights over the severed part, in which this property is, are extinguished.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—What cannot under the Settled Land Act, 1882, be done directly cannot be done indirectly. The life tenant is in a fiduciary position, and must obtain the best price possible for any interest disposed of by him, but instead of doing so here a new lease was granted with less burdensome covenants and a lower rent. The expression "good faith" in section 45, sub-section (3), of the Act of 1882 means good faith under the Act, and in accordance with its provisions. This dealing was not in good faith. Finally, M. A. Herniman was not a tenant for life within section 46 of the Settled Land Act, as she was not entitled to the possession.

ROMER, J.—This is a hard case for the defendants, but I do not see how I can free them from their liability under the lease of June 15, 1877. The first point to be considered is whether that lease was determined by notice, under the power contained in it. The notice of December 21, 1889, was not, in my judgment, a good notice, as it was not served on the lessor's "representatives or assigns," and on the evidence I am satisfied that Mary Ann Herniman was not the agent of the trustees under the lessor's will, to receive such notice, nor was she held out to the defendants by the trustees as the person to whom such notice should be sent; and I need scarcely say that because under the Settled Land Act Mary Ann Herniman as tenant for life could take a surrender of the lease, that did not make her the person who, under the power to determine contained in the lease, had to receive the notice to determine. Moreover, I may add that as under the power to determine, the notice was to be in writing, I think that any such notice (though no special form was necessary) ought on the face of it to have fairly stated that it was intended by or on behalf of both lessees to determine the lease, whereas the notice of December 21, 1889, merely stated on the face of it an intention of one of the lessees to quit and yield up "possession" at the Christmas of 1890. I need not refer to the notice of June 16, 1890, as that was clearly out of time. The result is that the defendants remained liable to pay for another seven years from Christmas, 1890, the full rent of £130, and that this was a liability which Mary Ann Herniman and the lessees were bound to have taken into consideration if and when she, as equitable tenant for life, and they or one of them, as lessees or lessee, were contemplating under the Settled Land Act or under the Settled Estates Act a new lease and a surrender of the old. What happened was this, M. A. Herniman and the defendant T. S. Penny appear to have been under the impression that the old lease had been determined by the notice of December 21, 1889, and accordingly arranged terms for a new lease to be granted to T. S. Penny for seven years from December 25, 1890, at the rent of £100 per annum. But before any binding contract is entered into or any new lease granted, T. S. Penny is informed in substance by Mr. Easton, one of the trustees, and the solicitor generally acting for the trustees, and those interested under the will that the old lease is not determined, and Mr. Easton accordingly declined to prepare the proposed new lease. Nevertheless, though he has this knowledge, the defendant T. S. Penny obtains from M. A. Herniman a lease for the seven years at the rent of £100 purporting to be made by her under the provisions of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and I cannot help thinking that M. A. Herniman (who had died before this trial) when she executed this new lease, was still under the impression that the old lease had been determined, especially as the new lease, which was prepared by the solicitor of T. S. Penny, says nothing about the old lease or its surrender.

The question I have to consider is whether under these circumstances the old lease has been determined. The defendants in the first place say a surrender of the old lease has been effected by operation of law by the grant of the new lease. I think this position is untenable. The trustees, who were the landlords under the old lease, were not parties to the new lease, nor was one of the lessees under the old lease a party to the new lease. But beyond this, even assuming that M. A. Herniman was for this purpose to be regarded as the lessor and T. S. Penny as the lessee under the old lease, I think there would be no surrender here by operation of law. The rule as to implied surrender of an old by a new lease does not apply when the new lease is void or voidable. Now, seeing that when this new lease was taken its sole effect was, to the knowledge of T. S. Penny, at the time merely to relieve him from a liability of £30 a year for seven years, and that the grantor was to his knowledge only a tenant for life acting on behalf of all interested in the settled estate, then, whether T. S. Penny tries to support the lease as an exercise of the powers conferred by the Settled Estates Act, 1877, or of those conferred by the Settled Land Act, I think that in either case the new lease, even if not void, was certainly voidable, and ought now to be voided at the instance of the plaintiffs.

But then the defendants put their case in another form, and say that under the Settled Land Act M. A. Herniman could have taken a surrender of the lease, and that what has taken place has amounted to an agreement by her with the defendants to take a surrender of, to determine the old lease, which, being followed by the new lease and by the defendant T. S. Penny remaining in or taking possession under that new lease, operated as a surrender of, or determination of, the old lease. Now, no doubt, if a lessor and a lessee agree, even verbally, to determine a lease, and that is acted upon and followed up by the lessor taking possession of the demised premises, or doing that which amounts to his taking possession, then the lease is determined. But in the present case, even assuming that for the purpose of the point I am considering M. A. Herniman is to be regarded as the lessor and T. S. Penny as the lessee, yet I cannot come to the conclusion that there ever was an agreement come to by M. A. Herniman to determine the old lease, or that M. A. Herniman did anything which amounted to her taking possession as against the lessee of the demised premises. There was no change of possession, and I have already indicated my view as to how M. A. Herniman came to grant the new lease. I do not believe she was thinking of or at all contemplating any surrender of the old lease. I may add that the only Act under which M. A. Herniman was authorized to take a surrender was the Settled Land Act, for section 7 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877, which forms part of the sections in that Act which refer to leases by the court, does not, in my opinion, authorize a merely equitable tenant for life, not being a lessor, to take a surrender not sanctioned by the court.

Now M. A. Herniman was not authorized by the Settled Land Act as tenant for life to take a surrender of the old lease merely to free T. S. Penny and his co-lessee from their liability to pay the rent of £130 a year, and to take in lieu thereof T. S. Penny's liability under a new lease for £100 a year. Had she purported to do so she would have done that which was equivalent to a breach of trust on her part, and I decline to hold as against this dead lady that she was guilty of any such improper act. There was no surrender, in fact, and I do not see that any, in fact, was contemplated, and I do not think I am at liberty to imply one, or any agreement for one. I need not, further, decide whether or not, if the old lease had been out of the way, the new lease could have been supported under either the Settled Estates Act or the Settled Land Act. For the old lease was, in fact, existing when the new lease was granted, and, that being so, it appears to me clear that the new lease was not justified under either Act. Part of the argument submitted on behalf of the defendants appears to me to assume in effect the following circular form :—"If the old lease was out of the way, the new lease being justified, it operated as a surrender of the old. The old lease being surrendered, the new lease is justified and good." I may, however, point out that there are difficulties in the way of the defendants in supporting the new lease under either Act. First, as to the Settled Estates Act. The demised premises were customary freeholds. Whatever may have been the effect of the deed of 1842 (which was put in), it did not, in my opinion, turn the premises for all purposes into ordinary freeholds, or prevent them from being customary freeholds held of a manor or reputed manor, nor did it enable the tenants to say that they could thereafter lease the premises for any term without the consent of the lord. Defendant's own witness, the steward, proved that these premises have up to the present time been always treated by their owners and the lord of the manor or reputed manor as customary freeholds, and that such a lease as that of the 13th of August, 1890, was not warranted by the custom of the manor without the consent of the lord. Then section 56 of the Settled Estates Act applies, and shows that M. A. Herniman, even assuming she is to be treated as tenant for life entitled to lease under section 46 (which I need not decide), was not employed to grant this new lease. The reason for section 56 being put in the Act may have been the protection of the lords of manors; but the section does not simply provide that the rights of any lord of the manor shall not be prejudiced or affected—the earlier part is imperative and binds all persons, and the reason for it may well have been to prevent the possibility of any liability to forfeiture. At any rate, it is there; the court ought to act upon it. Then as to the Settled Land Act, 1882. At the time the new lease was executed no trustees under that Act had been appointed, and section 45, sub-section (1), applies, and for reasons before appearing I could not hold T. S. Penny protected by sub-section (3). The lease, therefore, could not be justified under this Act, as the later amending Act of 1890 was not in operation on the 13th of August, 1890.

*Company — Winding up — Directors — Misfeasance or breach of trust—Liability of directors—Ultrà vires—Negligence—Form of summons—Evidence required from applicant—Companies (Winding-up) Act*, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

A summons in the voluntary winding up of a company under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, directed the respondents to attend on the hearing of an application by the liquidator for a declaration that all persons, being directors of the company, who in any manner authorized, sanctioned, or participated in the two payments to G. out of the company's moneys therein specified, were jointly and severally liable to repay to the liquidator the amount so paid, with interest at five per cent.

The grounds of the liquidator's application not being sufficiently defined thereby, this form of summons is not correct. A summons like this, with the affidavits in support, should show the nature of any misfeasance thereby charged.

In order to make directors liable under the section for negligence, the court must be satisfied that they did not really exercise their judgment and discretion as agents of the company in the transaction complained of.

The directors of a financial company having, in exercise of their powers, resolved to lend money of the company to A. against his promissory note and a deposit of shares by him, the resolution was immediately acted upon by handing over a cheque to the solicitor of the company.

Held, that this was not in itself an act of misfeasance.

Summons.

This was an application by the liquidator, under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, in the voluntary winding up of the company, seeking to make liable for alleged misfeasance or breach of trust, as directors of the above company, Major-General Sir J. W. Campbell, Mr. W. Adams, the Earl of Mayo, Mr. F. Buchanan, and Colonel H. J. Willett, who were named as respondents to the summons. The application was heard before Vaughan Williams, J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division. The summons directed the respondents to attend on the hearing of an application by the liquidator that it might be declared that all persons being directors of the company who in any manner authorized, sanctioned, or participated in the payment to Mr. A. M. Green of the sum of £250 of the company's money on the 5th of August, 1891, and in payment to Mr. A. M. Green of the sum of £1,000 of the company's moneys on or about the 26th of August, 1891, were jointly and severally liable to repay to the liquidator the amount so paid with interest at five per cent., and for an order that an inquiry might be made what persons were directors when such payments were made, and which of them in any way authorized, sanctioned, or participated in the making of such payments.

The company was registered in May, 1891, and went into voluntary liquidation in April, 1892. On the 30th of April, 1892, an order was made in the Chancery Division for continuing the voluntary winding up, subject to the supervision of the court. The memorandum of association authorized the directors, inter alia, "to negotiate loans for the company or other persons or bodies, to lend moneys, securities, and other properties, to discount and accept bills and deal in all kinds of securities and negotiable instruments, to become securities and guarantors for any purpose, and generally to carry on the business of capitalists, financiers, bankers, merchants, and money-dealers," and "to promote and form, and to assist in promoting and forming any company, and to guarantee the issue of, take, or otherwise acquire, hold, and dispose of shares, debentures, or other securities in any company, and to pay and contribute, either in cash or shares, to the expense of promoting or establishing any company or association."

On the 5th of August, 1891, a resolution was passed at a board meeting, "that, Mr. A. M. Green having requested an advance of £250 against his promissory note at one month's date, and a deposit of 1,000 ordinary shares of this company, paid up, his request be granted, and that a cheque be and is hereby drawn in his favour for £250," the respondents Willett, Adams, and Buchanan being the directors present; and the cheque was thereupon drawn and signed by these respondents.

The minute book for the 5th of August was signed by the respondent Lord Mayo, who was present with all the other respondents at a board meeting on the next day, when he first heard of the transaction, but he proved that he had not only not acquiesced therein by such signature of the minute book or otherwise, but had strongly objected to what had been done. Willett's evidence satisfied the court that he had used due discretion in the matter.

On the 26th of August, 1891, there was another board meeting, and Green having applied for an advance of £2,000 for twenty-one days upon the security of his interest in a contract, and offered for such advance a bonus of £300, it was resolved to advance Green £1,000 upon a first charge upon the contract, and also the deposit of 2,000 ordinary shares of the company, the bonus for the loan to be £150, and to be included in the charge, and a cheque was therefore drawn accordingly and signed by the respondents Campbell, Buchanan, and Adams. The respondent Willett was not present at the passing of the resolution, but was present at the transaction of subsequent business at the board meeting. He also showed that he had protested against this loan to Green both before and after it was made. The names of the parties to the above-mentioned contract were left in blank in the resolution of the board, and the date was not given, but there was evidence that Green was engaged in bringing out a company which was to be called "The Pioneers of Mashonaland Syndicate (Limited)" at this time, and that the directors present at the meeting knew the nature of the contract, which related to the promotion of this company, and believed that its promotion would be beneficial to their company, and made the advance to assist in bringing it out.

The respondent Lord Mayo attended none of the board meetings between the 7th of August and the 5th of November, 1891, when he first became aware of this loan to Green, and expressed his entire disapproval thereof.

There was evidence that the cheques were handed to the solicitor of the company, with instructions to hand them to Green on his giving the agreed security.

Both cheques were handed to Green, and he received the proceeds of them. On the 6th of August, 1891, he gave to the company the promissory note mentioned in the resolution of the previous day, but he never deposited any shares with the company, or gave them any charge or security. He never repaid any part of the money advanced.

Judgment was subsequently obtained against Green by the company, but nothing was recovered by the company under the judgment.

In March, 1892, a receiving order was made against Green, and there was evidence that his creditors were not likely to receive any dividend from his estate. Under these circumstances such negligence in their undertaking and conduct of these transactions as would make the respondents respectively alleged to be concerned therein liable under the 10th section of the Act, was charged against them by the liquidator.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Shearman, for the liquidator.—These directors were trustees for the company, with power, no doubt, to lend money and conduct financial business under the company's memorandum of association, but under an obligation to act as trustees in using the power. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—There are two separate questions here. First, were the directors acting within their powers or not? Secondly, if acting within their powers, did they so conduct these transactions as to make them honest exercises of their powers?] The question here is surely one of negligence rather than honesty. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I do not think that you could sue the respondents Willett and Lord Mayo at law, for such negligence as is alleged against them here.] At any rate, as regards the other respondents, the evidence shows that they have been guilty of such negligence in the conduct of these transactions as would render them liable under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which is now substituted for section 165 of the Act of 1862.

H. Terrell, for Willett, referred to Speight v. Gaunt, 32 W. R. 435, 9 App. Cas. 1.

Rowden, for Lord Mayo.

Bradford, for Buchanan.—The directors have only shown imprudence here at most, and directors can only be made liable for gross negligence. The evidence is not sufficient to charge them with fraud or misfeasance: see Overend & Gurney Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 H. L. 480, at p. 495, and Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn, 36 W. R. 641, at p. 644, 12 App. Cas. 652, at p. 662. The loss was occasioned by the solicitor handing over the cheques without having received the securities. The solicitor is not the agent of the directors, but of the company.

Eve, for Campbell.

Swinfen Eady, for Adams.—The directors were justified in relying on the solicitor's advice. There must be crassa negligentia to make directors liable for negligence, In re Faure Electric Accumulator Co. (Limited), 37 W. R. 116, 40 Ch. D. 141. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Crassa negligentia represents a rule which is worthless for practical application. He referred to the opinion expressed by Lord Esher, M.R. (then Brett, L.J.), in Marzetti's case, 28 W. R. 541, that a director, to be held liable, must be "guilty of such negligence as would make him liable in an action."]

Cozen-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—We do not allege ultrà vires, or fraud or dishonesty, but such negligence as would make the directors liable at law. They are consequently liable under section 10 of the Act of 1890.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I do not think that this application can succeed as against Lord Mayo and Colonel Willett for the reasons which have already been stated by me in the course of the argument.

Before going any further I must say a few words with regard to the form of this summons, though my decision does not rest on this. [His lordship read the summons, the substance of which is set out above.] This form is not convenient, and does not seem to be correct. It is not in accordance with the form (No. 758) in Palmer's Company Precedents, 5th ed., p. 847, or with that given in Emden's Winding-up Practice, 4th ed., p. 708. The summons does not sufficiently define the grounds upon which the liquidator's application is based. It does not go on to say on what grounds it is suggested that the payment was wrongful, or an act of misfeasance, so as to make the directors responsible. It may, perhaps, be said that it is not correct to state the grounds in a summons like this. The summons might have been so framed as to give some sort of information as to how the payment was tainted. It might be sufficient if this was shown by the affidavit. But no one reading the affidavits in support, could learn whether the liquidator meant to say that the directors had acted ultrà vires or were guilty of fraud, or what was the nature of the misfeasance charged against them. I wish to point out that the summons, with the affidavits, leaves it too much in the dark as to what is charged, but I am not going to decide the case on this.

The court knows now from Mr. Cozens-Hardy what the liquidator's charge is. He does not say that the directors have done something ultrà vires the company, or been guilty of fraud or dishonesty, but that they have been guilty of negligence of such a character as to bring themselves within the scope of section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

To answer the question whether that was so or not, one must first look at the section to see what cases come within it, and then see what is the nature of the acts complained of here, and whether they are covered by any of those cases. The section enables the court in a winding up to order directors and others to pay money or compensation when they have "misapplied, or retained, or become liable or accountable for any moneys or property of the company, or been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company." Mr. Cozens-Hardy did not say that what was charged was within any of these words except "misfeasance or breach of trust." It has been said that you could not charge a director under the section unless you could show misfeasance in the nature of a breach of trust. However that may be, it is plain that if a director is guilty of such negligence that it cannot be truly said that in doing what he has done he has attempted to perform the duties of a director, then such director is guilty of misfeasance. To use Mr. Cozens-Hardy's words, if the directors did not bonâ fide exercise their discretion and judgment as agents of the company, that was misfeasance within the section. I adopt that construction, except with regard to the words bonâ fide, and say that, in order to make the directors liable, you must be able to find that they did not really exercise their judgment and discretion in this way.

What is complained of? This is important, because, whatever is the definition of misfeasance, a director cannot be made liable under this section unless damage has resulted from what he did. If there was an earlier act which did the damage and lost the money, you could not make a director liable merely because he was guilty of later acts of misfeasance from which no damage resulted. However you might inquire into later conduct, as throwing light upon earlier acts. [His lordship then read the resolution of the 5th of August, and decided that, in view of the very wide terms of the memorandum of association, the mere passing of this resolution was not an act of misfeasance.]

But it is said that there was misfeasance because a cheque was drawn and the resolution was immediately acted on by handing over the £250 to the solicitor of the company for the purpose of its being at once handed to Green. If I had arrived at the conclusion that that had been done, I should have said that the directors who advanced on security, without waiting for the security to be given, could not have used any discretion or judgment at all. For to do so would be so unbusinesslike an act, that it could not be called a mere error of judgment or imprudent conduct. It is such an act that, to apply the test of Lord Esher, M.R., in Marzetti's case, referred to in Re Faure Electric Accumulator Co., it is plain that an agent so acting would incur a common law liability. But the affidavits do not make out that the directors did act in that way. I do not think the directors did direct the solicitor to hand over the cheque without getting the deposit of shares, though I have had doubts about this, having regard to some of their subsequent conduct. The absence for a long time of any complaint, although the directors knew that the shares had not been deposited, goes a long way to show that the directors did not mean that this cheque should be withheld in the meantime.

As to the transaction of the 26th of August, there is more to be said in favour of the directors having exercised their discretion. When one looked at the affidavits it was plain that this advance was made in the interests of the company, as it was to help Green in bringing out a second company, the existence of which would be for the benefit of this company. As to the contract, the directors knew the nature of it, and, though there were the blanks showing that the directors did not know the parties to the contract, the way in which a contract is carried out is a matter of detail rather than substance, for which the directors might fairly rely on their solicitors.

On the whole, the liquidator, on whom the onus is, has failed to make out that the directors did not really exercise their judgment and discretion, and the matters being intrà vires, the application accordingly fails. It must be dismissed as against Lord Mayo and Colonel Willett, with costs to be paid to them, and as against the other respondents, without costs.

Summons dismissed.

CORPORATION OF LEICESTER v. FRANK BROWN. (a.)

Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3—"Building"—Meaning of term—Jurisdiction of magistrates—Jurisdiction of High Court.

In a proceeding before justices under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, for erecting a building in any street beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, the question whether the thing erected is a "building" within the meaning of the section is a question of fact to be determined by the justices, provided the thing erected is of such a nature that it is capable of being a building, and in such a case the High Court has no jurisdiction to review their decision.

A photographer erected a wooden structure, 9 feet 6 inches long, 3 feet wide, and 7 feet high. It was roofed over, and had a glass front and a door to enter by at one end. It was fastened into the ground by four posts, forming part of the structure, and let into the ground to the depth of nine to twelve inches. It was used for the purpose of exhibiting photographs therein, but there was no approach to it for the public.

Held, that the structure was of such a nature that it was capable of being a building.

The justices having decided that the structure was a building within the meaning of section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888,

Held, by Hawkins, J., that the court had no jurisdiction to review their decision.

This was a case stated by the justices of the Borough of Leicester.

The appellant Frank Brown was a photographer carrying on his business in a house fronting a street called the London-road and at the corner of a street called Saxe Coburg-street, within the district of the Urban Sanitary Authority of the Borough of Leicester. He had erected a wooden structure in front of his house and fronting to the London-road and at a spot 30 feet beyond the front main wall of the house on one side and 27 feet beyond the front main wall of the house on the other side. The structure was 9 feet 6 inches long, 3 feet wide from back to front, and 7 feet high. It was roofed over, had a glass front, and a door to enter by at one end. It was fastened to the ground by four posts forming part of the structure, and let into the ground to the depth of 9 to 12 inches. It was used by the appellant for the purpose of exhibiting photographs therein, but there was no approach to it for the public. The appellant's house had no shop window fronting the London-road, and the structure served the purpose of a shop window. The structure had been erected by the appellant without the written consent of the urban sanitary authority.

An information had been preferred by John Storey, town clerk, on behalf of the Urban Sanitary Authority of the Borough of Leicester, against the appellant under section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888, for erecting a building beyond the front main wall of the house without the written consent of the urban sanitary authority. The justices had convicted the appellant, being of opinion that the structure was a "building" within the meaning of section 3 of the Act.

The justices had also convicted the appellant upon an information for building an addition to his house without the written consent of the urban sanitary authority, and there was an appeal from this conviction, but it was not argued, and is not material to this report.

Section 3 of the Act enacts that ". . . it shall not be lawful in any urban district without the written consent of the urban authority to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of such house or building, beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street. . . ."

J. F. P. Rawlinson, for the appellant.—This is not a building. The line must be drawn somewhere. A building must be permanent, not a mere show case: Hibbert v. Acton Local Board, 5 T. L. R. 274; Stevens v. Gourley, 8 W. R. 85; Slauyhter v. Mayor of Sunderland, 60 L. J. M. C. 91, 39 W. R. Dig. 113; Brown v. The Local Board for Health of Holyhead, 11 W. R. 71; Moir v. Williams, 40 W. R. 69, [1892] 1 Q. B. 264.

Toller, for the respondents.—The object of the statute was to have a fairly regular front of houses. Hibbert v. Acton Local Board is distinguishable. That was a decision under a bye-law which had not for its object preserving the line of houses, it was aimed against erecting new buildings. This structure is to be used as long as the owner resides there, and is fastened into the ground. The court will not interfere with the decision of the magistrates that this is a building; it is a question of fact: Vestry of St. George's, Hanover-square v. Sparrow, 12 W. R. 832; Bowes v. Law, 18 W. R. 640, L. R. 9 Eq. 636; Richardson v. Brown, 49 J. P. 661.

Rawlinson replied.

POLLOCK, B.—The conviction must be confirmed. No authority has been cited that in any way fetters us. In Hibbert v. Acton Local Board there was an expression of opinion that a conservatory attached to a house was not a building, but that was on the construction of a bye-law which provided for the solidity of buildings which should be erected, and provided that they should be solidly built of brick or stone. Such a provision if construed to apply to conservatories would make them useless and prevent their being erected. That bye-law had a very different object to this statute. The case in which a wooden movable pay-box was held not to be a building, was decided on the ground of the movable character and nature of the pay-box. In the present case, the building is not movable, but its object is to assist in the carrying on of the business of the photographer.

The statute does not say "house or other building," it is "house or building," and it may well contemplate such a structure as this unless there is some reason to the contrary. The Act was passed to prevent the erection of buildings in such a position as to be injurious to the access of light and fresh air. One has often seen in urban districts some small erection in a courtyard, such as cages for keeping animals or birds, and these might possibly not be buildings, but a structure of the dimensions of this one might be. What is this particular thing? It is 30 feet beyond the front of the house, 9 feet 6 inches long by 3 feet wide, and 7 feet high; there is a door to enter at one end, and it is fastened to the ground. It is to be there permanently for the purpose of trade. It seems to me that it is of such a nature that it may properly be called a building.

HAWKINS, J.—I think there would have been a good deal in the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant if we had been jurors. My mind is not altogether clear as to whether this is a building.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If the structure were larger and used for taking photographs, I think it would be a building. But on the whole I think it is a building. There may be circumstances where it is quite impossible as a point of law that a structure could be a building. But where it is a question of fact whether it is intended to be permanent so that it can be a building, two people may take different views, and, if so, the question whether it is a building is a question of fact, and the magistrates are invested by the Legislature with the power to decide. They have exercised their discretion. As they have jurisdiction to determine the fact, and they have determined it, we have no jurisdiction to review their decision.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J.) — Aug. 8, 1892.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF SURREY AND BELL. (a.)

Criminal law — Conviction by magistrate — Appeal to quarter sessions on ground of excessive punishment — Practice — Respondent not appearing — Jurisdiction of justices to quash conviction.

A person was convicted and sentenced by a magistrate for ill-treating a horse. Upon his appealing in due form to the court of quarter sessions upon the ground only of excessive punishment, the prosecutor failed to appear, and the justices quashed the conviction altogether.

Held, that, since the prosecutor failed in his duty to adduce evidence upon the appeal in order to justify the sentence, the justices had no materials before them to enable them to decide that any punishment was proper, and that they were bound to quash the sentence; and that, as, upon the authority of R. v. Vipont, 2 Burr. 1163, a conviction without a sentence was bad, the justices had jurisdiction to quash the whole conviction.

Rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up in order that it might be quashed an order of the Surrey Court of Quarter Sessions of the 5th of April, 1892, quashing a conviction made by a metropolitan police magistrate, upon the ground that the court of quarter session had no jurisdiction to make such order. The grounds alleged for such want of jurisdiction were that the notice of appeal served upon the prosecutor set forth that the ground of appeal was that the punishment was excessive only, and no appeal against the conviction was before the court, and, further, that the said notice of appeal was bad on the face of it.

The defendant, Philip Henry Bell, was convicted on the 25th of November, 1891, of having cruelly ill-treated a horse, and was sentenced by the magistrate to fourteen days' imprisonment with hard labour.

The defendant duly served his notice of appeal, which was, so far as material, in the following form: "Take notice that the above-named Philip Henry Bell intends to appeal against the decision of Montagu Williams, Esq., who this day sentenced him to fourteen days' imprisonment for cruelty to a horse, upon the ground that the punishment is excessive. Dated this 25th day of November, 1891. To the chief clerk and to the prosecutor. G. F. Bell, solicitor for the appellant."

The appeal came on for hearing at the January Surrey Sessions, and by consent of the counsel for the parties stood over to the April sessions.

At the April sessions no one appeared on behalf of the prosecutor, and the court, upon the application of counsel for the defendant, quashed the conviction altogether.

The prosecutor then obtained this rule, which now came on for argument.

Poland, Q.C., and Elliott, for the defendant, showed cause against the rule.—The whole case was before the court of quarter sessions for rehearing; it was therefore incumbent upon the prosecutor to appear in order to prove the facts which justified the conviction. As he did not appear the court was bound to quash the whole conviction: R. v. Purdey, 13 W. R. 75, 5 B. & S. 909; Ex parte Hopwood, 15 Q. B. 121; R. v. The Justices of Surrey, L. R. 5 Q. B. 466, 18 W. R. Dig. 48; R. v. Chantrell, 23 W. R. 707, L. R. 10 Q. B. 587; R. v. The Justices of Middlesex, 25 W. R. 510, 2 Q. B. D. 516.

Colam, for the prosecutor, in support of the rule.—The jurisdiction of the court of quarter sessions was limited by the defendant's notice of appeal. That notice stated the ground of appeal as excess of punishment, and the sessions, therefore, could only modify or increase the punishment. They had no power to quash the conviction altogether, for that was not asked by the notice of appeal. [CAVE, J.—But a conviction without a sentence is bad upon the authority of R. v. Vipont, 2 Burr. 1163, therefore if the justices could not come to the conclusion that any punishment was proper, they were obliged in effect to quash.] It lay upon the defendant to show that the punishment was improper, and this he did not do. Besides, the notice of appeal was bad for not stating to what court the appeal was to be made: R. v. Recorder of Liverpool, 15 Q. B. 1070. This misled us into thinking that the appeal was to be to the London Sessions, and was the cause of our not being at the Surrey Sessions.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Our decision in this case must not be taken as applying in any way to the merits of this case, for they are not before us. We have to determine a point of law, and nothing else. In my opinion this writ of certiorari ought not to go. The practice pursued at an appeal to quarter sessions is thus laid down in Dickinson's Quarter Sessions, p. 642, "When the appeal is brought before the sessions by the proof, or on the admissions above-described" (i.e., proof or admission of the service of the notice of appeal), "and is not adjourned, the leading counsel for the respondent, as being the party sustaining the order or other act complained of, opens his case on the merits and adduces evidence in support of it without being confined to the witnesses examined before the magistrates below." Now, in this case the prosecutor, the respondent to the appeal, was the person who wished to sustain the punishment which had been awarded by the magistrate, and which was undoubtedly called in question by the notice of appeal. It was, therefore, incumbent upon him to appear in support of the punishment. The reason of the practice is well stated by Lord Kenyon in R. v. Newbury, 4 T. R. 475, and Buller, J., assents to his view, "where the appeal comes on to be heard naked and destitute of all evidence before the court, those who have done the act ought to establish the propriety of it by evidence." On this occasion, it appears to me, the practice was rightly followed. The magistrates might have altered the conviction in the amount of the punishment, but there was no one to say either that the punishment awarded was right or what punishment would have been right, therefore the court had nothing to go upon in attempting to amend the punishment. Or they might have quashed the sentence altogether and left the conviction standing; but if they had done that the case would have come within the decision in R. v. Vipont, that a conviction without a sentence is bad. So that if they had touched the conviction in that way they would in effect have quashed it, which is what they have in fact done. The points upon which this decision rests are technical legal points, but I think they are founded upon good sense and substantial reasons. In my opinion this writ of certiorari ought not to go.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, when one considers the practice which is observed at quarter sessions, that the magistrates adopted the only course that was open to them. A conviction consists of two parts—the verdict and the judgment or sentence, and a man may appeal against the whole conviction or either part of it. Here the defendant appealed against the judgment, not against the verdict. At the sessions he put himself right by proving the service of his notice of appeal, and the prosecutor did not appear.

Now upon appeals to this court the evidence which was given in the court below is put before us, and it lies upon the appellant to prove that the judgment in the court below upon that evidence was wrong. But upon an appeal from magistrates to quarter sessions the court has no evidence at all before it of what passed in the court below, and it cannot form a judgment upon the words of the conviction itself. Therefore, where the verdict is objected to the respondents have to begin and prove the facts upon which they rely, and they are not confined to matters which was proved in the court below. Again, when the adjudication and not the verdict is appealed against the court has no materials upon which to form an opinion that this or that sentence ought to have been imposed; the respondents must establish the facts which justify the judgment. In this case the respondents were not there to do that, and the defendant naturally did not attempt to show what sentence would have been right: he only said that the sentence of fourteen days was not right: there was no one who could satisfy the justices that any punishment was right, and, therefore, they could only say that this adjudication was wrong. If they had simply struck out the sentence the conviction would have been bad; and I think that the justices were right in going to the full legal consequences of what they were bound to do, for if they had taken away the sentence, the conviction could certainly have been brought up to us to be quashed, and the justices only did at once what it would have been necessary for us to do at a later stage.

REG. v. WAITE. (a.)

Criminal law—Carnal knowledge of girl under the age of thirteen—Prisoner infant under the age of fourteen—Incapacity—Presumption of law—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.

A male person under the age of fourteen years is presumed by the law to be incapable of having carnal knowledge, and cannot be convicted under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, of having carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of thirteen years.

Case stated by Wright, J., on July 29, 1892, as follows:—

Enos Waite, aged thirteen, was convicted before me at the last assizes for the county of Warwick of the felony of carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen years of age, namely, of eight years of age. The offence was fully proved. I passed sentence of two months' imprisonment and whipping, but I reserved this case on the question of law which arose at the trial whether a male of less than fourteen years of age can be guilty of an offence against section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act.

See as to rape:—Reg. v. Groombridge, 7 C. & P. 582; Reg. v. Phillips, 8 C. & P. 736, 1 Hale P. C. 631.

He is also sentenced to a concurrent term of imprisonment for two months upon an indictment for a common assault upon another girl of eight years of age. The sentence of whipping will not be executed unless before the expiration of the two months the conviction for the felony is affirmed by the court.

If the conviction for felony is wrong, the punishment of whipping (which seems most appropriate to such cases) cannot be inflicted.

The prisoner was not represented.

Stubbins, for the prosecution, mentioned, in addition to the authorities referred to in the case, R. v. Eldershaw, 3 C. & P. 396; Reg. v. Brimilow, 9 C. & P. 366, 2 Moody C. C. 122, 1 Hale P. C. 25.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Hale states the law (at p. 630 of his Pleas of the Crown) as follows:—"An infant under the age of fourteen years is presumed by law unable to commit a rape, and therefore, it seems, cannot be guilty of it, and though in other felonies malitia supplet ætatem in some cases as hath been shown, yet it seems as to this fact the law presumes him impotent as well as wanting discretion." Unless there is some clear reason for thinking that the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, has altered the law in this respect, we must hold that this question is governed by the common law as stated by Hale in this passage. Although, as Hale says, in the case of other felonies it may be possible to show the existence of malice in an infant under the age of fourteen years, yet in the case of rape the law presumes an incapacity which is physical and not mental, and judges have very properly refused to admit evidence tending to show that the physical capacity existed in individual cases. There is a presumptio juris which cannot be got over; the law is so laid down by Hale, and has remained the same ever since his time, and there is nothing in the Criminal Law Amendment Act to remove the presumption. The case of Reg. v. Brimilow is an authority that an infant under fourteen years may upon an indictment for rape be convicted of an assault, but it does not alter the law as to a conviction for rape or attempted rape. Here there is no question as to the attempt; that did not come before the jury.

There is the second conviction for a common assault, to which no objection is taken; that conviction, therefore, stands, but the conviction under section 4 must be quashed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The authorities upon this point are uniform from the time of Hale downwards. This conviction is for the full offence, no question arising as to the attempt. The conviction for a common assault is not objected to, the result is that the prisoner must suffer the sentence of two months' imprisonment which has been imposed for that offence, but he cannot suffer the punishment of whipping to which he was sentenced for the graver offence.

POLLOCK, B., CAVE and BRUCE, JJ., concurred.

Conviction under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, quashed.

HOYLE v. HOYLE. (a.)

Guarantee—Parol—Recital in will—"Note or memorandum in writing"—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 3, c. 3), s. 4.

A testator, being in partnership with the two defendants, and his son being indebted to the firm, verbally agreed to "guarantee" such indebtedness. By his will he recited that his son was indebted to the firm, and that he had "guaranteed" the firm against loss in respect of such debt, and he directed that his son should stand released from all personal liability for it. By a codicil he confirmed the "guarantee."

Held, that, if there was such a guarantee as the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds referred to at all, there was in the will and codicil a sufficient note or memorandum in writing within the meaning of the section to take the case out of the operation of it.

Semble, that a promise to pay made by a person to himself and others was not a guarantee at all within the Statute of Frauds.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The question was whether a recital in a will was a sufficient "note or memorandum in writing" of a parol guarantee or indemnity within the meaning of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds.

From February, 1877, till his death in December, 1885, John Theodore Hoyle, the testator, was a member of the firm of Hoyle, Shipley, & Hoyle, which carried on business as solicitors at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

From the year 1871 till his death in September, 1879, Savile Richard Hoyle, the testator's son, was practising as a solicitor in London, and acted as agent for the firm of Hoyle, Shipley, & Hoyle. He having become indebted to his father and to the firm, it was arranged that he should execute and give to his father, J. T. Hoyle, certain mortgages to secure the amount due from him to his father and the firm, and that J. T. Hoyle should guarantee to the firm whatever balance might ultimately be found due from S. R. Hoyle to the firm. Pursuant to the arrangement S. R. Hoyle executed and gave to J. T. Hoyle certain mortgages, and J. T. Hoyle thereupon verbally agreed to guarantee to the firm S. R. Hoyle's indebtedness. This guarantee was described in an affidavit of the defendant Joseph Aynsley Davidson Shipley, one of the two surviving partners of the firm, as a guarantee "to our said firm" of "whatever balance might ultimately be found due from the said Savile Richard Hoyle to our said firm." In the affidavit of the defendant Theodore Hoyle, the other surviving partner, it was described as a guarantee to "the said Joseph Aynsley Davidson Shipley and myself against any loss in respect of the indebtedness of my said brother to our said firm, and that my father could either pay the amounts which might be found due from my said late brother, S. R. Hoyle, or that my father's account with the firm should be debited therewith."

By his will, dated the 20th of August, 1879, subsequently to the guarantee, J. T. Hoyle recited (paragraph 14) that his son, Savile Richard Hoyle, was indebted to him and to the firm of Hoyle, Shipley, & Hoyle in divers sums of money for loans and otherwise, and might become further indebted, and that the testator had guaranteed the firm against loss in respect of the same indebtedness. And he directed that the aggregate amount of interest in which the said S. R. Hoyle should be indebted at the testator's death to him alone, or to him along with his partners in the said firm, should be brought into hotchpot in ascertaining the amount or value of his share, to be held upon trust for his wife and children under his will, and that the said S. R. Hoyle should stand released from all personal liability for or in respect of the same debts.

By a codicil to his will, dated the 31st of August, 1881, the testator (clause 7) confirmed the guarantee mentioned in the 14th paragraph of his will.

The testator died on the 23rd of December, 1885, and his will and codicil were duly proved on the 6th of January, 1887.

The present action was commenced for administration of the testator's estate, the two defendants being the testator's executors as well as being his surviving co-partners. Upon an application made by Annie Hanson Nelson, who then had the conduct of the action, for the judge's opinion under ord. 55, r. 69, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, an inquiry was ordered, on the 12th of April, 1892, on the point of law whether the testator was liable at his death under any, and what, guarantees or indemnities to the firm of which he was a member in respect of any debt due to such firm by Savile Richard Hoyle.

The chief clerk by his certificate dated the 9th of May, 1892, found that the testator was liable under his verbal guarantee to the firm in respect of the debt due to the firm from S. R. Hoyle.

Upon a summons taken out to vary the chief clerk's certificate, on the 9th of July, 1892, Kekewich, J., being of opinion that there was no promise or note or memorandum in writing of an agreement by the testator to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of S. R. Hoyle within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, ordered that the certificate be varied by finding that the defendants were not entitled to the benefit of any such guarantee or indemnity as in the order of the 12th of April, 1892, mentioned.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and H. Greenwood, for the appellants.—(1) If there is here such a guarantee as the Statute of Frauds applies to, the recital in the will is a sufficient note or memorandum to satisfy the statute, which merely touches the evidence of the contract, not the contract itself: Sievewright v. Archibald, 17 Q. B. 103 (per Erle, J., at p. 107); Barkworth v. Young, 5 W. R. 156, 4 Drew. 1; Jones v. Victoria Graving Dock Co., 25 W. R. 348, 2 Q. B. D. 314 (per Lush, J., at bottom of p. 323); Millington v. Thompson, 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 236. (2) But it was not a guarantee at all, but a primary debt.

They also referred to Wildes v. Dudlow, 23 W. R. 435, L. R. 19 Eq. 198, and Welford v. Beazeley, 3 Atk. 503.

Warmington, Q.C., and Warrington, for the respondents.—(1) There was a debt owing from the son to the firm, and the testator gave an indemnity for this debt; the testator's debt was a secondary, not a primary, one. [BOWEN, L.J.—Was it not this, that the testator practically said to his two partners, that, if they would give his son time, and there should eventually turn out to be a loss, he would indemnify the two for that loss?] It was a promise to pay such part of the debt as the son should not pay. (2) There is no sufficient memorandum to take it out of the statute. If the matter had arisen in the testator's lifetime, the will would have been no evidence. It was not meant to be such a memorandum as the statute requires. A will is an ambulatory instrument. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Leroux v. Brown, 1 W. R. 22, 12 C. B. 801, shows plainly enough that the statute does not touch the contract, only the evidence of the contract.] [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Lucas v. Dixon, 37 W. R. 370, 22 Q. B. D. 357.] It is not a note or memorandum of the same thing as is shown to have taken place by parol. An entry in a diary may be sufficient, because there the person making it could have no other motive in doing so than as evidence of its truth; but it is not so in the case of a will. [BOWEN, L.J.—Your mistake seems to be that you make out intention to have something to do with the matter; it is a mere matter of evidence, not of intention.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is a curious one. The testator was in partnership with the defendants, and the son being indebted to the firm, and not being able to pay, an arrangement was come to that the son should place securities with his father, and that the father should guarantee the firm against the son's indebtedness. The father having died, the benefit of the guarantee is claimed, but the answer is made, No, there is no sufficient memorandum to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. The fourth section of that statute says that "no action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer the debt, default, or miscarriages of another person, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." That section has been the subject of discussion for generations, and the construction of it has been to a certain extent settled. For one thing, it is settled that it does not touch the contract itself, it merely affects the evidence of the contract. Leroux v. Brown shows that plainly enough. Again, the evidence in writing must exist at the time of action brought: Sievewright v. Archibald. Bearing these facts in mind, there is this further consideration to be remembered, that the contract must be such a contract as, if it were in writing, would be valid. Now supposing that the present contract had been one in writing, could an action have been brought upon it at all? I think not, and for the reason, that an action cannot be brought upon a promise made by a man to himself and others. If the promise was made to the firm, then the Statute of Frauds does not apply. Let us look and see what the promise in the present case was. On the evidence it does not appear to me that such a guarantee is disclosed as is within the Statute of Frauds at all. But, if it is, it is said that a recital of a contract in a will is not a note or memorandum thereof within the statute. I cannot accede to that. Whether one looks at it from the point of view of principle, or whether one scans the words of the statute, I think that argument is equally untenable.

The object of the statute, as was explained in Welford v. Beazeley and Barkworth v. Young, is to avoid perjury on the one hand and fraud on the other. It seems to me that any document signed as the statute requires is sufficient. If we look into decided cases we find that the idea of the contract need not be present to the mind of the person making the note or memorandum. Affidavits sworn for other purposes have been held sufficient, and so have all kinds of other documents. I cannot see why a will should not be sufficient if it contains a note or memorandum of the subject-matter in question. That is my view as a matter of law. The statement in paragraph 14 of the will is all important. It says this: [His lordship stated the provisions of the paragraph to the effect set forth above, and proceeded:—] That is as plain an admission as possible, by the testator that he had guaranteed the firm against loss, and I think it is amply sufficient to take the case out of the statute, if the Statute of Frauds applies to it at all; but for the reasons I have given I do not consider the case comes within it at all, and the appeal in either case must be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed. Both points must be decided in favour of the appellants. I think there is here an original promise, and not a guarantee within the Statute of Frauds; but if it is within the statute, I think the recital in the will is a sufficient note or memorandum. First, is the case within the statute? In my opinion it was an original debt of the testator's, and not a guarantee at all. A man cannot, in the eye of the law, promise to himself and other people. What the testator did was to promise to his partners in such a way as to make the debt an original one. A promise which a man makes with himself is not within the statute. But if it is, I think there is ample evidence to take it out of the statute. A catena of cases down to Gibson v. Holland, 14 W. R. 86, L. R. 1 C. P. 1, and Lucas v. Dixon, 37 W. R. 370, 22 Q. B. D. 357, support this view. The court looks for evidence, not for intention. The question whether the person making the evidence means it to be evidence or not, has nothing to do with it from the point of view of the statute. Whether it be a letter to an agent or to a friend, or even a letter from a man to himself, provided it be signed, it would be sufficient, if the terms of the contract can be conclusively proved from it. But the case is to be decided, in my view, on the first ground—i.e., that it does not come within the statute at all.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—There are two points: (1) whether the case comes within the Statute of Frauds at all, and (2) whether, if it does, there is any sufficient note or memorandum to take it out. But it is not necessary in the view I take to decide the first point, although I do not wish to be taken to differ as o it from the other Lords Justices. On the first point, the question is whether the promise here was an original or a secondary one. It seems to me to be on the border line, but I will assume it to be a secondary one. If, then, it is, a secondary promise, is there a sufficient note or memorandum in writing to take it out of the statute? A letter written to a third party is sufficient; it has been held that an affidavit in answer under order 14 is sufficient; an entry made in a diary is sufficient against, though not in favour of, the person making it. The question is not one of intention; but it is, Is the note or memorandum de facto drafted and signed by the person to be charged? In the present case the fact is expressly recited in the will; why should that not be sufficient? It seems to me to be ample.

ASSICURAZIONI GENERALI AND SCHENKER & CO. v. STEAMSHIP "BESSIE MORRIS" CO. (LIMITED) AND BROWNE. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Contract of carriage—Exception of perils of the sea—Obligation to complete voyage where damage to ship reparable.

The exception of perils of the sea contained in a charter-party will not relieve the shipowner from his obligation to complete the voyage by carrying the cargo to the port of destination in the chartered ship if the damage caused by such perils is capable of repair within a reasonable time and at a cost not exceeding the value of the ship when repaired.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Collins, J., in an action by the charterers against the owners and the master of the steamship Bessie Morris upon two instruments signed by the master, by which he promised to pay to the order of the charterers the sum of £124 received by him for necessaries, and the sum of £272 for difference of freight and for advance disbursements forty-eight hours after arrival of his vessel at London.

By the charter-party entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants it was agreed that The Bessie Morris should proceed to Fiume and to one, two, three, or four Adriatic ports and there load a cargo, and proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom and deliver the cargo, unless prevented by any of the excepted perils, including perils of the sea. The charterers nominated London as the port of destination. In accordance with the charter-party the vessel proceeded on her voyage from Fiume to London. When near Gibraltar, however, on the 2nd of March, she went ashore. A contract was made with salvors to get the ship off at an expense of forty per cent. of her value when delivered in Gibraltar. The salvors got the ship off, and received £2,900 as their remuneration. The ship was then temporarily repaired at Gibraltar at an expense of £750. Of the cargo, part had been jettisoned, part washed out, part was damaged and sold at Gibraltar under the advice of surveyors, and the remainder was sent on to London on two other steamers at a cost of £66. When the temporary repairs were completed, on the 25th of April, The Bessie Morris proceeded with a cargo of esparto grass to Garston, near Liverpool, earning a freight of £572. At Liverpool considerable sums were expended in completing the repairs; but it was not proved that the total expenditure exceeded the value of the ship.

At the trial, before Collins, J., without a jury, the learned judge found that the defendants might have repaired the ship so as to carry forward a substantial part of the cargo to its destination in London without unreasonable sacrifice and without unreasonable delay; and he held that they, consequently, were not absolved from their obligation under the charter-party to proceed with the cargo to London; that having, without necessity and without the consent of the plaintiffs, broken up the voyage at an intermediate point, they could not pray in aid their own act in not proceeding to London as an answer to the action; and that the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to the benefit of the defendants' promise just as though the ship had reached London in fact ([1892] 1 Q. B. 571, 40 W. R. Dig. 238).

Bigham, Q.C., and Hurst, for the defendants.

Sir Walter Phillimore, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—By the charter-party in this case it was agreed that the shipowners would carry the cargo offered by the charterers safely to a port to be nominated by the latter. The charterers did nominate a port—viz., London—and there was, therefore, an absolute contract on the part of the shipowners to carry the goods to London. The charter-party contained the ordinary exception as to perils of the sea. The shipowners did not bring the cargo to London. The question is whether they were prevented by the perils of the sea. The vessel took the ground at Gibraltar. If it had been impossible to get her off, obviously she would have been prevented from completing her voyage by perils of the sea. But she was got off. If again she had been got off at a place where she could not have been repaired, or in such a condition that she could not have been repaired within such a reasonable time as not to break the continuity between the voyage before and after repairs, and, therefore, not so as to leave the voyage the one specified in the contract, she would have been prevented from fulfilling the contract by perils of the sea. But nothing of the sort happened here. The vessel was at Gibraltar, where it could be repaired. It was the shipowners' duty to repair if they could possibly do so. That must be a business possibility, however, and, as Maule, J., says in Moss v. Smith, 19 L. J. C. P. 225, in matters of business a thing is commonly treated as impossible when it is impracticable, and as impracticable when it cannot be done without laying out more money than the thing is worth. He goes on to say that, according to the ordinary measure which has been adopted, repairs to a ship are impossible if, when the ship is repaired, her value will not be so great as the money expended to put her into repair. But this vessel was in fact repaired at Gibraltar sufficiently to carry her to Liverpool, a longer distance than to London, at a cost of £750, far less than the value of the vessel when repaired, even after deducting the £2,900 salvage expenses from that value. The vessel, therefore, could be repaired at a cost at which no reasonable man would have failed to repair it. Consequently the owners were not prevented from completing the voyage by perils of the sea. They ought to have brought the cargo to London, and they broke their contract by not doing so. The case is a perfectly clear one. We have nothing to do here with any question of constructive total loss, which can only arise where the question is one of insurance. As to damages, the freight here was a lump sum; and the effect of that is that if the vessel arrives with any part of the cargo the shipowner is entitled to the lump freight; but where the voyage is not performed at all, and the performance is not prevented by perils of the sea, no freight at all is due. That was the case here. Therefore, whether the money which has been advanced by the charterers to the master of the ship is regarded as a mere loan or as prepaid freight is immaterial. If it is regarded as prepaid freight, the freight has never been earned, and the money must be repaid. If it is regarded as a mere loan, it has been advanced for payments which the shipowners were bound to make, for payments, consequently, for which the master had authority to borrow. The charterers are entitled to recover that money from the shipowners. They are also entitled to recover any damages naturally resulting from the non-completion of the voyage. If, in consequence of the goods being taken to another port, the charterers have not received them, they are entitled to their full value and to any profits they would have made on the sale of them. The judgment at the trial was quite right, and this appeal fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There was in this case a contract to perform a particular voyage unless prevented by perils of the sea, and the only excuse made by the shipowner for not performing that voyage is that she was prevented by perils of the sea. Now his vessel undoubtedly went aground, and he had then to consider whether he could complete the voyage. She was bound to complete the voyage if she could do so at an expense that was not unreasonable. She was got afloat and was repaired in time to have completed the voyage. As the vessel was in fact repaired and did proceed upon a voyage, it is clear that it was not impossible for her to do so, that she was not a constructive total loss, therefore, and that the performance of the voyage contracted for was not prevented by perils of the sea. In Moss v. Smith Maule, J., says:—"The ordinary measure which has been adopted is, if when the ship is repaired her value will not be so great as the money expended to get her into repair, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and the ship irreparably damaged; and a ship irreparably damaged is totally lost." In the same case Cresswell, J., says:—"Now, when is a shipowner said to be prevented by the perils of the sea from fulfilling his contract? Why, when the ship is so much damaged by perils of the sea as to be rendered incapable of performing the voyage. That is the case when perils of the sea are the only exception introduced into the contract. When a ship has sustained sea damage to a certain extent, she is not, therefore, incapable of performing the voyage because she wants repairs; otherwise the most casual injury, as the loss of the rudder, without which a ship could not navigate in safety a single mile, would render her incapable. If a ship sustains so much sea damage that she cannot be repaired; if she is at a place where she cannot be repaired and rendered competent to navigate, then she is prevented from fulfilling the voyage by perils of the sea. If the ship is totally lost, sunk, submerged, destroyed, she is again prevented by perils of the sea. The courts have also engrafted this further qualification, that, if the owner can show that the damage sustained by the perils of the sea is so great that he could not prudently and reasonably be called upon to repair the damage, he is then prevented from fulfilling his contract by perils of the sea, and he may treat such damage as a total loss." In the present case, however, there is no questtion as to whether the ship might not reasonably have been repaired. The repairs were actually done. Even if the shipowner would have been justified in treating this ship as incapable of being repaired, he did not do so. He cannot say that the ship was not worth the cost of repair after he has repaired. The completion of the voyage, therefore, was not prevented by perils of the sea; and the lump freight which was paid in advance by the charterers to the master must be repaid by the shipowner. The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—This action may be treated as one by the charterers of a ship to recover damages from the shipowner for non-completion of the voyage specified in the charter-party. The defence is that the completion of the voyage was prevented by perils of the sea. But a voyage to a port beyond the one specified in the charter-party was in fact completed; so that the voyage to the specified port was not prevented at all. The contention that the vessel might have been treated as a constructive total loss, on the ground of the cost of repairing her, becomes immaterial in view of the fact that she was repaired and made a voyage to Liverpool. The ship was taken from Gibraltar to Liverpool and there a large outlay was made upon her, which the defendants seek to add to the expenses incurred at Gibraltar in order to make out that the cost of repair was more than the value of the ship. There is no evidence, however, that the total expenditure on the ship was more than its value. As to the other point, whether the money borrowed by the master from the charterers for disbursements is considered as a loan or as advanced freight, the shipowner is bound to repay it. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

principal should become immediately payable. In 1892 the W. Company proceeded to wind itself up for the purpose of carrying out an agreement for its amalgamation with the N. Company, an existing company on a larger scale.

Held, that the principal secured by the debentures became payable when the resolution for winding up took effect under the 4th condition, and that the W. Company were, therefore, entitled to pay off the debentures at par, with interest only up to the date of the commencement of the liquidation.

The meaning of the expressions "reconstruction" and "reorganization" of a company, considered.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff to restrain the division of any assets of the defendant company amongst the shareholders without making due provision for the fulfilment to the plaintiff of the whole obligations and liabilities undertaken by the defendant company to the plaintiff in nine debentures for £100 each issued by the defendant company to, and then held by, the plaintiff.

It appeared that the defendant company was a provincial telephone company, incorporated in 1884, with a capital of £400,000 divided into 20,000 preference shares of £5 each and 300,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. The defendant company had subsequently issued debentures to the amount of £69,000 in all. The plaintiff was, as stated above, the holder of nine debentures of the defendant company of £100 each.

The plaintiff's debentures were issued at different dates in the year 1889, and secured payment of the principal at corresponding dates in 1896, with interest at five per cent per annum. Each of them contained a covenant to pay the principal in accordance with certain conditions indorsed thereon and for payment of interest. The important conditions were those numbered 1 and 4, the terms of which, so far as material, were as follows:—

"1. This debenture is one of a series of debentures issued, or about to be issued, by the company, for securing principal moneys not exceeding in the aggregate £50,000 . . . subject to the condition that the company may at any time after the expiration of one year from the date of any debenture redeem such debenture by giving three calendar months' notice to the holder thereof of their intention to redeem, and paying to such holder £105 for every £100 capital secured, with all interest up to the day of payment."

"4. If the company makes default for three calendar months in the payment of any interest hereby secured, the registered holder hereof may at any time thereafter, before such interest is paid, call in the principal money hereby secured by notice in writing to the company. . . . And in case any such notice is given, then upon the expiration thereof, or if the company commences to be wound up otherwise than for the purposes of reorganization or reconstruction, then on the day of such commencement the principal money hereby secured shall become immediately payable."

In June, 1892, a provisional agreement was entered into between the defendant company and the National Telephone Co. (Limited) for the sale to the latter company of the defendant company's entire assets, with certain specified exceptions, in consideration of the allotment by the National Telephone Co. of certain shares therein to the defendant company or its nominees in exchange for shares in the defendant company, and also in consideration of a provision for the exchange at par of the debentures of the defendant company for debentures of the National Telephone Co., and of a sum in cash equal to the par value of the preference shares and debentures held by persons not consenting to exchange.

The following special resolutions were shortly afterwards duly passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the defendant company, namely:—

(1) That the agreement . . . expressed to be made between this company and the National Telephone Co. (Limited) for the amalgamation of the two companies by a transfer of the business and property of this company (with certain exceptions) to the National Telephone Co. (Limited) be and the same is hereby approved.

(2) That with the view of giving effect to the agreement, and in order to enable the shares to be allotted thereunder as part of the purchase consideration to be distributed among the members of this company, this company be wound up voluntarily under the Companies Acts, and that Mr. Welton, chartered accountant, be and he is hereby appointed liquidator for the purpose of winding up its affairs and distributing its property.

(3) That pursuant to the 161st section of the Companies Act, 1862, the liquidator be, and he is hereby authorized to carry the said agreement into effect, and to receive the shares agreed to be allotted and the cash payable thereunder, and to distribute the same among the members of this company.

The evidence showed that the defendant company was solvent and prosperous, and that the National Telephone Co. was another telephone company with wider operations and a larger capital.

The plaintiff, in August, 1892, received a circular from the liquidator stating that, under the said agreement, the holders of debenture stock (i.e., of the defendant company) had the option of taking up preference shares of the National Telephone Co., or might receive instead a payment in cash equal to the nominal or par value of their debentures, and requesting him to signify his choice in the matter. A majority of the debenture-holders consented to the proposed exchange, and the remainder accepted the full par value of their debentures, with the exception of the holders of debentures to the amount of some £1,800, amongst whom was the plaintiff. The question raised by this motion, and the only point in the action, was whether the plaintiff was entitled, in the events which had happened, to be paid a premium of £5 per cent. on each debenture, with interest on the amount thereby secured to date of payment, or was bound to accept the amount of the debenture, with interest only up to the date of the commencement of the liquidation. The hearing was treated by consent as the trial of the action.

Upjohn, for the plaintiff.—The contract by the defendant company to pay a premium of £5 for each £100 on redemption before 1896 is not rendered null and void by the liquidation, the whole transaction amounting in effect to a reorganization or reconstruction of the defendant company. [He referred to the text-writers mentioned in the judgment.] Moreover, if I am wrong as to this, the 1st and 4th conditions are for my benefit, and the company cannot wind itself up under condition 4 to my prejudice.

He referred to the observations of the judges in Gooch v. London Banking Association, 32 Ch. D. 41, 34 W. R. Dig. 38, on the effect of the special terms of redemption in condition 1.

Farwell, Q.C., and Kirby, for the defendants.—It is not a reconstruction of a small company, where a large company swallows it up, as the National Telephone Co. has swallowed up our company. A new company, formed to take over the old company, is of the essence of reconstruction. Reorganization, like reconstruction, supposes the continuance in substance of the old company. The question is, What is the substance of the transaction? It was not a mere form here; what was really intended was a sale. The text-writers are in our favour.

They referred also to section 161 of the Act of 1862.

Upjohn, in reply, referred also to Mr. Chadwyck Healey's book on Companies, p. 378. [CHITTY, J.—Mr. Kirby argues that there is a known form of reconstruction which no lawyer would say is not reconstruction, and that may be the true view, though the word does not occur in any Act. If the word is not used as strictly, it, at any rate, involves something which is not out and out sale.] This transaction was not a sale.

CHITTY, J.—The question which I have to decide turns upon the true construction of the 4th condition in these debentures, and particularly on the meaning of the words "if the company commences to be wound up otherwise than for the purposes of reorganization or reconstruction." The debenture was by the earlier conditions (see in particular condition 1) not payable till 1896. There is power under condition 1 for the company to redeem on certain terms, the chief of which is payment of £105 for every £100 secured. So stands the contract apart from the 4th condition. The plaintiff's case is that the principal secured by the debentures is not now payable; the defendants' that it became payable when the resolution for winding up took effect. A special resolution for winding up was passed in July last. At that time the company, far from being insolvent, was, as far as its assets and business were concerned, a prosperous company. The resolution shows on the face of it that the winding up was for the purpose of carrying out the agreement which had been entered into for the amalgamation of the company with the National Telephone Company. I have to look at the substance of the agreement and see whether this transaction was an amalgamation or whether the transaction fell within the words of exception in the 4th condition, and was a reconstruction or reorganization of the company. On looking at the agreement I find that, with the exception of a sum of cash and the Postmaster-General's licence, the whole undertaking of the defendant company was agreed to be sold to the National Telephone Co., and the consideration was chiefly shares of the latter company, which were to be delivered to the liquidator of the defendant company for distribution among its shareholders. [His lordship then referred to the second and third of the special resolutions of the defendant company for giving effect to the agreement and to section 161 of the Act of 1862, and continued:—] Does that transaction fall within the words "reorganization or reconstruction" in the 4th condition? The words in question are not words of art. They have no technical meaning in law.

Mr. Upjohn asks the court to consider what meaning a layman of ordinary understanding would give to the words. That would be a dangerous course for the court to follow. I take it that an ordinarily prudent member of the public unacquainted with company law would, if he were also ordinarily modest, hesitate before putting a meaning to these words. The better course is to refer to persons acquainted with the subject. Reference was made in argument to text-writers on company law who, although, of course, not authorities, are nevertheless persons conversant with the subject, and who have made it a special study, in order to show in what sense these words are taken by those conversant with the subject. Mr. Upjohn had to admit that he could find no text-writer on company law who, when writing on the reconstruction of companies, uses the word "reconstruction" in a sense which would include this transaction. It is plain from the form of the 4th condition that it contemplates reconstruction after a winding up, including a voluntary winding up.

What is included in "reconstruction" by persons conversant with company law? There is one mode of reconstruction which may perhaps be said to be within the strict sense of the term. That is when there is a winding-up order, an arrangement with creditors sanctioned by the court under the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, and a stay of the winding up, upon which the old company, having reconstructed itself according to the arrangement, would recommence business and go on as the old company. That would certainly be reconstruction within the condition. The company would still continue to exist. But that, and that alone, would be too narrow a meaning to give to "reconstruction" here. The usual mode of reconstruction is when a company resolves to wind itself up, and proposes the formation of a new company, which is to consist of the old shareholders, and to take over the old undertaking, the old shareholders receiving shares in the new company. In that case the old company ceases to exist in point of law, and there is in form a sale to the members of a new corporation. But the company is in substance, and may be fairly said to be reconstructed. It may no doubt be said that there is no power in such a case to compel dissentient members to come in, but such a scheme is not put on foot until it has been ascertained practically that the old shareholders will come in.

Mr. Palmer's well-known book was the first referred to, and it deals elaborately with reconstruction (5th ed., pp. 640-660). He uses the term throughout as only applicable when a new company is started to take over the business of the old company, and he treats it as essential to a scheme of reconstruction that a new company should be formed. The same writer, in subsequently dealing with "amalgamation" (pp. 661-671), includes under that head the case of a sale by a liquidating company of its assets to another existing company for shares in the latter company. Mr. W. F. Hamilton ventures on a definition of reconstruction as a transfer of the undertaking and assets of one company to a new company formed for the purpose of acquiring the same (Manual of Company Law, p. 260). Reconstruction is mentioned in Mr. Buckley's book as sale and transfer of the assets to a new company (6th ed., p. 391), but that is obviously not intended to be exclusive. Lindley, L.J., in his treatise says that "reconstruction differs from amalgamation in that, as a rule, there is only one transferring company, and the company to which the property in question is transferred is practically the same company with some alterations in its constitution" (Law of Companies, 5th ed., p. 900); that appears to me to afford a clue to the meaning of the word as used in a clause like the present. The question to be asked is, whether the new company is practically the same as the old, even though in law it is a separate corporation? According to the text-writers reconstruction does not include amalgamation, or a sale by a company of its undertaking to another existing company. I cannot, then, so read the 4th condition as to make the word reconstruction there, include this transaction. The clause is for the benefit of both parties to the contract, it is not unilateral, and it might have been for the debenture-holder's advantage that his debenture should have become immediately payable. It may not be so in the events which have happened, but it is conceivable that it might have been. In my opinion there was not a reconstruction.

Reorganization, though a less familiar term, can have no wider meaning than reconstruction. Though it is not necessary to express an opinion, I think that the two terms are used as alternative expressions.

The present case is that of a comparatively small company joining with a large company, and the transaction might be compared with the case of a large railway company buying up a small railway company on terms that the shareholders of the small company should receive shares in the larger company. Would any reasonable person call that a reconstruction or reorganization of the small company? The view I take is that the defendant company has not undergone reconstruction or reorganization, and the action must be dismissed, with costs.

Motion refused, and action dismissed.

JEUNE v. BARING. (a.)

Will—Lease—Rent—Covenants—Fine on renewal—Liability—Trustees—Cestui que trust—Income or capital.

Trustees of a will held a renewable lease upon trust for successive life tenants, with remainders over, and the residuary personal estate of the testator upon trust out of the income to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of executing the trusts of the will, with divers trusts of the residue.

Held, that the trustees, and not the life tenants, were the persons liable to observe the covenants and to pay the rent and outgoings which, on the true construction of the will, should be paid by them out of the income, and that the fine and expenses of renewal of the lease should be borne by the beneficiaries rateably, according to their enjoyment of the lease.

Originating summons.

T. C. Baring by his will bequeathed to his trustees and executors (inter alia) his leasehold house in Grafton-street upon trust to permit his wife to occupy the said house during her life, and thereafter upon trust for his son for life, with remainders over; and he bequeathed all his personal estate not otherwise disposed of by his will or any codicil to his trustees upon trust for sale, and out of the net proceeds to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and pecuniary legacies and the legacy duty thereon, and to hold the residue upon trust for investment as therein mentioned, and upon trust out of the income thereof to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of carrying into execution the trusts of his will. The testator also directed that the trustees should be entitled to retain for their own use a commission on the net amount of his residuary personal estate received by them in each year after deducting all rates, taxes, insurances, and other outgoings and expenses payable by them under any of the trusts therein contained.

The Grafton-street house was held under two leases for a term of sixty-one years at ground-rents, and both were renewable on payment of a fine.

The testator was assignee of the leases, and covenanted to indemnify the assignor against the rent and covenants.

This was an application by the trustees and executors asking whether the rent, &c., and expenses of repairing the Grafton-street house ought to be paid by the tenant for life or by the trustees, and, if the latter, out of what part of the testator's estate, and whether the trustees ought to renew the leases under which the said house was held, and, if so, out of what part of the estate the expenses of renewal ought to be paid.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the applicants.—Mrs. Baring, as equitable tenant for life, should pay the rent, repairs, and other outgoings, and also the fines on renewal of the lease: Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), ss. 10, 11; Ainslie v. Harcourt, 28 Beav. 313; In re Courtier, Coles v. Courtier, 35 W. R. 85, 34 Ch. D. 136; In re Fowler, Fowler v. Odell, 29 W. R. 891, 16 Ch. D. 723.

Hornell, for Mrs. Baring.—The trustees must pay the rent and perform the covenants and repairs and pay the insurance and rates, taxes, and outgoings. This case is governed by In re Courtier, Coles v. Courtier. There is no direction in the will for Mrs. Baring to renew the lease: Nightingale v. Lawson, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 440.

Swinfen Eady, for the next tenant for life.

Davey, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The testator has given his house in Grafton-street to the trustees of his will upon trust to permit his wife to occupy it during her life, thus making her an equitable tenant for life. I should have thought, but for the case of In re Courtier, Coles v. Courtier, that she, being tenant for life, ought to keep down those periodical payments which were necessary to her occupation. In that case there was an equitable estate for life as here, and the Court of Appeal expressed the opinion that the tenant for life was not bound to do anything. Cotton, L.J., says: "There is no rule of law that the tenant for life is bound to do these repairs out of the rents and profits," the repairs being necessary in order to perform the covenants in the lease. The case derives additional weight because the appellants relied on In re Fowler, Fowler v. Odell, and all the Lords Justices distinguished that case on the ground that it was not intended to decide questions between the tenant for life and remaindermen, as was the case in the one before them.

I think, therefore, that Mrs. Baring, while tenant for life, is under no obligation to do any of those things which the trustees as lessees (whether under direct covenant or not is immaterial) are liable to do in order to maintain the property. If she is not bound to do that, still less is she bound to pay any fines for renewals, which is a different matter. It is an à fortiori case. Similarly, if she is not liable, the next tenant for life, having a like gift, is also not liable.

Under these circumstances are the trustees liable? I am not called upon to decide this question, as the trustees merely want to know what they ought to pay. I think there is an indication on the will that income charges are to be paid out of income, and that so completely accords with what I think is right on general principles that I hold such was the testator's intention. He directs his whole residuary personal estate to be got in and converted, and then out of the net proceeds his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, legacies, and legacy duty to be paid. After that the residue is to be held on trust out of the income to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses of carrying into execution the trusts of the will. This must refer to those costs, charges, and expenses which will be of a periodical though variable character. I think, therefore, I have a distinct indication that these income charges must come out of income, and that seems to me to be right on principle, and not that these moneys should be paid out of the corpus of the trust estate.

As regards the renewal, once in fourteen years the obligation arises of renewing the lease, and there is a considerable sum to pay. That ought to be distributed over the estate according to the enjoyment of the estate—that is, the persons who have the enjoyment ought to bear the burden in proportion to that charge. That ought to be ascertained by an actuarial valuation.

Practice—Writ—Specially-indorsed writ—Appearance—Amendment of indorsement—Summons for judgment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 3, r. 6; ord. 14, r. 1.

A plaintiff commenced an action by serving upon the defendant a writ indorsed with a claim for a sum of money lent, and for interest in the nature of unliquidated damages. The defendant entered an appearance to this writ. On a summons for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, unconditional leave to defend was granted. The plaintiff then by leave amended his indorsement by striking out the claim for interest, so as to make his writ specially indorsed within ord. 3, r. 6, and afterwards obtained leave to enter final judgment upon a new summons under ord. 14, r. 1.

Held, that the defendant's appearance to the original writ must stand as an appearance to the amended writ, and that, the defendant having appeared to a specially-indorsed writ, the master had jurisdiction to give leave to enter final judgment.

Appeal from chambers.

The writ of summons in this action, issued on the 24th of September, 1892, was indorsed as follows:—

Balance . .				675	14	1

The plaintiff also claims interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on £595 15s., part of the above amount, from the date of the writ until payment or judgment."

On October 21, on the plaintiff's summons for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, unconditional leave to defend was granted. That order was never appealed from.

The plaintiff then applied in chambers for leave to amend the indorsement on the writ, and on November 1 the master ordered: "That the plaintiff be at liberty to amend the writ of summons in this action and the copy thereof filed at the Central Office by striking out the claim for interest in the indorsement of claim on the said writ, and substituting £595 15s. for the figures £675 14s. 1d., and striking out the figures £879 19s. 1d. And it is ordered that the appearance entered herein by the defendant do stand as an appearance to the said writ as amended, and that the writ and other documents herein already served be taken as amended accordingly, and that the costs of and occasioned by the amendment, and this application be defendant's in any event."

This order was not appealed from.

The plaintiff then took out a new summons for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, and on November 12 the master gave leave to enter final judgment for the amount indorsed on the writ as amended, and on November 17 Charles, J., in chambers, confirmed the decision of the master.

From that order the defendant now appealed.

F. M. Abrahams, for the defendant.—A plaintiff cannot obtain judgment under order 14 unless his writ was in the first instance specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6: Gurney v. Small, [1891] 2 Q. B. 584, 40 W. R. Dig. 192. In this case the writ to which the defendant appeared was not specially indorsed, and he had a right to defend the action: moreover, he was given unconditional leave to defend by the order of the 21st of October, which order still stands. This right cannot be taken away by the subsequent amendment of the indorsement. The defendant's appearance to the original writ cannot be taken to be an appearance to the amended writ, and the master's order to that effect of the 1st of November was made without jurisdiction.

Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff.—This point was left open by the decision in Gurney v. Small. The amendment cured the original defect in our writ. After the order of the 1st of November (which has not been appealed from) had been made, there was a specially-indorsed writ and an appearance to it by the defendant, and that is all that is necessary to bring the case within ord. 14, r. 1. That rule does not say that the writ must be specially indorsed in the first instance. The defendant's appearance holds good as an appearance to the amended writ.

Abrahams replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It seems to me that the point which is raised in this case has never yet come under decision. It has, however, been noticed in Gurney v. Small, and in that case my learned brother has expressed his view upon it, and Charles, J., who made the order now under appeal, concurred in his judgment. The point taken is highly technical, but I do not say that it is therefore not entitled to succeed, for the procedure under order 14 requires to be carefully watched. Before that order can apply, there must be a writ specially indorsed under ord. 3, r. 6. In this case there was no special indorsement in the first instance. The defendant appeared to the writ, and upon a summons for judgment being taken out under order 14 unconditional leave to defend was granted. The plaintiff then obtained leave to amend his writ so as to make it a specially-indorsed writ: it is said that that amendment makes it a specially-indorsed writ from the beginning, and I think, though with some hesitation, that that will do. The rules do not say that it is necessary to have a new appearance to an amended writ, and I think that for the purpose of doing substantial justice we may meet the technical objection by saying that the original appearance still stands after the writ has been amended. It follows that the defendant here has appeared to a writ of summons specially indorsed: therefore, order 14 applies, and this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am glad to be able to come to the same opinion, for to hold the contrary would merely throw further costs upon the parties. As a party to the decision in Gurney v. Small I may say that I think that that decision was right and is not inconsistent with what we are deciding now. The substance of that decision is that the plaintiff must have his tackle in order before he takes out a summons under order 14. I can see no difference either in policy, justice, or good sense for saying that when the indorsement has been amended before the summons for judgment has been taken out so as to make the writ "specially indorsed" within ord. 3, r. 6, order 14 will not apply. Therefore, I think that instead of having a new writ and a new appearance to it, the old appearance stands as an appearance to the amended writ. In coming to this decision I have purposely given no effect to the words in the master's order of the 1st of November directing that the appearance shall stand—I doubt whether they would be operative—but I think that the appearance does stand, and is an appearance to a specially-indorsed writ. I am fortified in this conclusion by the fact that the order appealed from was made by Charles, J., who was also a party to the decision in Gurney v. Small. The proper order as to the costs of the proceedings before amendment should be made, and then justice will be done to all and we shall avoid the shame of having to say that an unnaturally narrow construction must be given to the word "appear" in ord. 14, r. 1, and additional and unnecessary expenses must thereby be incurred.

Appeal dismissed.

The debtor, who was then indebted to his solicitor in the sum of £40, consulted the solicitor as to his position, with the result that it was resolved that a balance-sheet should be prepared and a meeting of the creditors called. The solicitor declined to act for the debtor on credit, and a sum of £15 was accordingly paid by the debtor to the solicitor to secure his services in the matter. After services to the amount of about £3 had been rendered, the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy by executing a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and, on the application of the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy, the county court judge refused to allow the solicitor to retain the balance of £12 in respect of services rendered after such act of bankruptcy, and directed him to hand it over to the trustee.

Held, that the circumstances under which the payment by the debtor to the solicitor was made did not create a necessity such as would arise in the case of a payment to defend a debtor from a bankruptcy petition which had been presented against him, and that the solicitor was not entitled to retain the money in payment for services rendered after the act of bankruptcy was committed.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Heywood in the County Court of Manchester, by which he directed the appellant to pay to the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy the sum of £12 3s. 4d.

The appellant, Mr. P. S. Minor, was a solicitor, and had acted in that capacity for the debtor, who in December, 1891, was indebted to him in a sum of £40 for costs.

On December 11, 1891, the debtor called on the appellant for the purpose of putting his affairs before him, with the result that it was decided that a balance-sheet should be prepared and a meeting of the creditors called.

Under the circumstances the appellant declined to act for the debtor on credit and unless the costs which would have to be incurred in the matter were secured to him, and consequently on December 12, 1891, the debtor paid to the appellant the sum of £15.

On that day the debtor executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, which constituted the act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition which was afterwards presented against him, and on the application of the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy the county court judge directed the appellant to pay over the sum of £12 3s. 4d., which he claimed to retain in respect of services rendered after the act of bankruptcy had been committed, and only allowed the balance of £2 16s. 8d. costs incurred before that date.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Shearman, for the appellant.—The case is one of very great importance to solicitors. If a debtor who wishes to consult his solicitor as to his affairs and the advisability of calling his creditors together cannot pay him money for services which the solicitor can retain, a man will be precluded from obtaining any assistance. The case really falls within the principle laid down in In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, where it was held that money paid by a debtor to his solicitor to oppose a petition could be retained. After the £15 was paid work was done by the solicitor more than sufficient to exhaust the whole of that sum. Further, the solicitor is entitled to retain the money in any event as a set-off to the old debt of £40 which was owed him by the debtor. At the commencement of the bankruptcy there was such a dealing between the parties as to entitle the appellant to a set-off.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The courts have expressed the opinion that the decision in In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne, ought not to be extended: In re Spackman, Ex parte May, 38 W. R. 368, 497, 7 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 100. This money was not paid by the bankrupt to resist proceedings, but to enable him to commit an act of bankruptcy. The contention as to set-off is really decided by Stumore v. Campbell, 40 W. R. 101, [1892] 1 Q. B. 314.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The material facts of this case are that the bankrupt, being in difficulties, consulted his solicitor. At the time he consulted his solicitor he was indebted to his solicitor in £40 for costs. His solicitor says, "I shall not go on unless you pay me for the work I am about to do." It is common ground that the solicitor made no bargain for work he had already done. All that was done was a deposit to secure payment for future services. This money was deposited on the 12th of December, and after the money had been deposited it is common ground that a few services were rendered, which accounts for the difference between £15 and the £12 3s. 4d., the money in dispute on the official receiver's motion. After services had been rendered to that amount the bankrupt committed the act of bankruptcy on which the petition was based. He assigned the whole of his property for the benefit of his creditors, and the result was that he was made bankrupt. Subsequently to the act of bankruptcy, and with full knowledge of it, the solicitor rendered further services to an extent which, apart from any question of taxation, exceeded the balance of £12 3s. 4d. remaining in his hands, and he says that he is not compelled to account to the trustee for that balance, but is entitled to keep it to pay the amount due to him for his services; and alternatively he says that he can keep it to repay pro tanto the old debt of £40. In my opinion he has neither the one right nor the other. It is said that the trustee is not entitled to have this balance handed over to him by reason of the decision in In re Sinclair, Ex parte Payne. That decision is that where proceedings are being taken against a man to make him a bankrupt there is a legal necessity, if I may use that term, which compels the courts to say that the sum of money spent to defend himself and to try to avoid an adjudication in bankruptcy must be allowed to be retained by the solicitor. If it were otherwise, a debtor when attacked would be defenceless, and would be able to get nobody to defend him. By reason of that legal necessity this exception has been established, and although it was first established as an authority by Cave, J., in In re Sinclair, yet I may say from my own personal knowledge that that practice was acted upon more than twenty years ago. But that decision, arising as it does from necessity, is not to be extended. In In re Spackman, Ex parte May Cave, J., himself said that that decision is not to be extended. He says there: "It seems to me impossible to say that what the appellants did was a necessity within the rule laid down in In re Sinclair. They were engaged in doing the same thing as a trustee under a deed of arrangement. They were trying to make arrangements to avoid bankruptcy and to withdraw the estate from the bankruptcy court, and we never held that a man engaged in so doing is justified in charging the estate with costs incurred in that way." That is precisely what has been done in the present case, and Cave, J., says that whatever extension there may be there is not to be this extension. He goes on, "It would be still more monstrous if solicitors, who are not trustees under a deed, and must be presumed to know the law, should be allowed to spend the money of the trustee in trying to get creditors together and avoid proceedings when it would not be allowed in the case of an ordinary trustee. This case does not fall within the principle of In re Sinclair, and for my part I am not prepared to extend that case in either of the directions contended for beyond the limit laid down there." When that case came before the Court of Appeal Lord Esher, M.R., also expressed the opinion that In re Sinclair is not to be extended. As to the question of set-off, I will only say that according to the case of the appellant the £15 was deposited for a particular purpose—to secure due payment of services to be rendered, and to attempt to apply that money to services in the past is really to misapply the money. So long ago as 1867, I think, it was held that a man cannot create a set-off by a wrongful act, and to use a sum which has been specifically paid to secure another debt is in my opinion a wrongful act.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case has been more or less in debate since 1883, when Chitty, J., decided that a company limited by shares was not prohibited by law from issuing its shares at a discount. That decision was overruled, though in a different case (In re Almada and Tirito Co.), by the Court of Appeal in 1888, and it had now come to your lordships for final determination.

The whole structure of a limited company owes its existence to the Act of Parliament, and it is to the Act of Parliament one must refer to see what are its powers, and within what limits it is free to act.

Now, confining myself for the moment to the Act of 1862, it makes one of the conditions of the limitation of liability that the memorandum of association shall contain the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. It seems to me that the system thus created, by which the shareholder's liability is to be limited by the amount unpaid upon his shares, renders it impossible for the company to depart from that requirement and by any expedient to arrange with their shareholders that they shall not be liable for the amount unpaid on their shares, although the amount of those shares has been, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, fixed at a certain sum of money. It is manifest that if the company could do so the provision in question would operate nothing.

I observe in the argument it has been sought to draw a distinction between the nominal capital and the capital which is assumed to be real capital. I can find no authority for such a distinction. The capital is fixed and certain, and every creditor of the company is entitled to look to that capital as his security. It may be that such limitations on the power of a company to manage its own affairs may occasionally be inconvenient, and prevent its obtaining money for the purposes of its trading on terms so favourable as it could do if it were more free to act. But, speaking for myself, I recognize the wisdom of enforcing on a company the disclosure of what its real capital is, and not permitting a statement of its affairs to be such as may mislead and deceive those who are either about to become its shareholders or about to give it credit.

I think, with Fry, L.J., in The Almada and Tirito Co.'s case, that the question which your lordships have to solve is one which may be answered by reference to an inquiry, What is the nature of an agreement to take a share in a limited company? and that that question may be answered by saying that it is an agreement to become liable to pay to the company the amount for which the share has been created. That agreement is one which the company itself has no authority to alter or qualify, and I am therefore of opinion that, treating the question as unaffected by the Act of 1867, the company were prohibited by law, upon the principle laid down in Ashbury Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, from doing that which is compendiously described as issuing shares at a discount.

The question remains whether section 25 of the Act of 1867 has made any difference in the matter now under discussion. That section prescribes that every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued, and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares. Two things are manifest in this provision. The share is to be held subject to payment, and the payment is to be in cash. The amount is to be paid, and the whole amount to be paid in cash, and to me it appears, looking at the latter part of the section, whereby a contract made and filed may qualify and cut down the form of payment, and that it may be in goods or in value received in some form, instead of in cash, it must nevertheless be payment. I regret that the words in cash have received a judicial exposition which allows payment otherwise than in cash, and I hold myself free, if the question should ever come before your lordships, to consider the propriety of that decision. But for my present purpose it is enough to say that there is nothing in the section which justifies the notion that that which the statute required to be paid in cash, subject to qualification of a mode of payment, should not be paid at all.

The provisions of section 25 were probably to put a stop to such transactions as had become the subject of judicial animadversion in Pellatt's case, 15 W. R. 726, L. R. 2 Ch. 527; Elkington's case, 15 W. R. 665, L. R. 2 Ch. 511; also Fothergill's case and Dent's case. I should have been prepared to take this view if the matter were not covered by authority. But it seems to me that, although not directly in point, the principle laid down by your lordships' House in Trevor v. Whitworth would render it extremely difficult to so read the sections to which I have referred as to justify the appellants' contention. Under these circumstances it seems to me impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs. Accordingly, I move your lordships that the order appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON. — Can a company limited by shares, formed and registered under the Act of 1862, issue its shares as fully paid up for a money consideration less than their nominal value? That was the only question argued in these appeals. It has been answered in the negative by both courts below, without hearing argument, upon the authority of the Almada and Tirito Co.'s case, decided by the Court of Appeal in 1888. The limitation of such a company's liability is the creature of statute, and the question lies within a narrow compass, depending upon the construction of one or two clauses in the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867.

The Act of 1862 (section 8 (2)) requires that, in the case of a company limited by shares, the memorandum of association shall contain the amount of the capital with which it proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. The statutory limitation which it imposes upon the liability of individual shareholders is contained in the enactment (section 38 (4)) that "no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member."

In my opinion, these enactments read together indicate the intention of the Legislature, that every member who takes shares from the company in return for cash shall either pay or become liable to contribute their full nominal value. The "amount, if any, unpaid" obviously refers to the "fixed amount" of the shares into which the capital is divided, as set forth in the memorandum, and not to any lesser amount which may be agreed upon between the company and its shareholders, and the statutory liability of each shareholder is for the difference between the amount fixed by the memorandum and the sum which has actually been paid upon his shares.

Consequently, if shares are issued against money, it appears to me that any payment to the company less than the nominal amount of the shares must by force of the statute, and notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, be treated as a payment on account, the member remaining to contribute the balance when duly called for.

A company is free to contract with an applicant for its shares, and when he pays in cash the nominal amount of the shares allotted to him, the company may at once return the money in satisfaction of its legal indebtedness for goods supplied or services rendered by him. That circuitous process is not essential. It has been decided that under the Act of 1862 shares may be lawfully issued as fully paid up, for considerations which the company has agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the shares. I do not think any other decision could have been given in the case of a genuine transaction of that nature where the consideration given is the substantial equivalent of full payment on the shares in cash. The possible objection to such an arrangement is, that the company may overestimate the value of the consideration, and, therefore, receive less than nominal value for its shares. The court would doubtless refuse effect to a colourable transaction entered into for the purpose or with the obvious result of enabling the company to issue its shares at a discount; but it has been ruled that, so long as the company honestly regards the consideration given as fairly representing the nominal value of the shares in cash, its estimate ought not to be critically examined. That state of the law is certainly calculated to induce companies who are in want of money, and whose shares are unsaleable except at a discount, to pay extravagant prices for goods or work to persons who are willing to take payment in shares. The rule is capable of being abused, and I have little doubt that it has been liberally construed in practice.

The Companies Act of 1867 contains one clause only which can affect the present question. Section 25 enacts that "every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares."

It was argued that section 25 recognizes power in the company to accept a partial payment as a cash payment in full, provided there is a contract to that effect duly executed and filed with the registrar. I am unable so to construe the clause. I do not think its object was to give companies new powers in relation to the issue of their shares, but to regulate the statutory powers already possessed by them in regard to the acceptance of other than cash payments as part of their capital. The expression "unless the same shall have been otherwise determined" does not in my opinion imply that part payment may be accepted as payment in full. It refers to contracts so far as then lawful, by which a company might agree to accept considerations other than cash. In all such cases, the clause provides that the contract, if not duly filed with the registrar, shall be of no effect and that the shareholder shall remain liable for the value of his shares in money. The obvious purpose of the enactment is to enable persons dealing with the company to judge for themselves what may be the value of the consideration given as representing capital.

It is admitted that the appellants acted in good faith, and that the arrangement made with them would, even if carried out to the letter, have been of solid advantage to the company. But they accepted shares of the nominal value of 20s. as fully paid up, in the knowledge that only 5s. per share had been paid; and they cannot, therefore, benefit by the principle recognized by this House in Waterhouse v. Jamieson and Burkenshaw v. Nicholls.

It was urged at the bar that the appellants could have secured by other means all the advantages which were stipulated in their contract with the company, that instead of 20s. shares the company could have issued 5s. shares fully paid, bearing a preferential dividend of 40 per cent., and participating in the remaining profits equally with its ordinary 20s. shares; or that the appellants might themselves have bought the goods purchased with their contributions and received in exchange 20s. shares fully paid up. I see no reason to doubt that the first of these courses might have been successfully adopted; but I am not certain that the second would have been a legitimate proceeding, seeing that it might have involved acceptance by the company of goods in lieu of cash, at an estimated price of no less than four times their actual cost. It is needless, however, to consider what the parties might have done if that which they did is not of legal effect.

In my opinion, therefore, the register of the company is erroneous, in so far as it appears that these additional shares have been fully paid up, and the order appealed from which merely provides for its correction in that respect ought to be affirmed.

I have had an opportunity of considering the suggestions to be made by my noble and learned friend, Lord Herschell. I agree with him that the original shareholders had undoubted power to resolve that no call should be made upon the new shares except in liquidation, and then only for the purpose of paying debts and expenses of liquidation, because that power is expressly conferred upon limited companies by section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76). That the original shareholders could be held in the present case to have resolved to that effect is by no means so clear a proposition, because it appears to me to raise the question whether a single resolution that no money shall be paid in any event is severable into two distinct resolutions, one to the effect that there shall be no payment, and the other to the effect that there shall be no payment on the occurrence of a certain event. Seeing that the question has not been argued either in the court below or in this House, I abstain from expressing any opinion upon it.

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This case raises the important question whether a company incorporated with limited liability can issue its shares at a discount. The company was incorporated in the month of October, 1880. The statement contained in the memorandum of association with reference to the capital of the company was as follows:—"The capital of the company is £125,000 divided into 125,000 shares of £1 each, and the shares of which the original or increased capital may consist may be divided into different classes and issued with such preference, privilege, guarantee, or condition as the company may direct." Forty thousand of the shares were allotted to the vendors of the company, the residue were issued to the public, and the full amount paid thereon. The operations of the company were not, in the first instance, successful, and a winding-up order was obtained. An application was subsequently made to the court for an order to stay the winding up, with a view to the introduction of fresh capital and a resumption of mining operations, and an order was made accordingly. In pursuance of this policy an extraordinary general meeting of the company was summoned, at which it was resolved that the capital should be increased by the issue of 120,000 preference shares of £1 each, to be credited in the capital and books of the company as having the sum of 15s. per share paid thereon, such preference shares carrying the right to a non-cumulative preference dividend up to ten per cent. on the nominal amount of such preference capital out of the profits of the undertaking each year and to equal participation (share per share) with the ordinary shares in such further profits as should remain for distribution each year after the payment of the above ten per cent. preference dividend. The special resolution so passed was duly confirmed.

At this time the market value of the ordinary shares was only 2s. 6d. per share. Upwards of 100,000 of these preference shares were allotted, with 15s. credited as paid thereon. Prior to the actual allotment an agreement was entered into between the company, of the one part, and an agent or trustee for the several persons whose names were entered in the schedule thereto, of the other part, whereby, after reciting the agreement to issue the shares at a discount of 15s. per share, and that 1s. had been paid on allotment, it was agreed that the shares to be allotted should be held as shares on which 16s. per share had been paid, and should be subject and liable to further payment of 4s. per share, and no more, and the company thereby undertook to cause the agreement to be registered at the Joint-Stock Registration Office, pursuant to the Companies Act, 1867, before the issue of the shares. The agreement was duly filed accordingly.

The capital raised by means of the issue of the preference shares sufficed to discharge the obligations of the company, to extricate it from its difficulties, and to give it a new start. Gold to a considerable amount was shortly afterwards raised from the mines, and the company has since been prosperous, the market value of the ordinary shares having risen to about 40s.

In February, 1889, the respondent, George Roper, purchased on the Stock Exchange and paid for ten fully paid-up ordinary shares in the company. On the 15th of July following he commenced this action to have it declared that the issue by the company of the 120,000 preferred shares, at a discount of 15s. per share was ultrâ vires. The statement of claim contained the allegation that the company had in 1889 issued debentures to the amount of £20,000, which were charged on all the property of the company, and which were then outstanding. It further alleged as follows:—"The defendant company had no power to issue the said preferred shares at a discount, and the entry of the preferred shares in the register book as fully paid up should be rectified. The said preferred shares are now quoted on the Stock Exchange at a premium, and if the said entry is rectified the ordinary shares will benefit thereby, and the 15s. unpaid on the preferred shares will be available for paying off the said debentures as and when they fall due."

The question whether there was power to issue the shares depends mainly upon the construction of the 8th and 38th sections of the Companies Act, 1862, though the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867, has also a material bearing upon it. By the 8th section of the Act of 1862 it is enacted that in the case of a company limited by shares the memorandum of association shall contain "the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount." The 38th section of the same statute provides that, in the event of a company formed under the Act being wound up, every present and past member should be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for payment of the debts and liabilities of the company and the costs of the winding up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, with (amongst others) this qualification, that in the case of a company limited by shares no contribution should be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member.

It is contended that these two enactments, taken together, preclude a company from issuing shares as fully paid up in respect of the payment of a sum less than the nominal amount of the share—that is to say, that a person taking a share on those terms, if he remains a shareholder, is liable to pay the difference between the amount he has already paid and the nominal value of the share.

If it had been determined that under the Companies Act a shareholder was in all cases liable to pay the whole of the nominal value of a share in cash, I should have had less difficulty in adhering to the judgment of the court below. But the contrary had been determined. And not only may a share be allotted as fully paid up in respect of property, goods, or services received by the company, but the courts will not inquire into the adequacy of the consideration, and certainly have not required it to be proved that the consideration given was equivalent in cash value to the nominal amount of the share. The transactions which have taken place on this view of the law have been so numerous, and have extended over so long a period of years, that I doubt if it would have been possible for your lordships to adopt a different view now, even if the Legislature had not intervened.

But I think that the Legislature has distinctly recognized and given its sanction to these decisions. The 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867, provides that every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued, and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by contract duly made in writing, and filed with the registrar of joint stock companies, at or before the issue of such shares.

I quite agree that this enactment does not purport to render valid an issue of shares in respect of something other than full cash payment, in case it would have been invalid under the Act of 1862. But it seems to me distinctly to recognize the validity of such a transaction, imposing only the condition that the contract determining that payment is not to be made in cash shall be in writing and duly filed. The object of this is obvious. It is to enable any creditor, by reference to the documents at the office of the registrar of joint stock companies, to ascertain how much of the liability on the shares which does not remain undischarged has been discharged by cash payment, and how much in some other way. A creditor has not the right to assume that so much of the amount of the share as is no longer liable to be called up has found its way, in the shape of cash, into the hands of the company. But he has placed at his disposal the means of full information on the subject.

Having regard to the considerations to which I have called attention, and notably to the provisions of the Act of 1867, I do not feel so much impressed as some of your lordships by the mischiefs which it is contended would result from the decision that shares might be issued as fully paid up in consideration of a payment less in amount than their nominal cash value, and I can conceive many cases in which such a course would be advantageous both to shareholders and creditors.

But the matter must, after all, be determined by an examination of the language of the Act of 1862, bearing in mind, of course, the decisions upon it, and the subsequent legislation which, as I think, sanctioned and acted on those decisions. I cannot myself place any great weight on the requirement of section 8, that the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered is to be divided into "shares of a certain fixed amount." The provision was of course, necessary in introducing a scheme of limited liability. But it does not of itself determine anything as to the extent of liability. Had it stood alone, the shareholders would have been liable, on general principles, to the extent necessary to discharge all the obligations of the industrial partnership.

The limitation of liability arises from the provision of section 38, that in case the company is wound up an individual shall only be liable "to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member." This must be regarded as by implication enacting that he shall be liable to that extent. What, then, is the meaning of the "amount unpaid" on the shares? If it had been the law that taking shares in a limited liability company necessarily involved the payment in cash of the nominal amount of the share, the answer would have been free from difficulty. The words "the amount unpaid" would have been taken in their ordinary sense as meaning so much as has not been paid in cash. But it is impossible now to adopt that interpretation as applicable to every case. The Acts of 1862 and 1867 must be read together. And the latter statute prescribes that a share shall be deemed to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless "the same shall have been otherwise determined" by a filed contract. What is "the same"? Clearly, as it appears to me, that the share is held subject to the payment of the whole amount in cash. When, then, it has been lawfully "otherwise determined," it appears to me impossible that the words "the amount unpaid" can have their ordinary meaning. They must, at least, be interpreted as meaning "unpaid, or not otherwise satisfied, in accordance with the provisions of a filed contract." And once this conclusion is arrived at I do not think there would be any insuperable difficulty in including within them the case where, in consideration of a certain payment, the liability had been by a filed contract entirely discharged.

At the same time I am quite sensible of the force of the argument that in the 25th section of the Act of 1867 the emphatic words are payment "in cash," implying that there must be payment in some form, even though it is not to be made in cash. And whilst goods or services given or taken in lieu of payment in cash may be regarded as in a sense payment, it is difficult to say that payment of a portion of a sum is payment of the whole. Although, therefore, my mind has not been free from doubt, I am not prepared to differ from the court below and from those of your lordships who entertain that view in thinking that a company cannot issue its shares at a discount so as to exonerate those taking the shares from the liability, in case the company be wound up, to pay the amount not already paid on the shares.

But the question before your lordships does not arise in the case of a winding up. The interest of the creditors is not in issue. The action is brought by a shareholder avowedly for the purpose of benefiting the holders of the ordinary shares at the expense of those who are possessed of the preference shares, which were taken on the express condition that their holders should not be required to pay more than 5s. per share. To accede simpliciter to the prayer of the plaintiff would, as it seems to me, be to sanction a violation by the company of a solemn agreement entered into between them and those who took the shares. I should have thought it was wrong to do this, except in so far as the contract provides for that which has been otherwise provided for by the legislature. In so far as the obligations arising under the contract do not involve a contravention of any enactment of the Legislature, I see no reason why they should not be given effect to. This point was not argued at the bar in the present case, but I will give my reasons for the opinion I have expressed. Except when the legislature has expressly or by implication forbidden any act to be done by a company their rights must be governed by the ordinary principles of law, and they are free to make, as between them and their shareholders, such contracts as they please. They may enter into any undertaking with those who are invited to become shareholders as to the terms on which the shares shall be taken and as to the rights of the respective shareholders inter se. What they cannot do is to exclude the liability, in case the company is wound up, to contribute to the extent unpaid on the shares for the benefit of the creditors. But what is to prevent the company agreeing that except in so far as the Legislature has imposed the liability they will not enforce any? Supposing the agreement had been in terms that the company would not enforce the payment of more than 5s. per share, except in the case of a winding up, and then only to satisfy the claims of creditors and the costs of the winding up, would there have been anything illegal in such an agreement? I fail to see anything in the Companies Acts which would render such an agreement invalid. And, taking the contract between the company and the shareholders, and the enactment together, is not this in effect what has been done? I am, of course, assuming that to issue shares on such terms would be within the memorandum of association. There can be no doubt of that in the present case. It is provided that the original or increased capital may be issued with "such preference, privilege, guarantee, or condition" as the company may direct. Whilst, then, I think it ought to be declared that the agreement between the company and those to whom the preference shares were allotted was ineffectual to absolve them from the liability prescribed by the 38th section of the Act of 1862, I should have thought, had the point been insisted upon, that it ought also to be declared that the company are not entitled to call upon such shareholders for any further payment beyond that agreed upon, except in the case of a winding up, and then only so far as necessary for the discharge of the obligations of the company and the costs of the winding up.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—Your lordships are called upon to determine whether it is or is not competent for a company, limited by shares, to issue shares at a discount so as to relieve persons taking shares so issued from liability to pay up their amount in full. It was suggested that different considerations might apply to shares in the capital with which a company is originally registered and shares in additional capital created afterwards. But it seems to me to be perfectly clear that for the present purpose no distinction can be drawn between one portion of the capital of a company limited by shares and another.

The question turns upon the construction of the Companies Act, 1862. The provisions of the Act are, I think, plain enough if one bears in mind the condition of things which existed before the principle of limited liability was introduced in 1855. Before that time there was no way known to the law by which persons trading in partnership could restrict their liability. They were liable to the utmost farthing. At last the Legislature intervened and authorized persons who proposed to trade in partnership to form themselves into a registered company with a declared capital and shares of a fixed amount, and limited the liability of the partners as members of the company to the amount unpaid upon their shares.

But all this legislation proceeds on the footing of recognizing and maintaining the liability of the individual members to the company until the prescribed limit is reached. The memorandum of association of a company limited by shares must contain "the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount." It must also contain a declaration "that the liability of members is limited." Neither the liability nor the limitation is defined in the memorandum itself. And so the declaration carries you back to the earlier part of the section, where you are told what is meant by "a company limited by shares." It is a company "formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid upon their shares." That must mean that the liability of a member continues so long as anything remains unpaid upon his shares. Nothing but payment and payment in full can put an end to the liability. Plainer still and more explicit is the section headed "Liability of Members." It begins by declaring that in the event of a company formed under the Act being wound up, the measure of the liability of every present and past member is the amount required to satisfy all claims of creditors, to pay all the expenses of liquidation, and to adjust the claims of members inter se. Then come certain qualifications to which that liability is subject. One is, that in the case of a company limited by shares no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member.

To sum the matter up, I cannot, I think, do better than adopt the language Mr. Buckley has used in speaking of the Limited Liability Acts. "The dominant and cardinal principle of these Acts," he says, "is that the investor shall purchase immunity from liability beyond a certain limit on the terms that there shall be and remain a liability up to that limit." Whether this liability is one of "the conditions of the memorandum" within the meaning of that expression in the Act of 1862, as Lord Selborne seems to have thought (Dent's case), or a condition attached by the Act to a company limited by shares, and of the essence of such a company, though it may not be found contained within the four corners of the memorandum, is a matter of little or no importance. In either view of the case it is plain that the condition is one which cannot be dispensed with by anything in the articles of association, or by any resolution of the company, or by any contract between the company and outsiders who have been invited to become members of the company, and who do come in on the faith of such a contract.

If this conclusion be correct, there is, I think, an end of the question, and the arguments urged on behalf of the appellants may be disposed of very briefly. I may notice, in the first place, that reference was made in the course of the argument to section 25 of the Act of 1862, which specifies, among the particulars to be entered on the company's register of members, the amount paid, or agreed to be considered as paid, "on the shares of each member." It was suggested that this expression shows that the statute does not require actual payment. Nor does it, except in the case of a company limited by shares. The section, it will be observed, is speaking not only of such companies, but of all companies under the Act which have a capital divided into shares.

The next argument that was put forward strikes me as rather far-fetched. It was said that companies under the Companies Clauses Acts are authorized to issue new shares at a discount. It was pointed out that the language of table A. in reference to the issue of shares in additional capital is precisely the same as the language of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, now that it has been amended by the Railways Clauses Act, 1867, and the Companies Clauses Act, 1869, so as to make the issue of shares at a discount permissible. Why, it was asked, should there be any difference in this respect between the two classes of companies? Why should that be taken to be prohibited in the one which is allowed in the other? Well, there is this difference to start with. A company limited by shares selects its objects and fixes the amount of its capital to suit itself; complying with the provisions of the Companies Acts, it is under no outside control in these matters. The Companies Clauses Acts are applicable to companies formed for the purpose of carrying out undertakings of a public nature. After Parliament is satisfied that the proposed undertaking will be of public benefit, and that the proposed capital is adequate, and not excessive, a special Act is obtained. Then, if the company comes for powers to raise further capital, it is open to the Legislature, if it thinks fit, when sanctioning an Act for the purpose, to incorporate with the special Act the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and at the same time to modify its provisions as occasion may require. Because a special permission granted in consideration of the particular circumstances of the case is free from objection, it does not follow that a general licence might not be open to grave abuse.

There is this difference, too, a company limited by shares may borrow as much money as it can get. A company under the Companies Clauses Acts has only limited powers of borrowing. So there is the more reason that a company of the latter class having still some credit though its borrowing powers be exhausted, should be allowed in a proper case to make use of its unissued capital. But, after all, the real answer to any argument or appeal founded on the Companies Clauses Acts is this: whatever those Acts may prohibit or permit, table A. must be taken in connection with the Companies Act, 1862, and connot be read so as to contravene its provisions.

Much reliance was placed on the 25th section of the Act of 1867. It was said that what that section has in view is one of two things, either liability to pay in cash the whole amount of the shares, or else a contract in writing duly registered at or before the issue of the shares. It was argued that if there be a contract duly registered, the section does not impose any liability to pay in full. That is quite true, and for this reason: the section applies not only to companies limited by shares, but to all companies under the Act of 1862 having a capital divided into shares. In the case of a contract duly registered, the section does not require payment where payment is not required by the Act of 1862. On the other hand, it does not dispense with payment in full where the liability to pay in full is a condition imposed by the Act of 1862 as it is in the case of a company limited by shares.

Burkinshaw v. Nicholls was pressed into the argument. But all that case decides is that the company's certificate to the effect that shares are fully paid up is, as against the company, conclusive evidence of payment in the hands of a purchaser for value without notice.

Lastly, it was said that, if it be the case that, in companies limited by shares, members are liable to pay up in full the amount, if any, unpaid upon their shares, still the liability is one that may be easily evaded. And it was pointed out that in the present case if only a different method had been adopted, a result practically the same might have been attained, and then the transaction would have been unimpeachable. Whether that is a good reason for permitting the requirements of an Act of Parliament to be contravened may perhaps be doubted.

But I desire to protest against some of the propositions which were advanced in connection with this part of the argument. It was said that if a company limited by shares owes its bankers £1,000, and its shares are at 50 per cent. discount, fully-paid shares of £2,000 nominal value may be given in discharge of the debt. It was said that a company limited by shares may issue fully-paid shares at their market price at the time, however much they may have become depreciated, in exchange for goods having a recognized market value. Speaking for myself, I am not prepared to assent to either of those propositions without further argument. I am inclined to agree with the view expressed by Cotton, L.J., though it is not necessary to decide the point. It seems to me that all that has been determined so far is, that the court will decline to rip up a transaction not impeached as dishonest, and not proved to be such, merely because the company may have paid an exorbitant price for their property.

In the present case I regret I am compelled to say that, in my opinion, the transaction cannot stand. The course which the directors took probably saved the company. All parties concerned acted in a perfectly open and honest manner. But it seems to me that the requirements of the Companies Act, 1862, have been contravened, and therefore I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord MORRIS.—The Act of 1862 enabled a company to be formed on the principle of having the liability of its members limited to the amount unpaid on their shares; it did not impose a liability—on the contrary, it limited liability to the extent of the amount of the share; but there is no power given, that I can see, to further limit liability by not paying that amount. Has that position been varied by section 25 of the Act of 1867, which provides, "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such share"? That section appears to me plainly to refer to and deal only with, the mode of payment—primâ facie payment of the whole amount is to be in cash, but with a power given of contracting for something other than cash to be taken in payment, but payment in meal or malt is clearly contemplated—the amount of the shares must be paid. A company can only do what it is authorized to do, and not that which it is only not prohibited from doing. I can find no authority to issue a pound share, but that only five shillings is to be paid of the pound. For these reasons I concur in the judgment moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—Before putting the question I only desire to add that I have designedly avoided alluding to the point which has been mentioned by my noble and learned friend Lord Herschell, inasmuch as it was neither insisted upon nor argued at the bar.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lunacy.

Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ. July 14, 1892.

In re LAURA DAVY. (a.)

Lunacy—Married woman—Found to be of unsound mind—Summons for appointment of committee—Claim of husband to be appointed as of right.

The husband of a woman found of unsound mind has no absolute right to be appointed, either solely or jointly, her committee.

Summons referred by the master to the court for the appointment of two committees of the person and estate respectively of Laura Davy, a married woman found of unsound mind.

On the 22nd of February, 1892, a petition was presented that an inquiry should be made into the state of mind of Mrs. Laura Davy, a married woman, and on the 29th of April an order for the inquiry was made. On the 24th of May the master found that she was a person of unsound mind.

On the 2nd of June the present summons was issued by the mother of the lunatic asking that two persons named, one being the applicant, but neither being the husband of the lunatic, might be appointed committees of her person and estate respectatively. The summons was heard by the master, but the husband, though duly served, did not attend and the summons was therefore adjourned. It was further heard on the 20th of June, when the husband appeared and opposed the application and the master reserved his decision. On the 27th of June the master referred the summons to the court, and it now came on for hearing.

The evidence showed that the husband had during their married life treated his wife, who was a deaf mute and whom he had married without her parents' knowledge, very badly; that he took her money for himself and did not provide her with sufficient food or clothing, and left her for long periods of time alone, which was peculiarly prejudicial to anyone afflicted as she was and specially requiring companionship; and that there was no real sympathy between them, but, on the contrary, she feared and disliked his presence.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, for the summons.

Craycroft, for the husband of the lunatic, contrà.—The husband or wife of a lunatic has a right to be appointed either solely or jointly her committee. That is so according to the old cases: Lord Wenman's case, 1 Peere Williams, 701; Ex parte Le Heup, 18 Ves.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

221; In re Dyce Sombre, 8 Jur. 817; and there has been no new practice since the recent Act.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is a remarkable one. The lady who has been found of unsound mind is a deaf mute. Her cousin married her some eight or nine years ago clandestinely, without the knowledge of her parents, and he has treated her very badly during their married life, and in such a way that I am satisfied that he should not be appointed her committee. If the money to which she is entitled during her life were to be paid to him for her, I have no doubt he would put it into his own pocket. The husband contends that he has a right to be appointed either solely or jointly. I do not agree that he has any such right. The court has full jurisdiction in the matter, and exercises its discretion as to what is best for the lunatic. That is what the court looks for, what is best for the lunatic. In 999 cases out of 1,000 it may be that it would be best that the husband should be appointed, but there may be a case in which it is best that he should not be, and there the court exercises its discretion. In my opinion the order must go as asked for by the summons.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion there can be no doubt at all that a husband has no absolute indefeasible right to be his lunatic wife's committee. If there is no precedent for the course the court is taking today, then I think the sooner a precedent is made the better. The paramount object which the court has to consider is the comfort and benefit of the lunatic. What would happen if the court were to appoint the husband? Can anyone doubt that if he were appointed he would continue to act as he has already done, and put the money which ought to go for his wife's benefit into his own pocket? I agree that the order should go as Lindley, L.J., has said.

Summons granted.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Oct. 31; Nov. 1, 11.

In re MCGRATH (INFANTS). (a.)

Infant—Guardian—Jurisdiction where no property—Religious education—Wishes of deceased father—Welfare of infant—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), ss. 6, 13.

The court has jurisdiction to interfere with and to remove a guardian of a child who has no property, on proof of misconduct of the guardian towards the child, or on proof that it is for the welfare of the child that the guardian should be removed.

But the duty of the court towards a penniless child under the care of a legal guardian who is able and willing to maintain the child is to leave the child alone, unless the court is satisfied that it is for the welfare of the child that some other course should be taken. The welfare of the child—religious, moral, and social, as well as physical and pecuniary—is the paramount consideration for the court.

Notwithstanding the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, the wishes of the father, expressed or implied, will be the guide of, and followed by, the court, for the religious education of the child, unless there is very strong reason for disregarding his wishes. Ordinarily, where such wishes are not expressed, the court must infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the wishes of the father were, that his child should be brought up in the religion which the father professed; and that inference practically amounts to a rule of law that a child shall be brought up in the father's religion. But the welfare of the child is the ultimate guide of the court, and where the father has been himself indifferent to religion, and it is not for the welfare of the child that the ordinary rule should be enforced, the court will make an exception, and will not direct the child to be brought up in the religion nominally professed by the father.

Decision of North, J. (40 W. R. 683), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J., reported 40 W. R. 683.

The question was, practically, whether infants whose father was dead should be brought up in the religion which the father, nominally a Roman Catholic, had professed.

The facts are considered to appear, sufficiently for the purposes of the present report, from the judgment of the court.

North, J., refused to remove a Protestant guardian appointed by the mother of the infants or to appoint Roman Catholic guardians to be co-guardians with the Protestant guardian, or to direct the guardian to bring the infants up in the Roman Catholic religion.

The infants, by their next friend, appealed.

Rigby, S.G., S. Hall, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the appellants.—It is what James, L.J., has called a sacred right that children should be brought up in their father's religion, unless there are special circumstances to the contrary, and Mellish, L.J., speaks of it as unquestionably the rule: Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, 19 W. R. 735, L. R. 6 Ch. 542. The fact that the faith of some of the brothers and sisters would be different from that of the others, if this appeal is allowed, is quite insufficient to constitute such special circumstances as to take the case out of the general rule. Here the children had received no such definite religious ideas or definite ideas as to the difference between Protestantism and Romanism as to be a reason for the court to refuse to interfere lest, by changing their ideas, it should take away all religious belief altogether. The recent Act expressly recognized the rule that the father's religion should prevail, even in the case of a bad father. There has been no undue delay on the appellants' part. And there is no advantage of temporal welfare on either side.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Micklem, for the respondent.—The children's welfare is really the matter to be considered: In re Clarke, 31 W. R. 37, 21 Ch. D. 817. The true test as to the rule about the father's religion being followed is not what was the father's religion, but what were his wishes, In re Nevin, [1891] 2 Ch. 299, 39 W. R. Dig. 90; but here the father had really no religious belief himself and no wish as to his children's, so the rule may be left out of account, and the children's welfare alone taken into consideration. As the eldest boy and the eldest girl will remain Protestants, it is for the benefit of the three younger ones to be Protestants too. In Hawksworth v. Hawksworth James, L.J., prefaces his remarks as to the rule by saying that in that case "there was not the slightest trace of any indifference on the part of the father," which preface is very important. If the rule is a strict one, it has been constantly broken in upon, e.g., Stourton v. Stourton, 5 W. R. 418, 8 De G. M. & G. 760.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rigby, S.G., in reply.—The Act of 1886 expressly provides that it is not to interfere with the power of the court in respect of infants.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 11.—LINDLEY, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court as follows:—This is an appeal from the refusal of North, J., to interfere with the custody or education of three girls and a boy, all of whom are infants, aged respectively 15, 13, 11, and 6. Their father and mother were poor people; they were both Roman Catholics, and they are both dead. The mother survived, and by a deed executed by her in November, 1889, she appointed a Protestant lady of means, guardian of the children in question. This lady has had the care of them since April, 1890; she supports them out of her own resources and has brought them up in the Protestant, and not in the Roman Catholic, religion. An aunt of the father, who is a Roman Catholic and in poor circumstances, thinks this ought not to be. A kind and benevolent Roman Catholic lady is willing to take care of the children and to bring them up in the Roman Catholic religion if they are intrusted to her. In order to have the children transferred to her care, or, at all events, to insure their education in the Roman Catholic religion, a summons was taken out in the name of the infants, by their next friend, asking for the removal of their guardian and for the appointment of the Roman Catholic lady and the next friend as their guardians; or, in the alternative, that these ladies might be appointed co-guardians with the present guardian, upon the latter lady's undertaking to bring these children up as Roman Catholics. North, J., refused to interfere, and the infants, by their next friend, have appealed from his decision.

Before proceeding further, it is desirable to state the legal rights of the parties to this unfortunate litigation. The eldest girl is 15. She does not desire to become a Roman Catholic. She will soon be able to earn her own living, and the appellants' counsel saw it was hopeless to try and induce this court to interfere with her. The three youngest children have no property of their own, and their only right is to be supported and educated by the proper poor law authorities if no one else will provide for them. Their rights as regards their religious education will appear presently, when the duty of their guardian and of the court towards them is examined. The lady who is their duly-appointed guardian has the right to their custody and the right to support and educate them; in what particular religion will be considered hereafter. The other parties to this litigation have themselves no right to the custody of the children; no right to remove them from the custody of their legal guardian; no right to dictate to that guardian how she shall clothe them, nor how she shall feed them, nor what she shall have them taught. Their right in this matter is precisely the same as the right of the rest of her Majesty's subjects, and is limited to informing the court, at their own risk as to costs, of misconduct on the part of the legal guardian towards her wards.

There was at one time an attempt to throw some doubt upon the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over the guardians of children who had no property; but all doubt on this point was set at rest by Lord Cottenham's decision in In re Spence, 2 Phil. 247; and it is clear that the old Court of Chancery had, and that the High Court has, jurisdiction to interfere with and to remove a guardian of a child who has no property, on proof of misconduct on the part of the guardian towards the child, or upon proof that it is for the welfare of the child that the guardian should be removed. But it is obvious that the jurisdiction of the court is very limited in such a case. The child having no property under the control of the court, the court cannot provide any scheme for the child's maintenance or education. All that the court can do is to remove the guardian and appoint another, if another can be found to take care of the child. This limited jurisdiction being, however, established, it follows that the exercise of such jurisdiction can be invoked on behalf of any child by any one who is willing to come forward on its behalf and to act as its next friend. The jurisdiction of the court over guardians of children without property was exercised in In re Scanlan, 36 W. R. 842, 40 Ch. D. 200, and was recognized by North, J., in his judgment in this case, and is not open to controversy. But it cannot be too generally known that no next friend, no relation, no kind or charitable person, no co-religionist of the child, no priest or minister of any religion has in the case now supposed any right whatever, beyond the right of informing the court of what is wrong and asking the court's assistance on behalf of the infant.

The next point to consider is the duty of the court towards a penniless child under the care of a legal guardian who is able and willing to maintain and educate the child at his own expense. The duty of the court is, in our judgment, to leave the child alone unless the court is satisfied that it is for the welfare of the child that some other course should be taken. The dominant matter for the consideration of the court is the welfare of the child. But the welfare of a child is not to be measured by money only, or by physical comfort only. The word "welfare" must be taken in its widest sense. The moral and religious welfare of the child must be considered as well as its physical well-being. Nor can the ties of affection be disregarded. As regards religious education it is settled law that the wishes of the father must be regarded by the court and be enforced, unless there is some very strong reason for disregarding them.

The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, which has so greatly enlarged the rights of mothers after their husbands' deaths, has not changed the law in this respect. This was decided by Stirling, J., in In re Scanlan, and is unquestionable. The consequence is that, notwithstanding that Act, a widow may still find herself compelled to bring up her child in a religion which she abhors. The wishes of the father, if not clearly expressed by him, must be inferred from his conduct. If the father is dead it will be naturally inferred that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, his wish was that the children should be brought up in his own religion—i.e., the religion which he professed. This inference is one which the court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is bound to draw, and is practically not distinguishable from a rule of law to the effect that an infant child is to be brought up in its father's religion, unless it can be shown to be for the welfare of the child that this rule should be departed from, or the father has otherwise directed. This we believe to be the true state of the law. The law is not so rigid as to compel the court to order children to be brought up in the religion of their deceased father regardless of the consequences to themselves. This point was carefully considered by the present Lord Justice Kay in In re Clarke, and more recently by this court in In re Nevin. Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, in which the duty of a guardian to bring up a child in its father's religion and the duty of the court to order this to be done, was most emphatically asserted, does not warrant the contention that there are no exceptions to this general rule; and the court will always depart from the rule for sufficient reason. The welfare of the infant is the ultimate guide of the court—see Stourton v. Stourton, Andrews v. Salt, 21 W. R. 616,

L. R. 8 Ch. 622, In re Agar-Ellis, 27 W. R. 117, 32 W. R. 1, 10 Ch. D. 49, and 24 Ch. D. 317. The right of the infant in this respect is the correlative of the duty of its guardian and of the court.

We proceed now to inquire why the court should interfere in this particular case. The question may be put in another form—namely, Is it for the welfare of the three younger children that the court should take steps to have them now brought up in the Roman Catholic religion rather than in the Protestant religion, in which they are being brought up by their legal guardian? Or, again, the question may be put in this shape—namely, Is it the duty of the court to remove the present guardian unless she will undertake to bring up these three children in the Roman Catholic religion? She is willing to give this undertaking rather than be removed. As regards the physical comfort and unsectarian education of the children, there is no ground whatever for the interference of the court. The whole question turns on their religious education. Does their welfare demand that this should be now changed? This court, judicially administering the law, cannot hold one religion to be better than another. The law does not impose upon the court the duty of doing more than to order a child to be brought up in its father's religion unless there are sufficient reasons for doing otherwise. Let us first inquire into the religious views of the father. It is plain from the evidence that he was not a religious man. He did not attend any place of public worship himself. His children were baptized as Roman Catholics, but in his lifetime his eldest son was educated, with his consent, by Protestants. The girls attended a Roman Catholic day school, but on Sundays they frequently went to a Protestant chapel and to a Protestant Sunday-school. The youngest boy was at home. If any kind and charitable person had in the father's lifetime offered to maintain his four youngest children and bring them up as Protestants we are convinced that he would have gladly assented to the arrangement. In this respect the case differs widely from Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, where James, L.J., said (L. R. 6 Ch., at p. 542):—"There is not the slightest trace of any indifference on the part of the father to the religious education of his child. There is nothing to show that he would have acquiesced in the child being brought up a Protestant if he had been living." Under the circumstances of the present case, to rely on the wishes or supposed wishes of the father as a ground for bringing some of his children up in the Roman Catholic religion rather than in any other religion, is to rely on a rotten reed. Still it does not follow that his religion is to be disregarded.

Let us then look at the present state of affairs. The father died in June, 1888, a Roman Catholic, and was buried as such. At his death his eldest girl was at a board school; but he was ill, and probably did not know it. The two other girls were at Nazareth House, which was a Roman Catholic school. After the father's death the eldest girl appears to have been sent to a Roman Catholic school on week days and to a Protestant Sunday-school. Her two sisters remained at Nazareth House until April, 1890, when they came home to see their mother, who was very ill. Since that time all the girls and the youngest boy have been brought up as Protestants by the guardian duly appointed by their mother in November, 1889. The girls have been brought up and educated at an institution which has become to them a home, and which is maintained by the lady who befriended their mother until she died in July, 1891. The eldest girl, who is now 15, wishes to remain where she is, and it is not the duty of the court to interfere with her. Under these circumstances is it for the benefit of the three youngest children—two girls and a boy—that their religious education should be again changed? Is it for their welfare that they should be brought up in a different religion from their eldest brother and eldest sister? Would such a change be in accordance with their father's wishes? Our answer to all these questions is, no. Their mother's wishes are not relevant, although it is very painful so to hold. They were, however, clearly expressed in her lifetime in favour of the present Protestant guardian. Is the court then driven by any rule of law to play battledore and shuttlecock with these children and with their religious education? Is the court bound to hold, contrary to its own inferences from the facts of the case, that it is for the welfare of these children that they shall be taken from the care of the lady to whom they were intrusted by their mother, and by whom they have been and are all, most kindly treated? Our answer again is, no. Our answer would be precisely the same if the father had been a Protestant and the guardian a Roman Catholic who was bringing up the children as Roman Catholics. With a father like the late Mr. McGrath, and with like indifference shown by him, it would be for the welfare of the children to leave them alone.

We entirely concur in the observations of Mellish, L.J., in Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, L. R. 6 Ch., at p. 545, "that we should be doing much mischief if we were to hold out encouragement to persons to think that if they get hold of a child of tender years they may, by educating it for a longer or shorter period of time in their own religion, secure that the child shall be educated in their own religion instead of the religion of the father." But where, as here, the father is proved to have been indifferent whether his children were brought up Protestants or Roman Catholics, and where two of his children are of one of those religions already, and the others are being brought up in the same religion, it is not for their welfare that they should be educated in the other religion. This very case illustrates the mischief which may arise if near relations differ in their religious views. This unfortunate litigation is due to the fact that the father's aunt thinks it her duty to see that his children are brought up in the religion in which she thinks he ought to have brought them up, although he was indifferent about the matter. Such litigation ought clearly to be discouraged. We refrain from going minutely into the evidence; but the whole of it has been read and carefully considered. The two youngest girls were at Nazareth House after their father's death longer than North, J., thought they had been. But, notwithstanding this, we are of opinion that his judgment is correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

KIRKHEATON DISTRICT LOCAL BOARD v. AINLEY & SON. (a.)

River, pollution of—Causing sewage to flow into stream—Sewer vested in local authority—Joint offenders—

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Discretion—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), ss. 3, 10, 11—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 17, 19, 27—Practice—Appeal from county court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 120, 124.

The defendants discharged sewage from their premises into a sewer which was vested in the plaintiffs, the local sanitary authority. The sewer communicated with a stream, which became polluted by the sewage from the defendants' premises. The plaintiffs applied to a county court for an order under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, to restrain the defendants from polluting the stream. The county court judge made the order.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court), that the plaintiffs and the defendants had both committed offences against the Act, the defendants by causing the sewage to flow into the stream, and the plaintiffs by permitting them to do so; that the making of the order was discretionary, and that, under the circumstances, no order ought to be made at the instance of the plaintiffs.

Appeals from county courts under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, are properly made by way of motion.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from the judgment of a divisional court (Lawrance and Wright, JJ.) allowing an appeal from the Huddersfield County Court, and directing judgment to be entered for the defendants.

The defendants were manufacturers, having a large number of persons in their employ, and their premises were within the urban sanitary district of the plaintiffs, the Kirkheaton Local Board. The plaintiffs instituted proceedings against the defendants in the Huddersfield County Court under the provisions of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, alleging that the defendants, in contravention of that Act, caused liquid and solid sewage matter from the defendants' premises, situate in the district of the plaintiffs, to be carried into a stream called the Kirk Ings Beck within the said district, such sewage matter being caused by the defendants to pass into the said stream along a drain on the defendant's premises communicating with a watercourse which was used as a public sewer, and which was vested in the plaintiffs, whereby the said stream was rendered foul and unsanitary. The plaintiffs asked for an order requiring the defendants to abstain from committing an offence under the said Act.

It was proved at the hearing in the county court that there was in the plaintiffs' sanitary district a natural watercourse which was vested in the plaintiffs as being a sewer. This sewer ran under the defendants' works and received the sewage from the waterclosets of the works. At a distance of 500 yards from the defendants' premises this sewer ran into the Kirk Ings Beck, the stream which the defendants were charged with polluting. Between 1878 and 1883 extensive alterations were made in the defendants' premises and the waterclosets above metioned were erected. The plans of these waterclosets were approved by the plaintiffs, but the plans did not show the connection between the waterclosets and the drain. In 1888 an owner of a house near the Kirk Ings Beck complained to the Local Government Board of the pollution caused to the stream by the defendants, but the Local Government Board declined to interfere. He then applied for a mandamus to compel the plaintiffs to make a proper system of drainage within their district. That application came before a divisional court, but stood over upon an undertaking by the plaintiffs to disconnect the drains of the defendants with the sewers, and so to prevent the sewage entering the Kirk Ings Beck, or to take proceedings against the defendants under the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876. The plaintiffs adopted the former alternative, but, on the motion of the defendants in the Chancery Division, Stirling, J., granted an injunction restraining the plaintiffs from diconnecting the defendants' drains with the sewer.

The plaintiffs then brought the present action, and the county court judge made the order asked for against the defendants.

On appeal to the Divisional Court Lawrance and Wright, JJ., held that the defendants were not the persons responsible for causing the sewage to flow into the stream, and entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, provides that every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow, or to be carried into any stream, any solid or liquid sewage matter shall be deemed to have committed an offence against the Act.

By section 10 the county court having jurisdiction in the place where any offence against the Act is committed may, by summary order, require any person to abstain from the commission of such offence.

Section 11 provides that there may be an appeal in any proceedings before a county court under the Act in point of law or on the merits, and that such appeal shall be by special case.

In the present case the appeal to the Divisional Court was not by special case, but by motion. The Divisional Court, however, were of opinion that though the special privilege of appeal on the merits conferred by the Act had not been taken away by the County Courts Act, 1888, yet sections 120 and 124 of that Act required the appeal to be brought by way of motion.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have committed an offence under section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, by causing sewage matter to flow into the stream. Assuming that there would have been no pollution if the plaintiffs had provided a different system of drainage, that will not exonerate the defendants: St. Helen's Chemical Co. v. Corporation of St. Helen's, 1 Ex. D. 196, 24 W. R. Dig. 165; Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, 17 W. R. 240, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 146. When an offence under the Act has been proved there is no discretion as to the making of the order. Secondly, under this Act appeals may be brought on the merits, but the appeal must be by special case; this appeal is by motion under section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which only gives appeals on points of law, and the way in which the county court judge exercised his discretion is not a matter of law. Therefore, as there was evidence before him of a breach of the Act by the defendants, this appeal must fail.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and C. M. Atkinson, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs, who have the control of the sewers, are the real offenders against the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or, at least, are joint offenders with the defendants, and so the plaintiffs cannot obtain an order under the Act which in reality amounts to an injunction. The court is entitled to deal with the question on the merits. Even if an appeal on the merits is not within section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the effect of section 124 of that Act is that all appeals from county courts must be brought in the manner provided by section 120—that is, by motion: Eder v. Levy, 19 Q. B. D. 210, 35 W. R. Dig. 152.

Dodd, Q.C., replied.

The following cases were also referred to:—Attorney-General v. Dorking Union, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595; Reg. v. Staines Local Board, 60 L. T. N. S. 261, 37

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The first question to be determined in this case is whether the defendants have committed an offence against the Rivers Pollution Act, and that depends on the construction of the Act, and on that alone. Can the defendants be said to have caused this objectionable matter to flow into the stream within the meaning of the Act? The objectionable matter starts from the defendants' premises at their volition in such a way that it must go through a sewer, and the sewer flows into the stream. Unless the defendants had acted otherwise than they did, the sewage would not have got into the stream. The defendants are the causa causans, or, at any rate, they are the causa sine qua non. The mere fact that the sewage goes through a sewer which belongs to the sanitary authority cannot prevent the defendants from being the cause of the sewage going into the stream, and therefore the defendants are within the Act. Even if the plaintiffs have been guilty of a dereliction of their duty without which the sewage would not have got into the stream, that does not prevent the defendants from being the persons who caused it to do so. It makes them both liable for a breach of the Act: the defendants for causing and the plaintiffs for permitting the deleterious matter to enter the stream; for the wrongful act of one person cannot excuse that of another. Unless, therefore, there is some infirmity in the plaintiffs' case, the injunction ought to go against the defendants. It has been argued that the court has no discretion in granting an injunction in this case—that is to say, that if a person is once brought within the Act, the court is bound, as a matter of law, to grant an injunction. Having regard to section 10 of the Act, however, I am clearly of opinion that the granting of an injunction in this matter is discretionary. Therefore the learned county court judge had a discretion, which he was bound to exercise according to law, whether on the facts of this case he should grant an injunction or not, and the question whether he did exercise that discretion rightly in granting an injunction is a question of law, and is, therefore, a matter for appeal to the Divisional Court and to this court. That question we have now to determine.

The only thing the defendants have done—namely, the sending of their sewage into the sewer—was a thing they had a perfect right to do, and it was the duty of the plaintiffs to deal with the sewage in their sewers in such a way as to prevent its becoming a nuisance to the public, and I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have failed to give any sufficient reason for not doing their duty; they have not shown they were prevented or forbidden, or that it could not be done without an unreasonable expenditure on their part. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that, the plaintiffs being joint offenders with the defendants, if we were to grant this injunction against the defendants, we should be allowing the plaintiffs to cast off the duty which was upon them of dealing with this sewage, and to throw it upon the defendants, who had a perfect right to send their sewage into the sewer, but who had the misfortune, through the plaintiffs' fault, of being the cause of the sewage flowing into the stream. I think such a result would be unjust, and that it would be wrong to exercise our judicial discretion otherwise than by refusing the injunction. For these reasons I agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether the defendants are offenders against section 3 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876. I am clearly of opinion that they are. I think that anyone is "a person who causes to flow" within the meaning of the section, who intentionally does that which is calculated in the ordinary course of things, and according to the ordinary laws of nature, to produce such a flow; and it seems to me that a person causes sewage to flow into a stream within the meaning of the section if he intentionally pours it into any channel through which, by the ordinary laws of gravitation, it will find its way into the stream.

The defendants, therefore, being offenders against the Act, what is the position of the plaintiffs? They are the local sanitary authority, and, therefore, by section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the sewers are vested in them and placed under their control. The sewage matter in the sewers is therefore also under their control. The Act prohibits the use of the sewers for the purpose of conveying sewage into a natural stream until it is freed from foul matter. The local authority is bound to empty and cleanse the sewers (section 19), and powers are given, not only of taking lands, but of constructing works for the purpose of receiving and disposing of sewage. It may be an answer in any case to say that the sewage board are without the means and have no reasonable opportunity or power of finding any way whatever for disposing of the sewage, but I shall wait until a local board in that unfortunate position comes before me before determining that question. In this case, on the materials before me, I do not doubt that there are some means in the possession of the plaintiffs by which they could dispose of the sewage so as to prevent it finding its way into the stream. If they have power it is their duty to do it, and not having done it, in the absence of justification it seems to me that they are themselves persons within the section of the Rivers Pollution Act who knowingly permit noxious matters to be carried into the stream. It is no answer to say that the Local Government Board have pronounced an opinion in their favour, and that there are no means by which they could have prevented this consequeuce. In law what the Local Government Board say would not prevent the question being afterwards decided by the court on the materials before it, but it would make us, of course, pause before we lightly assumed a thing could be done which the Local Government Board thought could not; we should examine it with great care. But on the materials before us nothing is plainer in this case than that the Local Government Board have done nothing of the kind. They have refused to impose upon the plaintiffs the necessity of making a general scheme for the district, and perhaps also the necessity of making a general scheme for part of it, but what they do not propose to do is to decide the question as to what the plaintiffs as the local board ought to do with the sewage in these two sewers.

Both the plaintiffs and the defendants are therefore in the position of offenders against the Act. In these circumstances the plaintiffs are driven to their wits' end to know what to do, because they do not want to make a general scheme for the district, and they find themselves pressed on the one side by the defendants who discharge the foecal matter into their sewer, the plaintiffs being unable to close the sewer against the defendants, and on the other side they are being pressed by the riparian proprietors. Instead of taking steps to stop the pollution of the stream, they adopt the remarkable line of putting in force the Rivers Pollution Act against the persons from whose premises the matter originally comes, forgetting that they themselves are even more in fault than the defendants, because it was their business to dispose of the sewage matter so as to prevent it going into the stream.

The Master of the Rolls has pointed out, and I agree with him, that the county court judge had a discretion to refuse or grant this application for what is in effect an injunction, though it is really an application for an order requiring the defendants to abstain from doing that which they are doing. It has been said that, when a local board stands in the position of the public, and is applying for the protection of the public to the justices or the county court for an order to prevent a nuisance or injury to the public, it is no answer to the local board to say that the local board itself has done something wrong. So stated, not much exception could be taken to that proposition so far as the local board represents the public, and it is necessary in the interests of the public that they should be represented by the local board. A case was quoted by Mr. Dodd, in which there was a compulsory duty imposed on the local board to get an order from justices to abate a nuisance, and the justices had no discretion, but were compelled to make the order. Under these circumstances the court held that it was no answer to the local board, which was in that way representing the public, that it was itself in fault, because the proceedings were compulsory and the board was bound by statute to take the step it did, quite apart from the question whether the board itself was right or wrong, and the county court judge was bound by statute to make the order.

The cases, on the other hand, in which the Attorney-General represents the Crown, and in which it has been held that the Attorney-General is not to be prejudiced in his right to ask for an information on the ground that the relators were in fault, have nothing to do with the case. The Attorney-General represents the Crown and the public, and what the relator does is not a matter which the court will consider in dealing with the matter. Unless there is something which is tainted with the injustice of the relator's proceedings there is no reason why the court should not help the public at the request of the Attorney-General simply because the person putting the Attorney-General in motion was himself in the wrong.

The cases which have been cited have no application to this case, and we come back to the section itself, which shows that the county court judge has a discretion on the prosecution either of the local board or of any other aggrieved person. Sections 8 and 10 show that the public or the aggrieved persons are not at the mercy of the local board. They can proceed for themselves. There is, therefore, ample reason for thinking that in such a case as this the conduct of the local board itself may well be taken into account in considering whether an order should be made at their instance. It does not follow as a matter of course that if the local board has been itself in the wrong the court must therefore refuse the injunction. But the conduct of the local board is a most material circumstance, and if the conduct of the local board has been such as to make it unjust that the local board itself should put the Act in force, then the ordinary principles of the courts of common law and equity in granting injunctions ought to influence this court, which has a discretionary power to make an order by way of injunction. The court will in such a case say that whoever else may be aggrieved can come and prosecute the matter themselves, but that it is not for the local board after its own conduct in the matter to do so, for it by no means follows that in such a case it is to the interests of the public that an order should be made at the instance of the local board. To make such an order would enable the plaintiffs to escape from the pressure of circumstances of their own particular district, to enable them, by stopping the flow of foecal matter from these waterclosets, to reconvert them into cesspools. It might not be at all for the interests of the public that the plaintiffs should be able to escape in that way, and having regard to their conduct I think that it would be most unjust as against the defendants that the plaintiffs should be the persons to put the law in motion. It may well be that if the matter was pressed by other persons the defendants might be able to arrange with them, but as between themselves and the plaintiffs the sole object of these proceedings is, so far as I can see, to emancipate the plaintiffs from the necessity of dealing in a reasonable and proper manner with the sewage in their own sewers.

For these reasons, which are not exactly the reasons of the court below, but reasons which commend themselves to anybody who is acquainted with the practice of the courts of equity, we say that it is not just that a local board, having acted as the plaintiffs have done, should be the persons to put in force against these particular defendants the powers of the Rivers Pollution Act.

As to the form in which this appeal has come to this court, it is an appeal from the county court judge, and I think myself that, assuming this to be an appeal on the merits, the court below were right in deciding that this appeal need not, now at least, be brought by way of special case, but that it ought to be brought by motion. Under section 124 of the County Courts Act no order of the county court is to be removed by way of appeal into any higher court except in the manner provided by the Act. Section 120 provides for appeals on questions of law, but the Act contains no provision for the special kind of provision given by the Rivers Pollution Act, under which there may be appeals upon the merits as well as upon points of law. Nevertheless it seems to me that the language of section 124 comes within the procedure indicated by section 120, and applies to appeals upon the merits under a special Act like this, although they are not within section 120 as far as the definition of appealing goes. The right of appeal in this case arises under the Rivers Pollution Act. The procedure by way of appeal is applied by section 124 of the County Courts Act coupled with ord. 59, r. 10, which indicate the procedure which now applies to all county court cases. Therefore there is nothing, as it seems to me, in the suggestion that we may not now deal with this appeal upon the merits, quite apart from what the Master of the Rolls has indicated as to this being an appeal upon the law. Putting it as an appeal on the merits, I am of opinion that we have now the power to do that which the learned county court judge ought to have done. The learned county court judge ought, in my opinion, to have acted in the way in which courts of law and equity, under such circumstances and upon such proof, would act, and that is, to refuse the injunction applied for by the person in whose mouth it does not lie to ask for it.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. I think Mr. Bosanquet's proposition was well founded, that the defendants were entitled, under the Public Health Act, 1875, to drain their manufactory into this sewer. But, in my opinion, that Act must be read in conjunction with the Rivers Pollution Act, and reading them together I think that the true construction is that although, under the former Act, the defendants were entitled to drain their waterclosets into this sewer, and thence into the stream, yet, after the passing of the latter Act, it was not lawful either for the defendants or the plaintiffs to cause to flow, or knowingly permit to flow, any sewage matter into the stream unless a deodorizing process was resorted to, or, in the case of the defendants, unless they had obtained the leave of the plaintiffs, the sanitary authority. I therefore come to the same conclusion as the Master of the Rolls and Bowen, L.J., that both the plaintiffs and the defendants are liable for offences under the Rivers Pollution Act.

On the other point I do not say who are the greatest offenders, but when both are offenders, is it right and just that one should come to this court, for the purpose of getting the yoke off his neck, and ask for an injunction against the other offender? That seems to me to be wrong, and on that ground I think that this order ought not to have been made.

On the question as to the way in which this appeal has been brought, I agree with what was said by Bowen, L.J.

Appeal dismissed.

Chan. Div. Chitty, J. — April 1, 1892.

LUBBOCK v. BRITISH BANK OF SOUTH AMERICA (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Profit and loss account—Sale of business—Profits on capital—Payment of—Dividends out of capital.

A banking company which had a nominal capital of £1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each, had issued all its shares, the sum of £5 having been paid on each share, which thus constituted a paid-up capital of £500,000. The company sold a part of its business for £875,000, realizing thereby a net profit of £205,000 after bringing the £500,000 into account, and after making certain payments to the purchasers.

Held, that the company was justified in carrying the £205,000 to the profit and loss account, and applying the same as dividends, the capital of the company (i.e., the £500,000) being intact.

Motion.

The above-named company was incorporated in 1863 as a banking company with a capital of £1,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of £10 each. All the shares of the company had been issued with £5 each paid up, constituting a paid-up capital of £500,000. In January, 1891, the company entered into an agreement to sell its goodwill and property in Brazil to a Brazilian bank for £875,000, and also agreed, on payment of the £875,000, to discontinue the use of its name and to adopt a name not indicating a bank doing business in Brazil, and the agreement contained provisions restricting the company from carrying on business in Brazil. At the end of June all the purchase-money was paid, and in November the restrictions against the company carrying on business in Brazil were relieved by the Brazilian bank on payment by the company to the latter of £75,000. The £205,000 with which the present motion was concerned was the net value of the £875,000, after deducting the £500,000 paid-up capital of the company, the £75,000 repayment, and divers sums for outgoings and compensation in reference to the sale to the Brazilian bank. On the 10th of July, 1891, the directors sent a circular to the shareholders informing them of the sale and stating that "after payment of the bonus proposed the bank's position would be as under: uncalled capital, £500,000; capital paid up, £500,000; capital reserve fund, about £350,000; general reserve fund, £75,000. On the 24th of March, 1892, the directors passed a resolution that the profit derived from the sale and repurchase of the bank's business in Brazil be treated as profit, to be carried to the profit and loss account of the bank, and dealt with accordingly. This was a motion by the shareholders to restrain the company from acting on the resolution and from placing the sum of £205,000 to the profit and loss account of the company, and from dealing with or distributing the same as if it were income of the company.

CHITTY, J.—This is a trading company. I have before me the company's accounts up to December, 1890. They put down on one side their liabilities, treating properly the £500,000 which has been subscribed by the shareholders as a liability, for the purposes of bringing it into account, as against the assets, which they put down on the other side. Then on the same liability side they properly put down their current liabilities, and certain other liabilities and reserve fund, which the company, according to its constitution, is justified in making, and they add up the total amount of those liabilities. On the other side they put down their assets, and for the purpose of giving information to the shareholders they divide the assets into certain heads, "Cash at bank," "Bank premises and managers' residences in Brazil" and the "River Plate," and then they add up the total on that side. They, of course—because there is not a suggestion that these accounts are not kept with perfect propriety and perfect honesty—therefore put down on the assets side the money value of their assets, some being in money itself and some not. Then when the two sides of this account are compared there is a surplus of £44,000 shown, which goes, according to the accountant's regular method of keeping accounts, to the liability side, and represents the balance of assets over liabilities. Now what is the result of keeping an account in this form? The capital of the bank is intact, and the account shows it, and after providing for the capital, there remains a surplus, which rightly goes to the profit and loss account. All that the company is required to do by the force of the Companies Act, 1862, is to keep its capital intact, and not to pay dividends out of its own capital; in other words, to keep that capital for its creditors and any others who may be concerned therewith. That mode of keeping the account is an excellent illustration of the right way to divide profit and loss. Taking the figures on this account this sum of £44,000 is profit made, and profit available, within the Act of 1862, for division among the shareholders, unless there is something in the articles which would prevent the directors and prevent the company from dividing the sum which thus stands to their credit. I say I have great difficulty in following the argument for the plaintiff, because it was said that what was sold was part of the capital of the company, and that what came in over and above the £500,000 was an accretion to capital, and that therefore it must be kept intact as part of the capital. That has, with great respect to the counsel who put forward this argument, nothing to do with the matter. The sale being an authorized sale, it is immaterial what is the thing sold. I put during the argument a humble illustration. A man's business is to make boots and shoes. He has £10,000 which he takes into that business as his capital. He makes boots and shoes, and spends the whole of his £10,000 in doing it, and he sells and gets back from his customers a certain sum on the sale. He compares then, assuming he has sold all, what he has got back with his expenditure in producing the boots and shoes and putting them on the market, and if he finds he has his £10,000 (I am treating it apart from any question of debts outstanding, supposing it a good, solid sale), then his capital is intact, and the surplus, if there is any, is profit. On the other hand, if he has only £9,000, his capital is not intact, and he has lost. It is exactly the same principle that has to be applied to a trading company under the Companies Act, and the capital that has to be regarded for the purpose of the Act is the capital according to the Act, and not the things, whether houses, goods, boots and shoes, or hats, or whatsoever it may be for the time being representing the capital, in the sense of being things in which the capital has been laid out.

The result, therefore, is plain that on the facts of this case £205,000 is profit. Now I turn to the articles of the company, and I find there with regard to the dividends, article 176 provides that "all dividends on shares, other than a dividend on account, shall be declared by the ordinary meetings, and no dividend shall exceed the sum recommended to the meeting by the board." The article proceeds on the footing that the books of the bank are properly kept, as to which, without fear of being mistaken, I say there is no question or suggestion. That requires that the capital of the bank should be intact, and in this case, applying that article to the actual facts of the case, that means the £500,000, neither more nor less. Then comes article 29, which provides for the creation of a reserve fund. The directors propose to act on article 29, and to appropriate out of the profits of the bank such an amount as they shall think proper, and add the same to the reserve fund. But according to the constitution of the bank this £205,000, being a profit, has first to be carried to the profit and loss account. Then the directors, if they should think fit, would be entitled under article 29 to attribute a portion of it to the reserve fund, and the balance will be an available sum for dividend. The directors will make a proposal to the meeting which is about to be held, and if their proposal is accepted the meeting will pass a resolution authorizing the dividend, and it would be a dividend out of this £205,000, or so much as shall not have been appropriated by the directors themselves to the reserve fund. All that, to my mind, is plain, and I cannot find any ground on which the proposition which was advanced in a friendly manner by the plaintiff can be sustained, except, possibly, on the ground of the circular of the 10th of July, upon which it was said that it amounted to a representation by the directors to the members of the company which precluded them from dealing with this £205,000 by paying it to the profit and loss account, because it was alleged that the directors had called it capital reserve fund. There is really nothing in this argument. The circular was only a statement of what the result of the sale was expected to be. In my opinion the directors will be justified in acting upon the resolution which they have passed, and in carrying the sum of £205,000 to the profit and loss account, and then dealing with it in accordance with the articles. Therefore I refuse the motion.

BROMPTON HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION v. LEWIS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, s. 9—Will made before passing of Act—Death of testator after passing of Act.

A testator by his will, dated before the passing of the Mortmain Act, 1891, gave his residuary estate, consisting of realty and personalty, "in trust to pay such part of my said residuary estate which may by law be given for charitable purposes to the Brompton Hospital." He gave the remainder of his residuary trust estate to his wife's niece. Testator died after the passing of the Mortmain Act, 1891.

Held, that the hospital was entitled to the whole of testator's residuary estate.

By his will, dated the 29th of June, 1891, Mr. Walter Bridger gave the residue of his estate, consisting of real and personal property, to trustees in trust to pay the income thereof to his wife for her life, and after her death in trust "to pay such part of my said residuary trust estate which may by law be given for charitable purposes unto the Brompton Hospital for Consumption." And the testator gave "the rest and remainder of my said residuary trust estate in trust for my wife's niece, Elizabeth Williams, spinster, absolutely."

The testator died on the 20th of February, 1892. The Mortmain Act of 1891, enabling land and impure personalty to be given by will for charitable purposes, was passed on the 5th of August, 1891, after the date of testator's will, but before the date of his death. Section 9 of the Act provides that "this Act shall only apply to the will of a testator dying after the passing of this Act."

An originating summons was taken out to have it determined whether the Brompton Hospital was, subject to the life interest of testator's widow, entitled to the whole of the testator's residuary estate, or whether Elizabeth Williams was entitled to any, and what part thereof.

Sir A. T. Watson, Q.C., and J. T. Prior, for the hospital, cited Hasluck v. Pedley, 23 W. R. 155, L. R. 19 Eq. 271, and Constable v. Constable, 11 Ch. D. 681, 27 W. R. Dig. 230.

Ingle Joyce, for the trustees of the will.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Charles Crawley, for Miss Williams.—When the testator made his will he could only have given, and could only have intended to give, his pure personalty to the hospital. The court cannot, owing to a change in the law, put a different construction on the words he has used.

They relied on Jones v. Ogle, 21 W. R. 236, L. R. 8 Ch. 192, and In re March, Mander v. Harris, 32 W. R. 941, 27 Ch. D. 166.

NORTH, J.—This case is settled by the language of the Act. As I understand the words of section 9, they mean that the Act is to apply to the will of a testator dying after the passing of the Act. I am asked to say that this means the Act shall only apply to a will made or confirmed by codicil after the passing of the Act. This is entirely different from what the Act intended. For else why should "dying after" be referred to, if that is not the important thing. I cannot treat the Act as not meaning what it says, which I should do by holding that the words referred to the date of the will, and not to the date of the death. The testator might no doubt have expressed a contrary intention, as if, for example, he had said, "all that I can as the law now stands give to charity." But I cannot so read his will. I think the testator did intend to give all he could, to charity, and that the words "may by law be given" refer to the time at which the will should take effect. As regards the cases cited it is not necessary to go into detail, but I fail to see why Hasluck v. Pedley and Constable v. Constable do not refer to the present case; nor do I see how the cases in the Court of Appeal, In re March and Jones v. Ogle, displace their authority.

The hospital was therefore declared entitled to the whole of the residue.

(Limited), then standing in his name, a proportional part of the second mortgage debenture bonds for £335 17s. 5d. and £353 13s. 11d. which were issued to the receiver in the action (which was an ordinary creditor's action for administration), by the company in respect of arrears of dividends upon the 10,000 shares and certain other shares, and also to have paid to him a proportional part of the interest which had been paid by the company to the receiver upon the said bonds. The testator in the action created an equitable security in June, 1886, and transferred the shares to the mortgagee, the applicant. The transfer was not registered. The interest on the mortgage was paid down to April, 1888. On the 26th of July, 1889, debentures were issued to the receiver, representing a dividend on the shares.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21.—STIRLING, J.—This is a motion to discharge an order made in chambers, which raises a question as to who is entitled to certain debentures which have been issued in respect of the interest on certain shares in a company called the United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. (Limited), which stood in the name of the testator at the time of his death. On the 30th of June, 1886, the testator appears to have created an equitable security on the shares in question, the precise nature of which I do not know; but it appears to have consisted partly of a transfer to the mortgagee, which transfer the mortgagee did not see fit to have registered. On the 10th of May, 1889, the testator died. Interest on the security had been paid up till April, 1888. Shortly after the testator's death the present action was begun. It is an action by a creditor on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the testator for the administration of his estate; and on the 7th of June, 1889, an order was made appointing a receiver. On the 26th of July, 1889, certain debentures were issued by the company to the receiver of the nominal value of £689 11s. 4d., representing a dividend of $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. on the mortgaged shares, and on other shares held by the testator, for the year 1888, the period during which it accrued being prior to the death of the testator. The mortgagee took no steps in the action till February, 1892, when he came in and valued his security and proved for the balance. Subsequently, in March, he was registered as transferee of the mortgaged shares. The question was raised in chambers on an application for directions as to who was entitled to the debentures representing the interest on the shares. On the contention of the mortgagee that he was entitled to them, it was held that that contention was not well founded, and that they formed part of the general estate of the testator. A motion is now made to discharge that order.

The first argument is that the debentures, being in the hands of the receiver, are in custodiâ legis, and ought to be handed over to the mortgagee. In support of that contention three cases were cited—Walker v. Bell, Tatham v. Parker, and Delany v. Mansfield. The first two cases relate to property in the hands, not of a receiver, but of a sequestrator, and the cases in question, and the authorities referred to in them, establish the proposition contended for so far as sequestrators are concerned; and if the property here had been in the hands of a sequestrator I should have had to follow them. But receivers are not in the same position at law as sequestrators, and the question is whether I must apply the same rule to them.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In support of the contention that I should do so, Delany v. Mansfield was relied on. There a motion was made for the plaintiff in the first cause that a consent signed by the defendant might be made a rule of court in both causes. The consent was that the receiver, who had been lately extended to the second cause, might pay a sum of money which was previously in his hands to the plaintiff in the first cause. The bill in the first cause was filed in 1822 for the purpose of raising the arrears of an annuity, and there was a receiver on process in May, 1823. The plaintiff in the second cause, though a prior incumbrancer, was not made a party to the first cause. The bill in the second cause was filed in 1824, and the receiver was afterwards extended to that cause. He had previously collected three years' rent, and the plaintiff in the first cause rested his present application on the ground that, as these rents were collected in consequence of his diligence, the court would consider them as bygone rents as against the plaintiff in the second cause. The Master of the Rolls said: "I do not consider the right of the plaintiff in the first cause to be such as he now asserts it. This application is inconsistent with the course of business in a court of equity, as a receiver in a cause is not appointed for the benefit of a plaintiff merely, but for all other persons who may establish rights in the cause. A receiver cannot be more the agent of the plaintiff than a sequestrator; and Walker v. Bell is an authority to show that rents received by a sequestrator are not considered as vested in the plaintiff, but are in custodiâ legis, and there must be a further order before they can be applied for the benefit of the defendant; and if other parties come in the meantime and establish a prior right, they become entitled to them. Any argument which treats rents in the hands of a receiver as if paid to the plaintiff is quite unfounded and subversive of the rights of prior creditors who are not parties to the cause to be examined pro interesse suo. If money as soon as collected by a receiver is to be considered the property of the plaintiff, every inquiry in a decree as to prior incumbrances must be to a great extent useless. If a puisne creditor gets a receiver a prior creditor may file a bill and attach the money in his hands." Delany v. Mansfield is not binding on me, being an Irish decision, but of course it is deserving of all respect. The decision may be right, but I do not think that the learned judge intended to lay down that in all cases moneys in the hands of a receiver are to be treated as in custodiâ legis, in the same way as they would be in the hands of a sequestrator. This would be inconsistent with English cases of high authority which are binding on me. I shall refer to two or three of these cases. [His lordship then referred to and discussed the following cases: Bertie v. Lord Abingdon, 3 Mer. 560; Gresley v. Adderley, 1 Swans. 573; Thomas v. Brigstocke, and continued:—] It seems to me that these decisions are inconsistent with the contention that money in the hands of a receiver is in custodiâ legis in the same way as if it were in the hands of a sequestrator. It was argued that in Thomas v. Brigstocke it was made out that the receipt by the receiver was on behalf of persons who claimed under the will of the testator, and that the case could be distinguished on that ground: if so, that was an abandonment of the first point; but it leads to what in my opinion is the true rule: that where money is in the hands of a receiver, you must look in each case to the nature of the action and the object of the appointment of the receiver. Where the object of the action is to ascertain who are the incumbrancers on a particular property and their priorities, or to settle a dispute as to title, it well may be that the receiver holds money coming to his hands on behalf of the person who may prove to be the true owner. Here the action is simply an ordinary creditor's action in which a receiver has been appointed. The object of the action is to obtain payment of the testator's debts out of his assets. The object of the appointment of a receiver is to secure that all assets properly applicable for that purpose shall be so applied. In ordinary course those assets would be received by the executor, but here, for some good reason, and for the security of the creditors, the court has appointed its own officer to stand (so far as the receipt of the assets is concerned) in the executor's place. It seems to me that the creditors cannot, as regards the application of the assets thus received, be in a worse position than if the executors had received them. It was admitted (as it could not but be) by the counsel for the mortgagee that if these debentures had come to the hands of the executor the mortgagee would have had no claim. I think, therefore, that the application on his behalf fails.

Lease—Grant of sub-lease—Right to inspect lessee's title—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 3 (1), 13 (1).

On the grant of a sub-lease by a lessee, the intending sub-lessee has a right to inspect the lessee's lease.

Appeal of the defendant from the judgment of the deputy judge of the City of London Court.

The plaintiff by his action sought to recover the sum of £10, paid by him to the defendant as deposit, under an agreement for the sale to him by the defendant, at the price of £180, of a messuage held by the defendant under an original lease. The agreement provided that the purchaser should take an underlease of the property for the residue of the vendor's term, less a few days, at an apportioned ground-rent. The defendant refused to give an abstract of title. The plaintiff accordingly brought this action in the City of London Court for the return of the deposit. The deputy judge held that the plaintiff had a right to demand an inspection of the defendant's lease, out of which the sub-lease was to be granted, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 3 (1).—Under a contract to sell and assign a term of years derived out of a leasehold interest in land, the intended assign shall not have the right to call for the title to the leasehold reversion.

Section 13 (1).—On a contract to grant a lease for a term of years to be derived out of a leasehold interest, with a leasehold reversion, the intended lessee shall not have the right to call for the title to that reversion.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Megone, for the defendant.—The decision of the judge in the court below was wrong. This is an agreement for the sale or assignment of a term of years derived out of a leasehold interest. The plaintiff contends that he has a right to call for the defendant's title, but that is a title to a leasehold reversion. Sections 3 (1) and 13 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, show that such a title may not be asked for: Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353.

Elgood, for the plaintiff, was not called on.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that the decision appealed from is right, and that it is impossible to put any construction other than that put by the judge in the court below upon the sections of the Conveyancing Act relied on by the defendant. The words "leasehold reversion" in those sections do not refer to a lease out of which a sub-lease is to be granted, but to the reversion, if leasehold and not freehold, expectant on the determination of that lease. It would require very strong words to alter the course of practice which has prevailed for a long time in cases such as this.

In re ONWARD BUILDING SOCIETY (No. 2). (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Sale of property by public auction—Scale of charges for property sold in lot—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), General Order, schedule 1.

Where property sold by public auction is divided into different lots, the scale of charges is to be a commission upon the aggregate sum realized by the whole of the property, and not upon the value of each different lot, although the lots be held by the vendor under different titles, and be sold to different persons.

This was an appeal from the county court judge at Durham, on his refusal to vary a certificate of taxation.

The Onward Building Society being in liquidation, Mr. Watson, a solicitor, was employed to conduct the sale by auction of certain freehold and leasehold property of the society. The property was sold in three lots. Each lot was held under a different title and was sold to a different buyer. Lot 1 fetched £102 10s.; lot 2, £270 5s.; and lot 3, £262 10s., the total amounting to £635 5s.

By schedule 1 of the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, the vendor's solicitor is entitled to a commission of 20s. per £100 for the first £1,000 "for conducting a sale of property by public auction, including the conditions of sale, when the property is sold; a minimum of £5 to be made whether a sale is effected or not." By rule 7 made under this General Order "fractions of £100 under £50 are to be reckoned as £50; fractions of £100 above £50 are to be reckoned as £100."

By rule 1 "the commission for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance on a sale by auction is to be chargeable on each lot of property, except that where a property held under the same title is divided into lots for convenience of sale, and the same purchaser buys several such lots and takes one conveyance and only one abstract is delivered, the commission is to be chargeable on the aggregate charge of the lots."

By rule 2 "the commission upon an attempted sale by auction in lots is to be charged upon the aggregate of the reserved prices."

A solicitor, under these circumstances, sent in a bill of costs for £15, being a charge of £5 on each of the three lots. The registrar of the county court refused to allow the charges, and reduced the bill upon taxation to £6 10s., being the scale fee on the aggregate price of the three lots. The solicitor moved in the county court to vary the registrar's certificate, but the judge refused to vary it, and the solicitor appealed.

Scott Fox, for the appellant.—It may be that the solicitor was not entitled to make a minimum charge in respect of each lot, but he is certainly entitled to a commission of 20s. per £100 for each lot. That would amount to £7 10s., because, by rule 7, fractions of £100 under £50 are to be reckoned as £50, and fractions of £100 over £50 are to be reckoned as £100. The lots were held by vendors under different titles and they were sold to different purchasers, so that the commission for deducing title under rule 1 would certainly be chargeable upon each of the lots, and it is unreasonable to suppose, in the absence of any express provision, that a different mode of calculating the commission should apply to conducting a sale.

Dibdin, for the liquidator, was not called upon.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that in this case the county court judge was right, and that the appeal must consequently be dismissed. The official liquidator of the Onward Building Society offered certain real property for sale by auction, and employed a solicitor to conduct the sale. The property, which was sold in three lots, realized in the aggregate £632 5s., and the question which has arisen is as to the proper charges to be made by the solicitor for conducting such sale. The county court judge held that the three lots were to be treated as one property, and that the solicitor was consequently entitled to a commission of £6 10s. and no more. That view seems to me to be correct. I think that the intention of the schedule was, that if property was put up for sale by auction, the solicitor conducting the sale was to be entitled to the scale fee of 20s. per £100 on the total amount realized by the sale, irrespective of the question whether the property was sold as a whole or in lots. But then it was argued that rule 1 points to a different conclusion, providing, as it does, that except in certain cases—of which the present is not one—the commission for deducing title is to be chargeable on each lot of property, and it was contended that there was no such distinction between the work of deducing title and of conducting a sale by auction, as to warrant the application of a different rule to the latter. But in that I do not agree. On the contrary, I think that that rule tells against the solicitor's contention, for in limiting the charge of the commission on each lot to the case of deducing title, it suggests that in all other cases the commission is to be charged on the property as a whole, on the principle that "expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question which we are called upon in this case to decide is, What is the amount of the commission payable to a solicitor for selling on behalf of his client real property by auction in a case in which the property is sold in lots? The answer to that question depends upon the construction which is to be put upon the language of schedule 1 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and of the rules annexed to that schedule. It is provided by the schedule that the commission payable to a "vendor's solicitor for conducting a sale of property by public auction" shall, "when the property is sold," be 20s. per £100 for the first £1,000. Then, what are we to understand by the word "property"? Where the land is put up for sale in several lots, is each lot for the purposes of the schedule to be treated as a separate property? I think not. In my judgment the word "property" means the whole of the land intrusted to the solicitor for sale, or such portion of it as is actually sold, and, consequently, where more than one lot is sold the solicitor is entitled to commission at the rate of 20s. per £100 upon the aggregate of the prices realized by the whole of the lots so sold.

With regard to the lots which are not sold, the schedule provides that "when the property is not sold" the solicitor shall be entitled to 10s. per £100 on "the reserved price," and if those words stood by themselves, without any explanation in the rules which follow, I should feel myself driven to the conclusion that in such case the "reserved price" would mean the reserved price of each lot, for when some of the lots have been sold there is no price reserved in respect of the aggregate of the unsold lots, though there is a price reserved in respect of each of the unsold lots taken severally.

I now pass to the consideration of the rules. By rule 1: "The commission for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance on a sale by auction is to be chargeable on each lot of property except where a property held under the same title is divided into lots for convenience of sale, and the same purchaser buys several such lots and takes one conveyance, and only one abstract is delivered, the commission is chargeable upon the aggregate prices of the lots." And that, I think, is reasonable enough, for, save in the cases falling within the exception, the work of the solicitor in respect of deducing title and completing conveyance is multiplied by the number of the lots, he may have to deduce a separate title in respect of each lot, and, even if they are held under the same title, he has the trouble of delivering a separate abstract and preparing a separate conveyance for each purchaser. It is otherwise, however, with the conduct of a sale by auction, which is practically one operation whether the property is offered as a whole or in lots. The division of the property into lots does not materially increase the trouble of conducting the auction. Then by rule 2: "The commission on an attempted sale by auction in lots is to be chargeable on the aggregate of the reserved prices." That provision, I think, is applicable as well to a case where some of the lots are sold, as to one in which none are sold. That rule, therefore, negatives the view which without it, as I have already said, I should have taken of the meaning of the words "reserved price" in the schedule. And the effect of the schedule read by the light of that rule is, that where property is offered in lots and a portion only is sold the solicitor is entitled in respect of the unsold portion to 10s. per £100, not on the reserved price of each lot, but on the aggregate of the reserved prices of the lots. The judgment of the county court judge must be affirmed.

LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK v. SIMMONS. (a.)

Banker—Negotiable instrument—Broker—Bonâ fide holder for value—Deposit of securities.

S. was a customer of H., D., & Co., stockbrokers, and had left in the hands of D., one of the members of H., D., & Co., for custody, a number of bonds known as "Cedulas." On the 12th of October, 1887, D., desiring to raise money for purposes of his own, and without any authority from S., contracted to sell these bonds, and on the same day he made a further contract to repurchase similar bonds for the 28th of October. On the 28th of October D. delivered the bonds which he had contracted to sell in three separate lots, and on the same day he took delivery of the other similar bonds which he had contracted to buy. For the bonds so delivered to him he paid by a crossed cheque, and in order to put himself in funds to meet it he sent the bonds of which he had taken delivery, with other securities, to the appellant bank, on receipt of which the appellants placed £6,000 to his credit. Out of this sum the cheque was cashed. The bonds so deposited remained in the custody of the bank till D. absconded in June, 1888, when S. applied to the bank for the bonds, which, however, had been sold for a price which was admitted to have been fair. In an action against the bank by S. to recover the price of these bonds, Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 39 W. R. 449, [1891] 1 Ch. 270), that, the Cedula bonds being negotiable instruments, the bank, taking them in good faith and for value, acquired a good title.

Lord Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank, 37 W. R. 33, 13 App. Cas. 333, distinguished.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) (39 W. R. 449, [1891] 1 Ch. 270).

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Herschell and in the report in the court below.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Finlay, Q.C. (W. D. Rawlins with them), for the appellants.—Two questions arise—(1) whether Simmons had title? (2) whether the bank obtained bonâ fide title for value without notice? Goodwin v. Robarts, 24 W. R. 987, 1 App. Cas. 476, is conclusive in our favour. Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank, 37 W. R. 33, 13 App. Cas. 333, is a different case to this.

They referred also to London and County Banking Co. v. London and River Plate Bank, 37 W. R. 89, 21 Q. B. D. 535; Foster v. Pearson, 1 C. M. & R. 849; Raphael v. Bank of England, 4 W. R. 10, 17 C. B. 161; Lang v. Smyth, 7 Bing. 284, 293.

Rigby, Q.C., and Warmington, Q.C. (Grosvenor Woods with them), for the respondent.—The entire profits in the bonds were vested in Simmons before the transaction with the bank. (The case was dealt with on the assumption that the bonds had been appropriated to the respondent and his property.) If bankers know that he is acting as agent they should inquire: Cooke v. Eshelby, 35 W. R. 629, 12 App. Cas. 271, 275. The bank cannot claim beyond the actual authority given to the broker or agent: Lord Sheffield's case.

Finlay, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

April 4.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I believe this case, when it is examined carefully, raises no question of law, though doubtless some questions raised in other cases seem at first sight to be touched by it.

There is no doubt that the property which is the subject of debate (the character and quality of which I will discuss later), was at one time the property of the plaintiff. There is no doubt that the plaintiff, having left this property in the hands of a person named Delmar, one of the members of the firm of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., merely for safe custody, gave no authority, express or implied, to Delmar to dispose of it, and there is no doubt that unless that property has been changed it is still the property of the plaintiff, and ought to be restored to him.

I prefer stating the proposition in this form, because, though the disposal of one set of bonds, and the repurchase of others in their place, and their suggested appropriation as substitutes for those unlawfully disposed of, raises another question, it appears to me that the same question would arise in a much simpler form, but subject to precisely the same principles of law in the form which I have suggested.

Applying myself, therefore, to the simple form in which I have suggested that the question might be raised, the first point relied on is that the property in question is, according to the law merchant, negotiable, and if passed over, even by a person who had no title, but to one who received for value, in good faith, and without knowledge of the want of title in his predecessor in title, a good title is made by such transfer to an innocent holder for value.

If the facts support this proposition, it cannot be doubted—and first, as to the character and quality of the property itself, it consists of bonds known as "Cedulas." It seems to me here it is impossible to dispute that the bonds in question were negotiable instruments. I should have thought so upon the evidence, and after the decision of your lordships' House in Goodwin v. Robarts. But I should equally think so here from the course pursued at the trial.

I take the statement of the facts from the judgment of Bowen, L.J., who said:—"An admission was made at the trial to the effect that these bonds were commonly transferred from hand to hand by delivery, and this must be taken to be true. But the admission was carefully limited, and still left uncovered the question whether they are negotiable instruments in the sense in which bills of exchange and promissory notes are negotiable, so that delivery by a person who has no title confers, nevertheless, a title on a bonâ fide holder for value without notice. We should require either a more unqualified admission or else more conclusive evidence before we could accept the view that bonds like these had become part of the currency of this country, so as to have acquired the peculiar characteristics of a completely negotiable instrument. The appellants' counsel alleged that they had been misled at the trial by the form of the admission, and asked that, before we decided the case on the hypothesis that these bonds were not completely negotiable, an issue might be directed to try that question. For fear of a miscarriage of justice, we will, therefore, assume in the appellants' favour and for the purpose of this case only, that the documents in question had been proved to be completely negotiable instruments."

It is to my mind clear, therefore, that your lordships, if any doubt remained on the question whether these bonds were or were not negotiable in the true commercial sense of the term, could not decide this case without directing an issue such as the appellants' counsel demanded; in the event of your lordships considering that the evidence and admission made at the trial of what is after all in each case a question of fact were insufficient, it would be impossible to decide adversely to the appellants. For my own part, I do not see how, after the evidence and the admission made at the trial, it is possible to suggest that that matter of fact is left in doubt.

The remaining part of the proposition is, as I have said, equally a question of fact, Did the bankers receive these bonds in good faith? and, though it was almost involved in the proposition, without any reason to suppose that the person from whom they received them had no right to so dispose of them; and I am of opinion that they did. There is not, to my mind, the least reason to suppose that the bank did not take these bonds in the ordinary course of business, and with a full belief that the person from whom they received them was either the owner or had full authority to deal with them, as, in fact, he did deal with them.

The Court of Appeal appear to have been much influenced by the decision of your lordships' House in the case of Lord Sheffield v. The London Joint-Stock Bank.

The first observation that I would make is, that if, as I believe, it to be accurate, that the question is one which is to be determined upon the facts of the case, no one case can be an authority for another. The only question of law decided in Lord Sheffield's case was that a purchaser, even for value, cannot insist on his purchase if he knows that the person from whom he purchases has no right to sell, no very novel principle of law, nor one upon which, I should think, much doubt can exist.

The second observation I make is that in this case the claim is to take from the bankers the securities they have received without paying what had been advanced upon them. In Lord Sheffield's case no one doubted that the bankers were entitled to receive the amount which had, in fact, been authorized by the owner of the securities to be raised upon them. But the cardinal distinction between the two cases is that in this case, upon the facts proved, I am of opinion that the bankers were under the full belief and conviction the bonds were being lawfully dealt with, whereas in Lord Sheffield's case I thought (and I believe those of your lordships who were parties to that judgment thought also) that the bank had actual knowledge that the person pledging them had only a limited authority to raise money upon them. And although it was also considered that the bank sincerely believed that, as matter of law, that gave them a right to hold the securities for advances made beyond that limited amount, your lordships held that the mistake of the bankers as to the matter of law did not cure the effect of their knowledge of the fact that the person to whom they advanced the money was exceeding the limit of his authority.

In expressing my opinion in Lord Sheffield's case I said: "But I do not believe Mozley's business could have lasted a month if the banks had not allowed this system to continue by exchanging securities. Mozley was, as he says himself, entitled to pledge them to the extent to which he had advanced money upon them, and the conclusion I draw from the facts proved is that the banks knew very well the system of money lending pursued by Mozley, and trusted to him that he would not over-pledge, so to speak, the securities of his customers. Otherwise, the very first security refused to Mozley's customer upon his tendering the amount advanced upon it would have brought the whole business to a very speedy end. If this is the true view of the facts, it is impossible to contend that the bank is entitled to the position of purchasers for value without notice. I think they had actual knowledge, but if they had reason to think that the securities might be Mozley's own, or might belong to somebody else, I think they were bound to inquire."

Lord Watson said: "In my opinion the character of the transactions between the respondents and Mozley was of itself sufficient to notify to them that his interest was limited. The bank officials, when examined before the judge of first instance, substantially admitted that they knew that the bulk of the securities lodged by Mozley were those of his customers; and apart from the admission, it is a matter of plain inference that they must have had that knowledge."

Lord Macnaghten said: "The banks knew that the person who dealt with them as owner was not acting by right of ownership."

And Lord Bramwell, though he was careful to disclaim an absolutely accurate definition of what was notice of the infirmity of the title, indicated that, in his opinion, at the same time the banks lent their money they had "notice of the infirmity of the pledgor's title, or of such facts and matters as made it reasonable that inquiry should be made into such title." He added that it was probably incomplete, but sufficient for the case he was then deciding.

Assuming all your lordships who were parties to that decision to have been right in your view of the facts, and I certainly see no reason to doubt the conclusion at which I in common with your lordships arrived, it is obvious to ask, what new principle of law is it possible to suggest was there laid down? It is manifest there was none.

Now when I turn from the facts proved in Lord Sheffield's case to the case now before your lordships (although I must make a protest that it is not a very profitable inquiry to consider whether one case resembles another in its facts), I am of opinion that every one of the elements relied upon in that case to show the knowledge of the banks of the infirmity of the title is absent here.

I can find no trace of any such course of business brought home to the knowledge of the bankers as would give them the least suspicion that their clients had not full authority to deal as they were dealing with the securities in their hands. I observe the question was plainly put by Sir Horace Davey to one of the witnesses, who was asked whether there was a custom on the Stock Exchange for brokers to make one client's bonds or stock security for another client's debt, and the answer was, No. It was then put that if the securities of ten clients were brought en bloc to the bank to borrow £10,000, the effect might be to make one client's property the security for money borrowed for another; the witness disclaimed any suspicion of any such transaction, and I confess I cannot share the view that Kekewich, J., took of the re-examination. Mr. Warmington asked, in substance, whether the banks did not suppose that they were dealing with honest men, obviously suggesting to my mind that it would be dishonest for Mr. A. to make Mr. B. security for Mr. A.'s loan.

Kekewich, J., seems to have been under the impression that relying on the broker's honesty did not alter the result. But to my mind it makes the whole difference. If there is £10,000 borrowed, and ten different clients' securities, what is there to tell the bank, or to suggest to the bank, that the ten clients had not each either a joint interest in the £10,000 or a several interest, which their several property justifies the broker in pledging? I do not, of course, mean to suggest any such mental process on the part of the broker as that he should be supposed to be appropriating only such part of the deposited securities as would properly be pledgable to each individual customer, but what appears to me very clear is that there is nothing in the nature of the transaction, nothing in the position of broker and customer respectively, which makes it a reasonable inference that the broker was exceeding his authority, or, indeed, that there was anything which could be reasonably supposed to raise a doubt on the subject.

The inferences derived from the business carried on by the money-lender in Lord Sheffield's case were peculiar to that case, and have no relation to the course of business which brokers habitually pursue towards their own clients, and for their own clients, when dealing with bankers with whom they deposit securities. The deposit of securities as "cover" in a broker's business is as well known a course of dealing as anything can possibly be, and the phrase that they are deposited en bloc seems to me to be somewhat fallacious. That they are, in fact, deposited by the broker at one time, and to raise one sum, may be true. It does not follow, and I do not know, that the banker could reasonably be expected to presume that they belonged to different customers, and that the limit of the broker's authority was applied to each individual security by his own client. It would, therefore, to my mind, be as totally different from the facts proved or inferred in Lord Sheffield's case as anything could well be.

I do not think that in that case any countenance was given to the notion that because Mozley, the money-lender, was assumed to be the agent for the owners of the property that circumstance alone put the bank upon inquiry as to his title to the property with which he dealt. To lay down as a broad proposition that in every case you must inquire whether a known agent has the authority of his principal would undoubtedly be a startling proposition, and certainly nothing said in Lord Sheffield's case could justify so novel an idea.

The broad proposition laid down by Abbott, C.J., in Gorgier v. Mieville, 3 B. & C. 45, that "a negotiable instrument by delivery to any person holding it gives a good title to any person honestly acquiring it," seems to me to be decisive of this case.

The property in question, for reasons I have already given, was, or must be presumed to be, negotiable. I think there was nothing in the evidence to raise a doubt that it was honestly acquired by the bank, and I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Lord WATSON.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, and I shall endeavour to state shortly the considerations which induce me to differ from the decision of the Court of Appeal.

In the courts below, as at your lordships' bar, three questions were discussed. Were the Cedula bonds for 15,000 dollars, deposited by Delmar with the appellant bank, on account of his firm, the property of the respondent? Were those bonds negotiable instruments? Lastly, if the bonds belonged to the respondent and were negotiable, is the bank, in a question with the respondent, entitled to retain them?

I am prepared to answer the first of these questions in the affirmative. I am of opinion with Bowen, L.J., and for the same reasons, that the bonds, before they were taken to the bank, on the 20th of October, 1887, had been appropriated to the respondent, in substitution for his original bonds of the same amount, which Delmar had previously disposed of without authority.

The second question must also, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative. Each bond, according to its tenor, appears to me to represent that the document will pass from hand to hand, and that any bonâ fide holder will be entitled to claim fulfilment of its terms from the Buenos Ayres Bank, by whom it was issued. Then there is direct testimony to the effect that on the London Stock Exchange the bonds do pass from hand to hand by delivery only, and are treated as negotiable securities, and no attempt was made to shake that testimony either by cross-examination or by adducing evidence to the contrary.

In my opinion it necessarily follows from the negotiable character of the documents that Delmar, who was lawfully in possession of them for a special purpose, was nevertheless in a position to give a valid title to any person acquiring the bonds from him in good faith and for value, although the transaction on his part involved a fraud upon the respondent. That is the rule of law which was laid down by Parke, B. (following the older authorities), in Foster v. Pearson, and it met with the approval of this House in Goodwin v. Robarts.

That the appellants gave value for the bonds is not disputed, and I have not found anything in the evidence or in the circumstances of this case to suggest that they acted otherwise than in good faith. They were dealing with a broker at that time of unblemished repute, and seeing that brokers, in the ordinary course of business, are employed to sell, to buy, and to raise money upon as well as to keep in custody the securities of their customers, I think the appellants were entitled to assume, in the absence of aught to indicate the contrary, that, whether the bonds belonged to Delmar or to a customer, he had full authority to deal with them. The real question is whether the appellants believed at the time that Delmar had such authority, and I see no reason to doubt that they honestly entertained that belief.

The Court of Appeal, whose judgment was delivered by Bowen, L.J., seem to have held that, in point of fact, the appellants believed that Delmar had authority to raise money on the Cedula bonds in question, within the limit of their market value, but not to deposit them en bloc, together with other securities, in order to raise a lump sum upon the whole. Even upon that assumption I should have given judgment for the appellants. They were, in my opinion, clearly entitled to retain the bonds for the amount which Delmar had apparent authority to borrow. I may observe that in the case where the true owner authorizes a specific chattel to be impledged for its market value he might suffer prejudice, and it would be an excess of the authority which he gave to deposit it as part security for a larger sum. I doubt whether the same principle applies where the authority relates, not to a specific chattel, but to negotiable securities which are the subject of traffic upon the Stock Exchange. In that case it appears to me to be immaterial to the true owner whether his securities are pledged by themselves for their full market value, or are deposited with other securities in order to cover an advance beyond that value.

The learned judges in the courts below do not appear to have accepted the judgment of this House in Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank in the same sense in which it has been regarded here. With reference to that case I can only say that it certainly was not my intention to apply any other rule to its decision than that which was laid down in Foster v. Pearson. Bnt I was satisfied, upon the evidence before us, that the banks concerned had such notice and knowledge of the limited title of their pledgor as made it inconsistent with fair mercantile dealing that they should retain Lord Sheffield's securities for any sum beyond the extent of the pledgor's interest.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The litigation in this case has arisen out of the frauds of Mr. Delmar, a partner in the firm of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., stockbrokers. The case of the plaintiff, the respondent in this appeal, is that Delmar, having in his possession, for safe custody merely, certain securities of the plaintiff, known as "Cedulas," fraudulently deposited them with the defendants by way of pledge for an advance, and that the defendants are consequently not entitled to detain them. The defendants deny that the securities pledged with them were the property of the plaintiff, and insist that, even assuming this to have been the case, they have acquired a good title as against him.

The facts may be shortly stated. In the month of October, 1887, Herapath, Delmar, & Co. had in their possession the bonds of 15,000 dols. Cedulas belonging to the plaintiff. On the 12th of October Delmar, on behalf of his firm, entered into a contract with Messrs. Prior & Williams, jobbers on the Stock Exchange, to sell them 15,000 dols. of Cedulas for the settling day of the 14th of October. He at the same time contracted with Messrs. Prior & Williams to purchase of them like bonds of the same amount for the account of the 28th of October, the price of these latter bonds being the same for which the former were sold, with interest at the rate of six per cent. for fourteen days added. On the 14th of October, in pursuance of the contract of sale, Delmar's firm delivered to Prior & Williams, or their nominees, the bonds of the plaintiff. On the 28th of October, in pursuance of the simultaneous contract of purchase, Herapath, Delmar, & Co. received from Greenwell & Co., a firm of brokers whose name appeared on the clearing ticket given by Prior & Williams, Cedula bonds of the same description and to the same amount as those which had belonged to the plaintiff.

The defendants, the appellant banking company, had for many years been in the habit of making advances to the firm of Herapath, Delmar, & Co. and their predecessors in business, receiving as security for such advances stocks, shares, and bonds. The securities deposited were frequently changed, such changes generally taking place at or about the time of the fortnightly settlements on the London Stock Exchange. On the 20th of October, 1887, the said firm obtained from the bank a temporary advance of £6,500, in addition to the then current loan, and in addition to the securities which the bank then held for the moneys already advanced, and which by the terms of their security they were entitled to hold for any additional advances, Herapath, Delmar, & Co. deposited with the bank the Cedula bonds which they had obtained from Greenwell & Co. on that day. The bonds were obtained from Greenwell & Co. in exchange for a cheque on the appellants, and without the advance of the £6,500 the firm would not have had at the appellants' bank sufficient funds to meet the cheque in favour of Greenwell & Co. and the other cheques drawn by the firm on that day.

I do not propose to enter upon the inquiry whether the plaintiff can establish a title to the bonds deposited with the bank, for in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to do so. I shall assume, for the purposes of my opinion, that these bonds were the property of the plaintiff.

The first question which arises—and, to my mind, a cardinal one—is, Are these bonds negotiable instruments?

The general rule of the law is that where a person has obtained the property of another from one who is dealing with it without the authority of the true owner, no title is acquired as against that owner, even though full value be given, and the property be taken in the belief that an unquestionable title thereto is being obtained, unless the person taking it can show that the true owner has so acted as to mislead him into the belief that the person dealing with the property had authority to do so. If this can be shown a good title is acquired by personal estoppel against the true owner. There is an exception to the general rule, however, in the case of negotiable instruments. Any person in possession of these may convey a good title to them, even when he is acting in fraud of the true owner, and although such owner has done nothing tending to mislead the person taking them. I shall advert hereafter to the conditions which are requisite in order to render the title of one who takes a negotiable instrument valid as against the true owner; but I dwell, for the moment, on the distinction to which I have called attention, because it is obvious that the facts to be proved by anyone seeking to retain property he has obtained as against the person in fraud of whom it has been delivered to him will differ essentially according as that property is or is not a negotiable instrument.

At the trial of the action evidence was given on behalf of the bank that Cedula bonds are commonly dealt with on the Stock Exchange. On the question being put, "Are they dealt with as negotiable securities?" the learned judge interfered with the observation, "There is no dispute about that"; on which the learned counsel for the plaintiff said, "I do not want to make that admission." The question was then put and answered in the affirmative. There was no cross-examination by the plaintiff's counsel directed to this point, nor was any testimony adduced to the contrary. Having regard to the evidence thus given to the nature of the bonds, and to the decision of this House in the case of Goodwin v. Robarts, I can entertain no doubt that these Cedula bonds are negotiable instruments within the purview of that decision.

The question, then, which presents itself is, Whether the appellants, who are in possession of negotiable instruments which were delivered to them, I will assume, in fraud of the plaintiff, the true owner, can make good their title to them? That they became owners for value is not disputed. Nor is it disputed that they took with full honesty of purpose. The allegation in the statement of claim is as follows:—"The bank knew and had notice not only from the general course of business hereinbefore referred to, but from the particular transactions between them and the plaintiff's brokers that the securities deposited with them by the plaintiff's brokers were the securities of the customers of such brokers, and in the belief that the brokers who brought them made sufficient advances on them to justify them in obtaining the amounts which they from time to time obtained from the bank, and relying on the integrity of the brokers, the defendant bank from time to time made and continued advances to the brokers on such securities as the brokers from time to time deposited with them." Applying this allegation to the transaction under consideration it would be impossible to conceive a more unequivocal admission that the appellants acted in complete good faith in taking the bonds in question. But the statement of claim goes on to allege that the bank "made no specific inquiries as to the ownership of the said securities, or the authority (if any) which the brokers had to deposit the same, or the interest (if any) which the brokers had therein by reason of advances on such securities, or otherwise." It is upon this allegation that the bank had notice that Delmar held these bonds in the capacity of an agent that the respondent relies. I defer entering upon the inquiry whether it has been proved that the bank had either notice or knowledge that Delmar's title to the bonds was that of an agent only. Assuming for the moment that this was proved, what is its effect? It is contended on behalf of the respondent, as I understand, that it put the bank upon inquiry as to the title of the person with whom they dealt, and as to the authority which he possessed, and that, having made no such inquiry, they obtained as against his principal no better title than he had. It was admitted that any one buying from Delmar would have obtained an unimpeachable title, notwithstanding his knowledge that Delmar was a broker, and that the bonds were the property of his principal. What ground is there for the position that in regard to a pledge the case is different, that one may safely take a negotiable instrument by way of sale from an agent without inquiry, but cannot so take it by way of pledge? It is surely of the very essence of a negotiable instrument that you may treat the person in possession of it as having authority to deal with it, be he agent or otherwise, unless you know to the contrary and are not compelled, in order to secure a good title to yourself, to inquire into the nature of his title or the extent of his authority. The Factors' Act, 6 Geo. 4, c. 94, which gives validity to sales and pledges by persons intrusted with the documents of title to goods, contained a proviso "that the purchaser or pledgor had not notice by the documents, or otherwise, that the seller or pledgor was not 'the actual and bonâ fide' owner of the goods sold or pledged; a proviso which, especially after the decision in Fletcher v. Heath, 7 B. & C. 517, rendered it unsafe to make advances on goods or documents to persons known to have possession thereof as agents only" (per Blackburn, J., in Cole v. The North-Western Bank, L. R. 10 C. P. 354, 23 W. R. Dig. 186). Accordingly the Legislature intervened and altered the law by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. The recital is noteworthy, that "advances on the security of goods and merchandise have become an usual and ordinary course of business, and it is expedient and necessary that reasonable and safe facilities should be afforded thereto." Under this Act a document of title to goods may safely be taken by way of pledge from one known to be an agent without any inquiry as to his authority. It would be strange, indeed, if a negotiable instrument might not as safely be taken. Advances on the security of negotiable instruments are as usual and ordinary a course of business as advances on the security of goods and merchandise, and it is surely just as "expedient and necessary that reasonable and safe facilities should be afforded thereto." It was truly said that it was due to the act of the Legislature that documents of title to goods may safely be taken by way of pledge from an agent, and that there had been no such legislation in relation to negotiable instruments. But why not? The answer to my mind is plain, because it never was supposed to be necessary in order to give validity to such a transaction in the case of negotiable instruments. It is admitted that in the case of a sale legislation was not requisite, that the fact that the instruments were negotiable sufficed; why not, then, in the case of a pledge? If the contention of the respondent is to prevail, a negotiable instrument will be less negotiable than a bill of lading, or a dock warrant; a strange conclusion surely. The truth is, in my opinion, that what the Factors Acts have done is to attach some of the elements of negotiability to documents of title to goods, to render the mere possession of them evidence of authority to deal with them in the ordinary course of business, and to preclude the necessity of any further inquiry.

I proceed now to consider what the authorities show to be the conditions necessary to give a good title to a person taking a negotiable instrument from one who had, as against the true owners, no authority to transfer it. In Foster v. Pearson Parke, B., said, "The rule of law was long considered as being firmly established that the holder of bills of exchange indorsed in blank or other negotiable securities transferable by delivery could give a title which he himself did not possess to a bonâ fide holder for value; and it may well be questioned whether it has been wisely departed from in the case to which reference has been made, and other subsequent cases in which care and caution, in the taker of the securities, has been treated as essential to the validity of his title, besides and independently of honesty of purpose." Now it will be observed that the learned judge considered two conditions only to be well established as essential to confer a good title upon the holder of a negotiable instrument, viz., that he should have taken it bonâ fide and for value. The other condition which he mentions, that due care and caution should have been exercised by the taker of the securities, he refers to as a departure from "a rule of law long considered as being firmly established," and he deprecates its introduction. The law has now for some time been settled on this point in accordance with the view indicated by Parke, B., in the Bank of Bengal v. Fagan, 7 Moo. P. C. 72, Lord Brougham said: "It may be taken as established that whatever may have been the law laid down in Gill v. Cubitt, 3 B. & C. 466, and Down v. Halling, 4 B. & C. 330, and one or two other cases, and not abandoned, at least as far as language went, which the court used in subsequent cases, is now law no longer, and that the negligence of a party taking a negotiable instrument does not fix him with the defective title of the party passing it to him." This passage was quoted by Willes, J., in delivering his judgment in Raphael v. The Bank of England, where it was treated as undoubted law that negligence did not invalidate the title of a person taking a negotiable instrument in good faith and for value. I think, therefore, that the rule of law enunciated by Parke, B., as firmly established, is the existing law. No authority to the contrary was cited at the bar, unless it be the recent case in this House of Sheffield v. The London Joint-Stock Bank. Now it is certain that none of the noble and learned lords who took part in that judgment criticized or questioned, much less purported to overrule, any prior authority. I will state what I understand to be the grounds of the judgment. The person from whom the bank took the securities in that case was himself a pledgee of them: as such he had an undoubted right to repledge them. He, in fact, repledged them as security for a sum exceeding that for which he held them in pledge. They were, with a number of other instruments, some negotiable and others not negotiable, made security for his entire indebtedness to the bank. The question which arose was whether the bank could insist on retaining them for the larger sum, or whether the owner could redeem them on paying to the bank the amount for which they were originally pledged. The noble and learned lords came to the conclusion, as I understand, that the bank knew that Mozley held the securities in question as pledgee only in respect of an advance made upon them, or that if they did not actually know this, what they knew of the nature of his business as a money-lender, and the information which they derived from their transactions with him, made it almost certain that this was the case. That knowing, or having every reason to believe, that his title was only that of pledgee for a limited advance, they knew, or had reason to believe, that in pledging them to the bank for his entire indebtedness he was exceeding any authority he had to deal with them. That under these circumstances it was incumbent upon them to make some further investigation if they wished to insist upon their security to the full extent. That these circumstances, as it was said, put them upon inquiry, I gather that their lordships must further have been of opinion that if the bank had made reasonable inquiries they would have ascertained the facts, and have thus had distinct knowledge of circumstances which would have made it appear that they could not hold the securities for anything beyond the advance in respect of which Mozley held them, and that in offering them as a security for a greater sum Mozley was exceeding any authority he had to deal with them. My reason for inferring that their lordships entertained this opinion is that I apprehend that when it is said that a person is put on inquiry the result in point of law is that he is deemed to know the facts which he would have ascertained if he had made inquiry. He cannot better his position by abstaining from so doing. On the other hand, his position cannot be worse than it would have been had he made inquiry and been in possession of the result of it. Supposing Mozley had been questioned as to his right to deal with the securities, and had given a satisfactory assurance, and there had been no reason to doubt his honesty, I cannot but think that the decision of this House would have been different. There was in the case then before the House, however, no ground for supposing that if Mozley had been asked the question the facts would not have been elicited. When once the conclusion was reached that the bank must be taken to have known that Mozley was exceeding any rights which he possessed in relation to the securities in purporting to pledge them for the sum he did, it followed that it would be contrary to good faith for the bank to retain them for anything beyond the sum for which he could legitimately pledge them; that, as regards the excess, the bank, though holders for value, were not holders of the securities in good faith. It will thus be seen that the judgment, which certainly did not purport to be a new departure or to lay down any principle of law differing from that already established, turned entirely upon the view taken of the facts. It would be unbecoming, as it is unnecessary, for me to express any opinion whether the findings were warranted by the facts proved. It is enough for me to say that the judgment leaves untouched what I believe to have been, down to that time, the established rule of law, that a person taking a negotiable instrument in good faith and for value obtains a title valid against all the world. Sheffield v. The London Joint-Stock Bank may perhaps be a binding authority as to the conclusion of the fact arrived at, where the facts are identical, but not otherwise. In any other case the tribunal must investigate the facts for itself, and determine whether those who claim to hold a negotiable instrument have made out that they took it in good faith and for value. One word I would say upon the question of notice and being put upon inquiry. I should be very sorry to see the doctrine of constructive notice introduced into the law of negotiable instruments. But regard to the facts of which the taker of such instruments had notice is most material in considering whether he took in good faith. If there be anything which excites the suspicion that there is something wrong in the transaction, the taker of the instrument is not acting in good faith if he shuts his eyes to the facts presented to him and puts the suspicions aside without further inquiry.

Applying myself now to the facts of the present case I cannot find any warrant for such conclusions of fact as those which, as I think, led to the recent judgment of your lordships' house on which so much reliance has been placed. The bank did not know, and had no reason to know, in what capacity Delmar became possessed of the bonds. They might be his own; he might be purchasing them for himself or a principal, and be seeking for an advance from the bank to obtain the means of paying the price; or they might be bonds on which he had himself made an advance. I cannot see that there was anything to suggest to the bank that he was committing a wrong, or to make it reasonable and right that they should make further inquiry before entering upon the transaction. It was suggested, and this view seems to have found some favour with the court below, that though the bank might have been justified in thinking that Delmar had the power to pledge the bonds for an advance to their full market value, they were not justified in supposing that he could be entitled to pledge them en bloc with other securities for a lump sum. If the course of dealing between the bank and Delmar was, as alleged, such that he was entitled at any time to obtain back any of the securities deposited on delivering others of an equal value, the distinction does not strike me as very important. But even if it could be material were the plaintiff seeking to redeem his bonds, and the question were for what sum the bank could claim to retain them, it does not seem to me to be material in the present case, where the plaintiff is not seeking to redeem the bonds, but insists that the bank have no title to them at all.

Further assuming, for the moment, that the bank were put on inquiry and ought to have asked Delmar whether the bonds were his, and, if not, by what title he claimed to deal with them in the manner proposed, can it be doubted what would have been the result of such an inquiry? Why your lordships have listened to an elaborate argument, for which there was ample scope, designed to establish that the bonds were in fact Delmar's, and that if he had answered, as I think he undoubtedly would, that the bonds were his own, his answer would have been accurate. How can it possibly be contended that if the bank had made further inquiry they would have ascertained that Delmar was not entitled to make the pledge on which the bank take their stand?

I have made these observations for the purpose of showing the marked distinction which there is between the facts of the present case and those which had to be considered in Sheffield's case. But I desire to rest my judgment upon the broad and simple ground that I find, as a matter of fact, that the bank took the bonds in good faith and for value. It is easy enough to make an elaborate presentation after the event of the speculations with which the bank managers might have occupied themselves in reference to the capacity in which the broker who offered the bonds as security for an advance held them. I think, however, they were not bound to occupy their minds with any such speculations. I apprehend that when a person whose honesty there is no reason to doubt, offers negotiable securities to a banker or any other person, the only consideration likely to engage his attention is whether the security is sufficient to justify the advance required. And I do not think the law lays upon him the obligation of making any inquiry into the title of the person whom he finds in possession of them; of course, if there is anything to arouse suspicion, to lead to a doubt whether the person purporting to transfer them is justified in entering into the contemplated transaction, the case would be different, the existence of such suspicion or doubt would be inconsistent with good faith. And if no inquiry were made, or if on inquiry the doubt were not removed, and the suspicion dissipated, I should have no hesitation in holding that good faith was wanting in a person thus acting.

For the reasons I have given I think the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—There are only three possible questions in this case: (1) Did the "Cedulas" which were deposited with the London Joint-Stock Bank on the 28th of October, 1887, belong to the respondent at the time when they left the office of Herapath, Delmar, & Co.? (2) Were those "Cedulas" negotiable instruments? (3) Did the bank take them in good faith? That the bank gave value for them was never disputed.

In the view which your lordships take of the last two questions the answer to the first, whatever it may be, cannot affect the result of the case. But as both courts have considered the question and answered it on consideration in the affirmative, I am unwilling to pass it by in silence lest I should seem to intimate a doubt for which, in my opinion, there is no room.

The firm of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., consisting of a Mr. Herapath (who was admittedly innocent of any fraud), and a Mr. Delmar, who was undoubtedly a fraudulent person, held 15,000 dols. "Cedulas Series J." on account of the respondent. They were held by the firm for safe custody only. On the 12th of October, 1887, Delmar, without the knowledge of his partner, and in fraud of his customer, sold them. On the same day, Delmar, on account of his firm, contracted to buy "Cedulas" of the same amount and of the same denomination to be delivered on the 28th inst. In due course "Cedulas" to answer this contract were delivered and paid for. To whom did these "Cedulas" belong when they came into the office of Herapath, Delmar, & Co.? The object of the purchase of course was to repair and cancel the wrong which had been committed. Both the clerks concerned in the transaction, who had no reason to suspect anything improper, say they knew at the time whose they were, and that they were the respondent's. Neither of them was asked any question as to how he got this knowledge, nor is it material. There is no reason to distrust their recollection. And the only conclusion is that in some way or other, by word of mouth, or by writing, or by conduct, Delmar, who had dominion over these "Cedulas," must have declared that they belonged to the respondent. Thus, even without the aid of the entry in the number book, the value of which depends on a disputed fact, the date when the original entry was corrected or altered, there was as it seems to me a sufficient appropriation of the "Cedulas" in question to show that they were the property of the respondent, subject to his right to repudiate the transaction when he came to know the true facts.

Then were these "Cedulas" negotiable instruments? The "Cedulas" in question are foreign bonds with coupons attached, payable to bearer. Admittedly they pass from hand to hand on the Stock Exchange, and according to the evidence of the bank manager, who was not cross-examined on the point, they are dealt with as negotiable instruments. I do not see on what ground they are to be denied the quality of complete negotiability. In a matter of this sort it is not, I think, desirable to set up refined distinctions which are not understood, or are uniformly and persistently ignored in the daily practice of the Stock Exchange.

Lastly, did the bank take the "Cedulas" in good faith? They took them with other securities from a firm of stockbrokers, who were at the time of unblemished reputation. They took them in the ordinary way of business to cover their current advances. In regard to this question the difficulty is to see what there was in the transaction to suggest a shadow of suspicion that there was anything wrong with the deposit. The only objection alleged is that securities of different customers of the stockbrokers were pledged for one entire advance, and it is said that the bank ought to have known it. But even so, if the bank had no reason to suppose that the stockbrokers were not at liberty to pledge each and all of the securities for their full value, I cannot see in what the supposed want of good faith consists. As was pointed out in Foster v. Pearson, such a practice—and the practice prevails in the case of stockbrokers as much as in the case of billbrokers—has advantages for the customers as a body, though it may occasionally operate hardly on an individual.

If it had not been for a mistaken interpretation of your lordships' judgment in Lord Sheffield's case, I doubt whether the present case would ever have been brought into court. Lord Sheffield's case depended on its own peculiar circumstances. The settled law relating to negotiable securities was not in question. No one impugned it. No one, as I understood the argument, thought of reviving qualifications long since exploded. But then it was held that the bank knew, or ought to have known, that the securities which the money-lender, Mozley, was depositing with them had been pledged to him by his several customers, and therefore that they were not his own, and that he could not pledge them for their full value. There was no want of good faith on the part of the bank in taking them in security to the extent of Mozley's pledgable interest. But there was, as it seems to me, a want of good faith in claiming to retain them for more than that limited interest, whatever it might turn out to be.

In commenting on Lord Sheffield's case, Sir Horace Davey, referring to some remarks of mine in which the expression "representations" occurred, observed that the words used went too far.

Of course there were no representations on the part of Mozley but what were contained in the memorandum of charge. And certainly I did not mean to convey that if the bank had received from Mozley explanations which a reasonable man could possibly accept, the bank might not have held the securities for their whole value. But I think the criticism of the learned counsel was perfectly well founded, and I should have better expressed myself if I had said that, whereas it had been supposed that the memorandum of charge neutralized the knowledge otherwise properly attributable to the bank, it seemed to me that that knowledge must prevail over the inference to be derived from the memorandum.

I agree that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord FIELD.—I also am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed.

First, I am satisfied that the "Cedulas" in question are instruments in which property and possession are inseparable, and that delivery and possession, if taken in good faith, confer a valid title. They impliedly contain a promise to pay the bearer; they are issued and circulated in a foreign State; and although the evidence as to the extent of their negotiability in this country was not (probably owing to a misapprehension) so full as it might have been, enough, I think, appears to bring the case within the authorities of Gorgier v. Mieville and Goodwin v. Robarts.

Secondly, it is not disputed that the bank are holders for value. It is not suggested that they were themselves guilty of any dishonesty or bad faith; on the contrary, Bowen, L.J., expressly finds that they were "honestly of opinion that Delmar could honestly make the pledge in question." Their title, therefore, as holders in good faith cannot be defeated if it is shown that they also held without notice—i.e., not necessarily actual notice or knowledge of any infirmity, but without the knowledge of circumstances calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of the bank manager, who, with the means of further knowledge at hand, wilfully abstained from availing himself of those means and making inquiry, from a suspicion that the result would be to inform him of some vice or infirmity of title by which the pledge the bank were about to take might be rendered insecure.

It was at one time, no doubt, thought that the title of a holder for value of a negotiable instrument would be destroyed if the omission to inquire arose, not from any suspicion of a defect, but merely from a want of due care and caution on his part, but the authorities cited by Lord Herschell have conclusively established that such is not the law.

In one of those cases, Raphael v. The Bank of England, the plaintiff had at some earlier period received actual notice that the bank note in question had been stolen, but it was established to the satisfaction of the jury that the notice had been forgotten and was not present to his mind at the time of taking, and he was held entitled to recover.

In another case, Foster v. Pearson, cited by my noble friend, some of the objections to the plaintiff's title were somewhat analogous to those in the present case. One of them was that the bills then in question were pledged to the plaintiff by the billbroker for an antecedent debt of his own, but Parke, B., after stating that the rule that the holder of negotiable securities transferable by delivery can give a title, which he himself does not possess, to a bonâ fide holder for value, had been long considered firmly established, added that it was unnecessary to decide the validity of a usage for a billbroker to pledge for his own antecedent debt (which had been set up, but failed in proof), because, assuming the broker to have no such power as between him and his employer, or as to third persons who receive the bills with knowledge of all the facts, it by no means followed that Messrs. Fosters would not have a right to hold the bill. They might have supposed that the brokers were acting rightly in pledging their customers' bills, even if they knew them to be such, for their prior advance, because they might have given to those very customers a part of the £2,500 which was the amount of that prior advance.

It is, I think, worthy of observation that in the present case a portion of the £6,500, which was advanced to Delmar on the 27th of October, undoubtedly went to provide cash to meet a cheque drawn in payment for the substituted "Cedulas."

I do not suggest, of course, that the bank manager was aware of this, or that it could have formed any part of his calculations in taking the security, but it tends to show, as regards any inquiry of Delmar, if the defect in the appellants' title rests upon the absence of inquiry of Delmar, which was the only means of further knowledge that presented itself to the manager, how little probability there is that the answer would have disclosed the absence of authority on his part to make the pledge.

Another objection taken to the appellants' title in this case, as putting the manager upon inquiry, also existed in the case of Foster v. Pearson. But it was overruled, for it was said that, although a billbroker must ordinarily be taken to be an agent to procure the loan of money on each customer's bill separately, without any right to mix bills together, and pledge the mass for one entire sum advanced to him personally, yet his employment is one which depends entirely upon the course of dealing, and there would be nothing unusual or unreasonable in such a course of dealing in the City of London for billbrokers to raise money for their employers by pledging the bills of different proprietors for one advance.

In answer to the objection Parke, B., said that although, on the one hand, one proprietor may have to answer for the non-payment of another's bill, on the other hand, it may give facilities to the raising of money on negotiable paper, for it may well happen that a capitalist would advance money in this way who would not discount each particular bill. Indeed, in the case now before your lordships, it was suggested, and may well be the case, that by that means the broker's customer obtains a loan on more favourable terms than if your broker could only pledge for each customer's individual debt.

Looking to the various exigencies of a stockbroker's legitimate business, as now carried on in the City of London, I fail to see any circumstances which ought in the present case to have caused the bank manager to suspect that Delmar was pledging securities which had been intrusted to him for safe keeping. The previous long connection with and high character of the firm of which he was a member, their extensive previous dealings, in which no irregularity is suggested as having taken place, tended to obviate the necessity for any inquiry, and I do not see any satisfactory ground for coming to the conclusion that the manager wilfully abstained from making it.

Indeed, the grounds upon which, as I understand, the judgments of the courts below rest their decision, exclude any such wilful closing of the eyes of the manager. What I understand is said against him is that, as he took the "Cedulas" with knowledge that they might not belong in full dominion to the brokers, the manager wilfully abstained from inquiry into his title from a misconception of law in thinking that he had authority in law so to do without express authority given by the customer.

The learned judges below did not in any way question the principles upon which the authorities I have referred to rest, but they appear to have thought that the present case was covered by the recent decision of this House in Lord Sheffield's case.

That case has undergone a very searching examination at your lordships' bar, and I have had the advantage of hearing the true view of it, as intended and understood by the Lord Chancellor, and those of my noble and learned friends who advised your lordships on that occasion, and I am quite satisfied, not only that no intention existed of questioning those principles, but that no such qualification is anywhere indicated. The decision seems to me to have proceeded rather upon the lines of Cooke v. Eshelby, and cases of that class, in which actual knowledge of the existence of an agency of a limited character only is held to put the person dealing with the agent upon inquiry as to the extent of it.

It was, indeed, contended at your lordships' bar that mere knowledge that a proposed transferor might be dealing with a security as an agent was sufficient to put the transferee of a negotiable security upon inquiry, the mere absence of which, if a defect was, in fact, found to exist, would be fatal to his title.

But I cannot accede to this contention. It is contrary to the authorities I have referred to, and it runs counter to the policy of the Legislature, which seems to me to be to protect rather than endanger the rights of persons taking securities of a negotiable character honestly and in good faith.

It is for these reasons that I think that the appeal must be allowed.

Thirdly, there was an objection taken to the plaintiff's title, that he had not gained sufficient property in the substituted "Cedulas" to entitle him to maintain the action. Upon that point it is unnecessary for to express any opinion.

Order appealed from reversed, with costs here and below. Cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Mistake—No debt—Application to withdraw proof.

Decision of Vaughan Williams, J. (40 W. R. 608), affirmed, on the ground that the debt, in respect of which the proof in the bankruptcy was tendered, did not exist, and that, therefore, the proof might be withdrawn.

Appeal by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Burr against an order of Vaughan Williams, J. (40 W. R. 608), giving leave to Norton to withdraw a proof which he had made in the bankruptcy.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.

Levett, Q.C., and Carrington, for Norton, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion, the decision of Vaughan Williams, J., allowing the withdrawal of Norton's proof, must be affirmed, on the ground that there was no debt due from the bankrupt to Norton. The contract for the sale of the policy did not of itself pass the property in the policy and create a debt, nor did the judgment of Romer, J., for the specific performance of that contract. The judgment only established a binding contract, and ordered it to be performed. Norton made a mistake, and ought to be allowed to withdraw his proof.

BOWEN and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

SCOTT v. BROWN, DOERING, M'NAB, & CO.
SLAUGHTER v. THE SAME. (b.)

Contract—Illegality—Agreement to make a market for shares—Illegality not pleaded—Criminal conspiracy—In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis—Judicial notice.

In these consolidated actions the plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendants, who were stockbrokers, the price paid by the plaintiffs for shares in a new company, upon the ground (amongst others) that the defendants had transferred to the plaintiffs the defendants' own shares, instead of purchasing them in the market in the usual way. Wright, J., before whom both actions were tried, nonsuited the plaintiffs in both actions, upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The plaintiffs applied for a new trial, and in the course of the hearing the Court of Appeal took judicial notice of the fact that the correspondence and telegrams between the parties disclosed the nature of the transaction, which was an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants to induce would-be buyers of shares in the company, contrary to the fact, to believe that there was a market for the shares, and that the shares were of greater value than they really were.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the transaction was illegal, and might be made the subject of an indictment for conspiracy, and that, although the illegality of the contract was not pleaded, the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief.

This was an application by the plaintiffs in both actions (which had been consolidated by an order of the Court of Appeal) for a new trial upon an appeal from the decision of Wright, J., who, at the trial on the 7th of May last at Guildhall before a special jury, had nonsuited the plaintiffs in both actions, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The facts, as stated by Lopes, L.J., in his judgment, are as follows:—The defendants in both these actions are members of the London Stock Exchange, and in December, 1890, they were brokers to a company called the Steam Loop Co. (Limited). The said company had issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for its share capital, and the defendants had previously to such issue underwritten a part of the share capital of the company and were holders of a considerable number of shares of the company. The plaintiffs in the second action were the solicitors to the company. The plaintiffs in both actions had instructed the defendants to purchase shares for them respectively, in the company, and had duly paid for such shares. The plaintiffs in both actions sought to recover the price paid for such shares from the defendants, on the ground, among others, that, instead of purchasing shares for them in the ordinary way, the defendants had transferred to the plaintiffs the defendants' own shares.

The plaintiffs in both actions relied upon a contract contained in certain letters and telegrams passing between the plaintiffs and the defendants between the 6th and 9th of December, 1890. On the 6th of December, 1890, the following telegrams passed:—M'Nab to Scott.—"Should advise you to get 5,000 done by Trust Company Steam Loop." M'Nab to Scott.—"Must have positive order from you to buy at least 500 Loop shares in market on Monday, to start market on. Gillespie and Jack doing this on understanding that you do so. This necessary to insure public application and to start market. Reply." M'Nab to Scott.—"Unless have telegram agreeing to my former wire as to market in shares, I must withdraw from this business." M'Nab to Scott.—"You must agree, otherwise I drop the whole thing, as without it advertisements wasted and no public application; also no market in shares. Waiting reply." Scott to Slaughter.—"M'Nab wires me I must give him positive order buy 500 Loop shares in market on Monday start market. Gillespie and Jack doing same condition I do. Wired no. M'Nab replies must, otherwise he will drop whole business. I reply by writing him to-night. Wire what you advise." Slaughter to Scott:—"Have agreed with M'Nab that the 500 Gillespie owed us may be applied market purposes. Think additional support needed. Written you fully to-night." Scott to Slaughter:—"Am quite agreeable to what you have arranged with M'Nab." On the same day M'Nab wrote to Scott (inter alia) as follows:—"As I wired you to-day, it is an absolute necessity that somebody sends orders to buy Steam Loop in the market, otherwise who is going to start the market? Slaughter and myself are going 500 shares, Gillespie 500, Burnham 100, Jack 200, and honestly you ought to go at least 500. There is no risk in the matter. We have absolutely £47,000 underwritten, and whatever the public come in for will help the market. Then, again, unless we can get a quotation into the papers, saying the shares at a premium, on Monday, we will never get the public on. This we can manage with practically no risk to ourselves if we combine and absolutely buy the shares. If we do not do it, the money spent on advertisements is simply thrown away. . . . If I am to go on at all I must know that some one is going to back me up in at least starting the market in the shares. If it is not done I must give up the whole business, as otherwise I will be nothing more than a fool in this business. It is a vital point, and, whatever you write me to-night, please understand that it has to be done, and I must have orders on Monday from someone in Manchester to start the market on. . . . Do give this matter your assent, and wire me early on Monday that you are good for a purchase of at least 500 shares in the market. You must excuse my having written and wired so strongly about this, but it is an absolute necessity that it has to be done. You have only to ask anyone about new companies if it is not a necessity. Awaiting your reply on Monday morning."

On the 7th of December, 1890, Scott wrote in reply to Slaughter:—"As I wired you last night, I am quite agreeable that the £500 you, M'Nab, and I lent Gillespie shall be used to make a market, on condition that Gillespie gives you a written promise to pay the £500 in cash as soon as he has received his cash from the company. I am agreeable to this £500 also being spent in making a market, if you are."

On the 8th of December, 1890, Slaughter wrote to M'Nab:—"Steam Loop,—On behalf of Mr. D. Scott, I hereby authorize you to buy at a premium ordinary shares up to £500." On the same day Gillespie wrote to Slaughter:—"You having authorized Mr. M'Nab on Mr. Scott's behalf to buy at a premium ordinary shares up to £500, I write this line to confirm to you that it has been agreed between us that the £500 in cash or the £600 in shares which I have promised to Mr. Scott shall be £500 in cash, and shall be paid out of the second instalment I receive."

On the 9th of December, 1890, Brown, Doering, & Co. wrote to Slaughter as follows:—"We beg to enclose contract for purchase of 429 Steam Loop shares at 6s. 7d. premium. This is your proportion of the shares bought up to-night, taking an average of the orders from D. Scott, Gillespie, Burnham, and Jack. We have also averaged the price of the shares. We have forwarded to the Financial News the contract note for shares bought to-day on your behalf—150 shares, at 8s. 4½d. premium—to get the quotation."

Reid, Q.C., and Boydell Houghton, for the appellants.

Murphy, Q.C., W. Willis, Q.C., Rose Innes, and C. Rose Innes, for the respondents.

At the close of the arguments for the respondents the COURT took the objection that the evidence disclosed an illegal conspiracy to which the plaintiffs were parties, and consequently that they were not entitled to relief.

Reid, Q.C., on the point whether or not the contract was an illegal one.—The parties did doubtless combine, but the object of the combination was not unlawful. The nature of the contract was to buy shares (1) to enrich the company and (2) to make a market; or, in other words, by example, and by publication of that example, to induce the public to buy. The object was to buy at a certain price, and the shares were actually bought and sold at that price. It is not illegal to pay a premium in order to raise prices or to flood the market for the purpose of reducing prices. The transaction was bonâ fide and there were no concealments. There is no evidence that the shares were not worth the price given for them, which was fixed by the jobber. The point ought to have been left to the jury.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1.—LINDLEY, L.J.—My brother Smith has written a judgment in this case which I have read, and in which I concur. As, however, the case is one of great importance, I will add a few observations on it myself. Ex turpi causâ non oritur actio. This old and well-known legal maxim is founded in good sense and expresses a clear and well-recognized legal principle, which is not confined to indictable offences. No court ought to enforce an illegal contract or allow itself to be made the instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal, if the illegality is duly brought to the notice of the court, and if the person invokiug the aid of the court is himself implicated in the illegality. It matters not whether the defendant has pleaded the illegality or whether he has not. If the evidence adduced by the plaintiff proves the illegality the court ought not to assist him. If authority is wanted for this proposition it will be found in the well-known judgment of Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 343. In this case the correspondence put in evidence by the plaintiff Scott, in support of the claim he made at the trial shows conclusively that the sole object of the plaintiff in ordering shares to be bought for him at a premium was to impose upon and to deceive the public by leading the public to suppose that there were buyers of such shares at a premium on the Stock Exchange, when in fact there were none but himself. The plaintiff's purchase was an actual purchase, not a sham purchase; that is true, but it is also true that the sole object of the purchase was to cheat and mislead the public. Under these circumstances the plaintiff must look elsewhere than to a court of justice for such assistance as he may require against the persons he employed to assist him in his fraud, if the claim to such assistance is based on his illegal contract. Any rights which he may have irrespective of his illegal contract will, of course, be recognized and enforced, but his illegal contract confers no rights on him: see Pearce v. Brooks, 14 W. R. 614, L. R. 1, Ex. 213. The illegal purpose of the plaintiff distinguishes this case from Wetherell v. Jones, 3 B. & Ad. 221, and others of a similar kind. I am quite aware that what the plaintiff has done is very commonly done; it is done every day. But this is immaterial. Picking pockets and various forms of cheating are common enough, and are nevertheless illegal. The plaintiff was not entitled to judgment in the court below, and he has no right to a new trial.

LOPES, L.J., after stating the facts, said: The learned judge held that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiffs' case, and nonsuited them. In my judgment it is unnecessary to determine whether the holding of the learned judge is right in this respect. There is a preliminary matter to be considered of which the learned judge might have taken, and this court can and ought to take, judicial notice. [His lordship then read the letters and telegrams as stated above, and continued:—] I have read these letters and telegrams to show what the nature of the transaction was. In my judgment it was an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants to induce would-be buyers of shares in this company, contrary to the fact, to believe there was a market for its shares, and that the shares were of greater value than they really were. Putting it shortly—an agreement to cheat the public by leading them to believe the shares had a value, which the plaintiffs and defendants knew they had not, and thus inducing them to become purchasers. Is such a transaction illegal? I am of opinion that it is, and might be made the subject of an indictment for conspiracy. The King v. Berenger, 3 M. & S. 67, is an authority on this subject. It was an indictment for conspiracy by false rumours to raise the price of the public Government funds with intent to injure those who should purchase, and Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said:—"A public mischief is stated as the object of this conspiracy; the conspiracy is by false rumours to raise the price of the public funds and securities, and the crime lies in the act of conspiracy and combination to effect that purpose, and would have been complete, although it had not been pursued to its consequences, or the parties had not been able to carry it into effect. The purpose itself is mischievous; it strikes at the price of a vendible commodity in the market, and if it gives it a fictitious price, by means of false rumours, it is a fraud levelled against all the public, for it is against all such as may possibly have anything to do with the funds on that particular day." I can see no substantial distinction between false rumours and false and fictitious acts; the price of the shares in this case was artificial, and the premium unreal and nominal, to the knowledge of all parties concerned, put forward to induce the public to take shares, with which otherwise they would have had nothing to do. Again, in Reg. v. Aspinall, 24 W. R. 921, 1 Q. B. D. 740, 25 W. R. 283, 2 Q. B. D. 48, it was held that an agreement to cheat and defraud by means of false pretences those who might buy shares was an indictable offence. Brett, L.J., 2 Q. B. D. 59, said:—"If the second count in this indictment contains averments sufficiently stated which are enough to show sufficiently that the defendants unlawfully—namely, with minds intending to do wrong—agreed by false pretences to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company, it sufficiently alleges a criminal conspiracy."

I entertain no doubt that the agreement on which the plaintiffs rely is an illegal agreement. If the agreement is illegal, the question arises, whether the plaintiffs are not disentitled to recover, and whether they have not forfeited the relief which a court of law in other circumstances would have afforded them. Begbie v. The Phosphate Sewage Co., 24 W. R. 115, L. R. 10 Q. B. 491, is conclusive on this point. It was an action for money had and received, plea never indebted, and it was held that the plaintiff could not recover because he was aware that no exclusive right to use the process in question could be obtained, and had entered into the contract with the defendants in contemplation of a fraud upon the shareholders of the intended company. Cockburn, L.C.J., said:—"Another ground of defence insisted on is that the money having been paid for the purpose of defrauding the intended shareholders, by holding out to them the assurance of an exclusive right to use the process in question as an inducement to contribute their money when it was known to the parties engaged in getting up the new company that no exclusive right existed, or could be obtained, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action to recover back the money on the well-established principle that money paid in furtherance of a fraud or other unlawful purpose cannot be recovered back. . . . Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the money sought to be recovered in this action having been paid in order to obtain from the defendants the agreement whereby this fraud could be carried out, the rule of law insisted on by the defendants applies, and is a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover. The case falls immediately within the principle of the decisions in Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246; Jones v. Yates, 9 B. & C. 532; and Fivaz v. Nicholls, 2 C. B. 501. The plaintiff cannot present his case to a jury without necessarily disclosing the unlawful purpose in furtherance of which this money was paid."

Every word of that judgment applies. It is to be observed that the illegality of the contract was not pleaded. The point was taken by the court and acted upon. The plaintiffs cannot, and do not in this case, more than in that, present their case to the jury without necessarily disclosing the unlawful purpose in furtherance of which the contract was entered into. The plaintiffs, therefore, in my opinion, are disentitled to relief, and on this ground the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff Scott applies to this court to set aside a nonsuit which passed against him at the Guildhall. He asserts that there was evidence to go to the jury of his cause of action, which was for the rescission of a contract to purchase shares in a company about to be brought out and to be called the Steam Loop Co., and for the return of £632 3s. 5d. paid thereunder to the defendants, upon the ground, amongst others, that the defendants, while acting as his brokers, had passed off their own shares to him instead of purchasing them upon the market. It appeared upon the plaintiff's own case that the plaintiff and the defendant M'Nab were jointly interested with others in bringing out this company and in floating its shares upon the market, and that the £632 3s. 5d. sought to be recovered in this action was paid by the plaintiff to the defendants in pursuance of an agreement come to between the plaintiff and the defendant M'Nab, that M'Nab should therewith purchase 500 shares of the projected company, when brought out, at a premium (at the time of the agreement there was neither company nor market), the sole object of such purchase being that the public might thereby be induced to believe that the shares of the company were at a real premium, whereas in truth and in fact, as the plaintiff and the defendant M'Nab well knew, they were not. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendants would raise the point of the illegality of the transaction at the trial, and my brother Wright, who tried the case, made some strong comment upon their conduct, but did nothing further in the matter.

Now, if two or more persons agree to cheat and defraud others by means of deceit and fraud, there can be no doubt that each and all are indictable for a criminal conspiracy at common law. It has been held that it is a criminal conspiracy for two or more to agree by false rumours to endeavour to raise the price of the public funds on a particular day: Rex v. De Berenger. It has also been held in Reg. v. Aspinall, that an agreement by two or more to cheat and defraud by means of false pretences those who might buy shares in a company was an indictable conspiracy. False pretences here do not mean such false pretences as would support an indictment for obtaining money or goods by false pretences: see Reg. v. Hudson, 8 W. R. 421, Bell C. C. 263. This is the law.

Lopes, L.J., has gone fully into the correspondence, but the telegram and letter of the 6th of December, 1890, from the defendant M'Nab to the plaintiff Scott, the letter of the 7th of December, 1890, from the plaintiff Scott to Slaughter, and of the 8th of December, 1890, from Slaughter to M'Nab in my judgment are sufficient. These documents contain, in my judgment, conclusive proof that the plaintiff Scott and M'Nab agreed together to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company, by leading them to believe that the shares were at a genuine premium, whereas to their knowlege they were not, the fictitious premium being sought to be brought about by means of the purchases to be made with the plaintiff's £632 3s. 5d. by M'Nab, and which were to be made for the sole purpose of creating such fictitious premium. The agreement between two or more to do an illegal act has been proved.

The next question is, Was it shown that the plaintiff Scott and M'Nab agreed to carry out this intention by illegal means—viz., by deceit and fraud? For, if so, there can be no possible doubt that an indictable conspiracy has been committed—viz., the agreement to do an illegal act by illegal means. It is not necessary in this case to discuss whether the whole of this must be proved to constitute an indictable conspiracy. It is said for the plaintiff that there was nothing deceitful or fraudulent in his paying his £632 3s. 5d. to M'Nab to purchase shares with upon the open market, and as regards the mere payment itself I agree; but the question is, Was the payment of the £632 3s. 5d. by the plaintiff to M'Nab made for the sole purpose of creating therewith a fictitious premium, in order to induce the public to purchase shares in the company, and thereby benefit the plaintiff and M'Nab—a deceitful and fraudulent means whereby to cheat and defraud those who might buy shares in the company? I am of opinion that it was. Test it in this way. Suppose a purchaser induced to purchase shares of the plaintiff or M'Nab by means of the fictitious premium created by them solely for the purpose of inducing such purchaser and others to buy, could he or not have successfully sued either or both for a false and fraudulent misrepresentation? I say that he could, and this is another way of stating the same proposition—viz., that the plaintiff and M'Nab agreed by means of deceit and fraud to cheat and defraud the would-be purchasers of shares. The agreement to do an illegal act by illegal means is proved. For the reasons above both the plaintiff and M'Nab were liable to be indicted for conspiring to cheat and defraud.

Now, how does the law stand upon the subject? If a plaintiff cannot maintain his cause of action without showing, as part of such cause of action, that he has been guilty of illegality, then the courts will not assist him in his cause of action. This was decided in Taylor v. Chester, L. R. 4 Q. B. 309, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 28, 94, where the illegality was pleaded, and also in Begbie v. Phosphate Sewage Co., where it was not pleaded, but, the fraud being apparent, the court would not interfere. When the plaintiff Scott's statement of claim is looked at it will be seen that he there states the purposes for which he handed the money to the defendants—viz., to "keep up the price of the shares," which upon the evidence was shown to be "to create a fictitious premium." In my judgment, the plaintiff Scott, when suing the defendants for breach of contract, as he does, has to prove the whole contract, and it was not competent for him to put in evidence only half of the contract, and he did not do so, for the letters above read were opened by his learned counsel as part of his case. Immediately the whole contract upon which the plaintiff sues is put in, the illegality of the conduct of the plaintiff and of M'Nab at once becomes apparent. In my opinion, the maxim "In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" applies, and this court ought not to assist the plaintiff when he seeks to recover the £632 3s. 5d. back from the defendants. Upon these grounds, and without going further into the case, this appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

In re PARKIN.
HILL v. SCHWARZ. (a.)

Power—Execution—Covenant in marriage settlement that wife's power of appointment should be exercised only in favour of trustees—General testamentary power, exercise of—Specific performance—Damages—Liability of wife's executors.

A marriage settlement executed in 1867 contained covenants by the husband and wife that all the property which the wife, or her husband in her right, should at any time during the coverture become entitled to at law or in equity should be settled, and that any power or powers of appointment over any property whatsoever of which the wife might at any time during the coverture be the donee, under any settlement, will, or other instrument whatsoever, should, if executed by her, be executed only in favour of the trustees of the settlement. During the coverture the wife became, under the will of her father, who died in 1871, donee of a general testamentary power of appointment over a sum of stock. She died in June, 1892, having by her will, dated the 29th of March, 1889, executed the power, not in favour of the trustees of the settlement, but in favour, amongst others, of her husband, whom she appointed one of her executors, and who duly proved her will.

Held, that, although the cases showed that the court had gone a long way in enforcing, by way of specific performance, contracts to leave property by will, not one of them was a case of a contract to leave by will on the part of one who was merely donee of a testamentary power of appointment, and that specific performance ought not to be decreed in such a case; but that the trustees were entitled to recover, as damages against the wife's executors to the extent of her assets, the value of the property which would have come to the hands of the trustees if the covenant had been performed; and that the appointed fund was assets for the payment of her debts.

By an indenture dated the 20th of December, 1867, being the settlement made on the marriage of the defendant Emil Tetens and Marie Creighton, widow, after a recital that by an indenture of settlement made in 1848 Mrs. Tetens then stood possessed of certain powers of appointment over divers sums of money, stocks, funds, and securities, and the annual produce thereof respectively, subject to a life interest therein of her father, Hugh Parkin, it was witnessed that Mrs. Tetens, by virtue and in execution of the power for that purpose given by the recited indenture of settlement and of all other powers and authorities enabling her in that behalf, appointed certain funds to the trustees of the settlement of 1867 upon trusts (after the intended marriage) for Mrs. Tetens during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death out of the income to pay an annuity of £100 to Jules Creighton, her son by her first marriage, and subject thereto to pay the income to Mr. Tetens during his life determinable as therein mentioned, and subject thereto upon trust for the child or children of Mrs. Tetens (including her said son by her first marriage) who should be living at the death of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Tetens, and for the issue then living of any and every of Mrs. Tetens' then declared child or children (including her said son by her first marriage) who, being males, should attain twenty-one, or, being females, should attain that age or marry, to take if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common per stirpes, and in the case of the decease of Mrs. Tetens without leaving any such child or issue who should live to attain a vested interest in the premises then upon trusts for a sister of Mrs. Tetens and her issue.

The settlement contained the following covenants, upon which the questions in this case arose:—

The said Emil Tetens and M. Creighton covenanted that all the estate, property, and effects whatsoever which the said M. Creighton, or the said E. Tetens in her right, should at any time during the coverture become possessed of or entitled to at law or in equity in any manner whatsoever should be settled; and also that any other power or powers of appointment over any estate, property, and effects whatsoever of which she might then, or at any time thereafter during such coverture, be the donee under any settlement, will, or other instrument whatsoever should, if executed by her, be executed only in favour of the trustees or trustee for the time being of the settlement in order that all such estate, property, and effects should be effectually vested in and be held by them or him upon the trusts declared by the settlement.

Hugh Parkin, the father of Mrs. Tetens, died on the 16th of March, 1871, having by his will, dated the 13th of December, 1860, bequeathed 2½ per Cent. Stock of considerable amount to trustees upon trust for Mrs. Tetens during her life without power of anticipation, and after her death, as to the sum of £5,000 part thereof, upon trust for such persons or purposes as Mrs. Tetens should by will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trusts for the benefit of the sisters of Mrs. Tetens and their issue.

Mrs. Tetens made her will dated the 29th of March, 1889, and thereby appointed her husband and Mr. Frank Milner Russell her executors, and after bequeathing £100 to Mr. Russell and reciting the power conferred on her by the will of her father of appointing by will £5,000 2½ per Cent. Stock, she directed and appointed that from and after her death the trustees of her father's will should stand possessed of the said sum of £5,000 upon the trusts following—viz., as to the clear sum of £1,000 part thereof in trust for her nephew, Hugh Campbell Rowley, to whom she bequeathed the same accordingly, free of legacy duty; and as to the residue thereof (subject to the payment thereout of her just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacy bequeathed to H. C. Rowley and the legacy duty thereon) in trust for her husband absolutely.

She made a codicil dated the 5th of December, 1889, and thereby revoked her appointment and bequest in her said will contained of the clear sum of £1,000 to H. C. Rowley free of legacy duty, and directed and appointed that from and after her death the trustees of her father's will should, out of the sum of £5,000 2½ per Cent. Stock referred to in her will, raise and pay legacies amounting to £700, and subject to the aforesaid legacies should stand possessed of the residue of the said stock upon the trusts by her said will declared with reference to the residue of the same after payment to the said H. C. Rowley of the legacy thereby revoked.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. Tetens died on the 19th of January, 1892, leaving Mr. Tetens and her son by her first marriage her surviving. Her will and codicil were proved on the 8th of March, 1892, by both executors. There had been no issue of the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Tetens.

Questions having arisen as to the effect of the covenants on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Tetens contained in the settlement, and the testamentary dispositions made by Mrs. Tetens, an originating summons was taken out by the trustees of H. Parkin's will for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court upon them. This summons was entitled both in the matter of the trusts of the settlement and in the matter of the trusts of the will of Mrs. Tetens, and contained the following questions for the determination of the court: (1) Whether the £5,000 2½ per Cent. Stock ought to be paid to the trustees of the settlement or to the executors of Mrs. Tetens' will? (2) whether under the terms of the settlement Mrs. Tetens was under any, and what, liability to exercise the power of appointment conferred upon her by the will of the testator in favour of the trustees of the settlement? (3) whether by reason of the exercise of the power by Mrs. Tetens as in her will and codicil mentioned her estate had become liable to the trustees of the settlement, and to what extent? (4) what interest the defendant E. Tetens was entitled to under the appointment contained in the will and codicil of Mrs. Tetens? (5) whether the defendant E. Tetens was liable in respect of such interest or otherwise to the trustees of the settlement to any, and what, extent?

When the summons came on for hearing Stirling, J., directed it to stand over in order that the defendant Emil Tetens might be separately represented.

Sheldon, for the trustees of Mr. Parkin's will.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustees of the settlement.

Buckley, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the defendant Jules Creighton.—The court will decree specific performance of a contract to devise lands in a particular way: Fry on Specific Performance, 3rd ed., p. 107; Goylmer v. Paddiston, 2 Vent. 353, s.c. as Goilmere v. Battison, 1 Vern. 48; Fortescue v. Hennah, 19 Ves. 67; Loffus v. Maw, 10 W. R. 513, 3 Giff. 592, overruled on one point only by Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467. The covenant being in a marriage settlement binds the property as against volunteers claiming under Mrs. Tetens and creates a lien on the same: Vaizey on Settlements, vol. 1, p. 201; Lee v. Lee, 25 W. R. 225, 4 Ch. D. 175. [STIRLING, J., referred to Davies v. Huguenin, 11 W. R. 1040, 1 H. & M. 730.] After the execution of the settlement the property the subject of the covenant could only be disposed of by Mrs. Tetens in a particular way—i.e., in favour of the trustees of the settlement. If, however, the covenant cannot be specifically enforced the trustees are entitled to damages for breach of the covenant.

Hastings, Q.C., and Henry Fellowes, for the executors of Mrs. Tetens' will.—Mrs. Tetens had no power to enter into the covenant in question. She could only indicate by will the persons who were to take. The cases relied upon by the defendant Creighton related to contracts as to specific property, and not to powers which might never arise.

Beale, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendant Emil Tetens.—The authorities merely establish that the donee of a power of appointment has a right to contract with another person that he will put that person in the same position as if he had made a will in his favour. The object of the covenant here was to prevent Mrs. Tetens from defeating her covenant to settle after-acquired property, and was not intended to operate upon such a power of appointment as in the present case. She could not contract so as to bind herself to exercise the power in a particular way, or so as to bind the property: In re Currey, Gibson v. Way, 34 W. R. 541, 32 Ch. D. 361; Reid v. Shergold, 10 Ves. 370. As regards the construction of the settlement, each party only covenants as to what he or she can perform: Robinson v. Walker, 1 Salk. 393; Macqueen on Husband and Wife, 3rd ed. p. 248; Dawes v. Tredwell, 29 W. R. 714, 793, 18 Ch. D. 354; Ramsden v. Smith, 2 W. R. 435, 2 Drew. 298. Mr. Tetens is not liable at all; and even supposing he is bound by the covenant, it must be confined strictly to what he himself can perform, and there can be no damages in respect of the breach, for no harm has resulted to the trustees of the settlement. The trustees can have no claim upon the portion of the fund which ultimately comes to Mr. Tetens by virtue of the appointment.

Buckley, Q.C., in reply.—Mrs. Tetens' right to dispose of the fund was not limited to a disposition by will, for she was in the position of an absolute owner. Fortescue v. Hennah shows that property may be bound by a covenant to dispose of property by will in a particular way. The fund is bound by the covenant, and Mr. Tetens is trustee for the trustees of the settlement of anything that may come to him under the appointment; but if we are not entitled to specific performance we have a claim for damages.

July 5.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said: It was contended on behalf of Jules Creighton that, inasmuch as Mrs. Tetens had made a will executing the power contained in the will of her father, the property which she had power so to dispose of was, against volunteers claiming under her, bound by the covenant contained in her settlement. It was not disputed that if Mrs. Tetens had not made a will, the £5,000 stock must have gone to the persons entitled under Hugh Parkin's will in default of appointment by her; but it was said that the persons claiming under her will, being mere volunteers, could not set up a title to the appointed property against persons claiming it for valuable consideration; and in support of this contention the following cases, amongst others, were cited: Goylmer v. Paddiston, 2 Vent. 353, s.c. sub nom. Goilmere v. Battison, 1 Vern. 48, and Fortescue v. Hennah. Unquestionably some of these cases show that the court has gone a long way in enforcing by way of specific performance contracts to leave property by will; but not one of them is a case of a contract to leave by will on the part of one who was merely donee of a testamentary power of appointment. In my judgment specific performance ought not to be decreed in such a case.

"It is not to be doubted," says Rolt, L.J., in Cooper v. Martin, 16 W. R. 234, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 47 (see p. 58) "that equity . . . will never uphold an act which will defeat what the person creating the power has declared by expression or necessary implication to be a material part of his intention." In Reid v. Shergold, 10 Ves. 370 (see p. 380), Lord Eldon, speaking of a claim by a purchaser from the donee of a testamentary power to the assistance of the court, says: "The testator did not mean that she should so execute the power. He intended that she should give by will or not at all, and it is impossible to hold that the execution of an instrument or deed, which, if it availed for any purpose must avail to the destruction of that power the testator meant to remain capable of execution to the moment of her death, can be considered in equity an attempt towards the execution of the power." These remarks were made in a case in which the contest was between the purchaser and a person claiming in default of appointment. I think that in principle they apply when the question arises between persons claiming under a contract for value on the one hand, and those claiming under the will on the other. I think, therefore, that the contention on the part of the trustees and the beneficiaries under it fails.

I have next to consider what are the legal rights of the trustees of the settlement in respect of the covenant. Can they recover damages for breach of the covenant on the part of the wife contained in the settlement, and, if so, for what amount, and against whom? First, has Mrs. Tetens broken her covenant? She covenanted that "any other power or powers of appointment over any estate, property, or effects whatsoever over which she, the said M. Creighton, may now or at any time hereafter during such coverture as aforesaid be the donee under any settlement, will, or other instrument whatsoever shall, if executed by her, be executed only in favour of" the trustees of the settlement. During the coverture she became the donee of a general testamentary power of appointment, which she might have exercised in favour of the trustees. The power was executed by her, but not in favour of the trustees. It seems to me that this constituted a breach of the covenant.

Next, what is the amount of damages to be recovered in respect of such breach? It is said that the damages ought to be nominal only, because the trustees are in no worse position than if the wife had declined to exercise the power (which no doubt she was at liberty to do), with the result that the fund had gone as in default of appointment. It seems to me, however, that as the wife might have exercised the power in favour of the trustees, and as she exercised the power, but not in favour of the trustees, the covenantees ought to be placed, as nearly as may be, in the same position as if the covenant had been duly performed, and consequently that the trustees are entitled to recover by way of damages the value of the stock which would have come to their hands if the covenant had been complied with.

Then comes the question, who is liable in respect of the breach? The marriage took place in 1867, before the passing of any of the recent Married Women's Property Acts, and the liability in respect of Mrs. Tetens' ante-nuptial contracts is consequently governed by the common law. Now the liability in respect of the wife's ante-nuptial debts has recently been considered by the Court of Appeal in the case of Beck v. Pierce, 38 W. R. 29, 23 Q. B. D. 316, and I cannot do better than read the statement of the law which is given by Lindley, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court: "At common law a husband was liable to such debts to the whole extent of his property, whether he knew of their existence or not, and whether he obtained any property from his wife or none. But he could not be sued alone for such debts if his wife were alive; and he could not be sued at all for them after his wife's death: Co. Litt. 351 b; Com. Dig. Baron & Feme, Y. and (2 C.). Nor was a promise by him to pay such debts of any avail, if the only consideration for the promise was his pre-existing liability to pay them: Mitchinson v. Hewson, 7 T. R. 348, where such a promise was averred. Nor would a court of equity assist his wife's creditors against him, even if he had acquired property through her: Heard v. Stanford, 2 Eq. Cas. Ab. 134 pl. 5. If he and she were both sued, and judgment was recovered against both, such judgment could be enforced against the survivor. If judgment was recovered against her before her marriage, a sci. fa. lay against him and her after marriage, and if judgment was obtained against them both on such sci. fa., and then she died, such judgment bound him: Obrian v. Ram, 3 Mod. 186; and also cited in Woodyer v. Gresham, 1 Salk. 116. But a judgment against her alone did not affect him after her death, Ibid., except, of course, in his character of administrator."

Now to the authorities that are cited by the Lord Justice I desire to add the cases of Lockwood v. Salter, 5 B. & Ad. 303, not that it is very material to the present case, but that it is a case which relates to a covenant by a wife contained in her own marriage settlement, the action being brought against the husband. The Lord Justice in the concluding words of his judgment refers to the liability of the husband when he becomes administrator of his wife and says, "The law upon that appears to me to have been long well settled." In Wentworth on the Office of Executors, the first edition of which was published in 1641, and the 14th in 1829, at pp. 369, 370 of the last edition the law is laid down thus:—After referring to the property to which the husband becomes entitled jure mariti, and explaining the law as stated by Lindley, L.J., that the husband after his wife's death is not liable in respect of property so acquired, the author goes on to say this: "Another sort or kind of goods, or rather interests, a woman may have, viz., debts or things in action which, as the former, are not divested out of her by marriage into her husband, nor yet can she thereof make an executor without her husband's consent, although they be one degree farther from the husband than the said chattels real; for that though the husband do overlive the wife, he shall not be entitled to them as to the former. But if his wife make him executor, as she may, or if after her death he take administration of her goods; then, as he is thereby entitled to them, so is he liable also to pay her debts out of the same, when he shall have received them."

That statement of the law is recognized by Parker, L.C., in Earl of Thomond v. Earl of Suffolk, 1 P. W. 461, and by Talbot, L.C., in Heard v. Stanford, 3 P. W. 409; Cas. t. Talbot, 173; and it is so stated in the successive editions of Williams on Executors.

In the present case the husband has not taken out administration; but, in accordance with the present practice of the Probate Division, probate has been granted to him and Mr. Russell, who are the legal personal representatives of the wife. The authorities to which I have just referred appear to me to show that they are liable on the wife's covenant to the extent of the assests come to their hands.

What, then, are the assets which are available for payment of the debt? That is a point which was not really discussed before me, and if any question arises on it it ought to be further discussed; but for the sake of avoiding any unnecessary discussion I shall take leave to state the conclusions which occur to me at the present moment. In the first place, the testatrix appears to me to have herself made the fund in question subject to the payment of her debts, and this is plainly a legal debt. A question may arise as to whether the legacies to the amount of £700 would not upon the pure construction of the lady's will, take precedence; but, independently of this, I apprehend that the fund, being subject to a general power of appointment which the testatrix has exercised, would be assets for payment of the wife's ante-nuptial debts: see Fleming v. Buchanan, 3 De G. M. & G. 976. In saying that, I do not forget the decision of Kay, L.J., in In re Roper, 36 W. R. 750, 39 Ch. D. 482, in which he held that a fund which was appointed by a married woman did not make the appointed property liable as assets of the appointor in respect of debts contracted after the marriage in regard to her separate estate. But the Lord Justice recognizes the general law where he says:—"There is no doubt that in case of a man who has a general power of appointment and exercises it by will in favour of volunteers, the property so appointed will be considered as assets for payment of his debts." The conclusion at which the Lord Justice arrived in that case is thus stated: "In this case the powers of appointment were only by will; and as the provision of section 1, sub-section 4, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, does not apply, in my opinion the property appointed by her will is not subject to her engagements made during her coverture." Totally different considerations apply to a case when the liability arises out of an ante-nuptial contract.

As at present advised, therefore, it seems to me that the appointed fund is assets for payment of the debts, and that really settles all questions which arise in the case. Under these circumstances, I abstain from expressing any opinion on the question which was considerably argued before me, namely, the effect of the husband's personal covenant. That appears to me to give rise to considerations of very considerable nicety which, perhaps, were not fully discussed, and under these circumstances I do not propose to express any opinion as to his personal liability.

Parliament — Registration — County voter — Notice of objection—Description of objector—Place of abode—Sufficiency of—Registration Order, 1889, Forms 5 (A) and (B), and I., No. 2.

Where notices of objection to certain county voters were signed "John Badgery, Burnard's-terrace, on the register of electors for the township of Bodmin Borough," without stating that Burnard's-terrace was situated in Bodmin, and it was found by the revising barrister that nobody had been misled by the omission,

Held, that the description of the objector's place of abode was sufficient to satisfy the Registration Order, 1889, Forms 5 (A) and (B).

This was a case stated by the revising barrister for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall.

At a court held for revising the lists of voters for the Bodmin Division of Cornwall certain notices of objection had been served upon a number of persons resident in the said division objecting to their names being returned upon the lists of county voters as owners, occupiers, or lodgers respectively. In respect of the owners the notices of objection were signed as follows: "John Badgery. Place of abode, Burnard's-terrace; on the register of electors for the township of Bodmin Borough;" and "Thomas Brock. Place of abode, St. Nicholas-street; on the register of electors for the township of Bodmin Borough," and in respect of the occupiers and lodgers the notices were signed "John Badgery. Place of abode, Burnard's-terrace, on the list of the parliamentary electors (and county electors or burgesses) for the township of Bodmin Borough" and "Thomas Brock. Place of abode, St. Nicholas-street; on the list of parliamentary electors (and county electors or burgesses) for the township of Bodmin Borough."

These notices were objected to as invalid because they did not contain the name of the town in which the particular terrace and street respectively were situated. The revising barrister overruled the objection, holding that the description of the voter in each case sufficiently indicated the town in which the objector lived, and finding as a fact that nobody had been misled or inconvenienced by the omission, and he further held that if there was any doubt he had the power to amend and would amend the said notices. One of the persons objected to appealed.

Duke, for the appellant.—The forms regulating these notices of objection are contained in the Registration Order, 1889, Forms 5 (A) (B), for ownership electors, and Form I., No. 2, for parliamentary occupation electors and county electors in a parish not a parliamentary borough. They require that the "place of abode" of the objector should be stated. That is not done by merely stating the street or terrace in which he lives, especially where the voter is a county voter, because he may reside in any of several towns or villages. That distinguishes this case from Sheldon v. Flatcher, 17 L. J. C. P. 34, where a notice of objection in a similar form was held to be sufficient. In that case the vote was a vote for the borough of Cheltenham, and the making of the objection showed that the objector must reside in the town of Cheltenham, because otherwise he would have had no locus standi. There are two cases precisely in point, in which county votes were in question and similar notices of objection were held to be insufficient. The first is Woollett v. Davis, 4 C. B. 115, where the notice was signed "James Birch, of the Oaks. On the register of voters for the parish of St. Woolos," and the second is Humphrey v. Earle, 36 W. R. 510, 20 Q. B. D. 294, where the notice was signed "George Chapman, of Churchyard. On the list of parliamentary voters for the parish of Petersfield." Secondly, if these notices were insufficient they could not be amended. By 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 28, sub-section 2, a revising barrister "may correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any claim or notice of objection." This refers to cases of clerical errors or cases in which nobody could possibly be misled. For example, in Adams v. Bostock, 30 W. R. 460, 8 Q. B. D. 259, it was held that a revising barrister might correct the omission of an objector's place of abode, but that was in the case of a borough vote, where it was impossible that anybody could be misled, but that reasoning does not apply to a county vote.

T. J. Bullen, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Two points have been argued for the appellant in this case, first that the notices were bad, and secondly that if they were bad the revising barrister had no power to amend. I do not think it necessary to decide the latter point as to amendment, for I am of opinion that the notices were sufficient without it. According to the authority of Sheldon v. Flatcher, and according to good sense, I think that the objectors' places of abode were sufficiently described. The decision in Sheldon v. Flatcher seems to me to be directly in point. We have been pressed with the case of Humphrey v. Earle, but the distinction between that case and the present is that there was no finding that the persons objected to had not been misled, and the court seem to have thought that the omission of the word "the" before "churchyard" might have misled others into supposing that the address did not refer to the churchyard in Petersfield, whereas here the revising barrister has found as a fact that no one has been misled or inconvenienced by the omission.

STEPNEY ELECTION PETITION. (a.)

Parliament—Election petition—Practice—Corrupt and illegal practices—Time for delivery of particulars—Extension of time—Special circumstances—Rules of Court for Trial of Election Petitions, 1868, rr. 6, 7.

The general rule of practice in election petitions, that particulars of corrupt and illegal practices will be ordered to be delivered seven days before trial of the petition, is not a hard and fast rule, and, in determining whether there are special circumstances upon which it will act in extending the time, the court will take into consideration the size and nature of the constituency, the population, and the number of voters, and also the number of witnesses whom it is proposed to call.

Where, in a parliamentary election petition claiming to void the election, and also claiming the seat upon a scrutiny, and relating to a division of a metropolitan borough which contained above 7,000 voters, 58,000 inhabitants, and in which some 170 witnesses were intended to be called by the petitioners, an order had been made for the delivery of particulars of alleged corrupt and illegal practices seven days before trial, the court made an order extending the time to ten days, the particulars being by consent limited to such as would not have the effect of anticipating the scrutiny list.

Motion by the respondent to enlarge the time for the delivery of certain particulars by the petitioners under the order of Barnes, J., from seven to ten clear days before the day appointed for the trial of the petition.

The particulars in question, which required full and detailed information as to names and addresses, dates, places, and amounts, had reference to the following charges and allegations in the petition—viz., of (1) bribery, undue influence, and treating by the respondent; of (2) the same by his election agent; of (3) illegal payments for the use of premises and the exhibition of bills; of (4) prohibited persons having voted, and of procuring such prohibited persons to vote; of (5) payments by the respondent and his agent for election expenses otherwise than through the election agent; of (6) money provided for prohibited payments; of (7) payments made for bands of music, torches, flags, banners, &c.; of (8) illegal employments; of (9) illegal hirings; of (10) election expenses omitted from the return, and misstatements as to those incurred; of (11) failure by the respondent and his election agent to comply with the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, as to the return, and of corrupt practices by the election agent; of (12) election expenses incurred in excess of the maximum allowed; and of (13) general bribery and treating.

The petition claimed (1) to void the election, and (2) the seat for the unsuccessful candidate. The motion for the enlargement of the time for the delivery of the particulars was made in the first instance unsupported by affidavit of any special circumstances. This course the court held to be insufficient, but granted an adjournment to allow the respondent to produce such affidavit. On the adjourned hearing, the 4th of November, an affidavit by the respondent's solicitor was read to the effect that owing to the area of the constituency, which contained over 7,000 voters, and a population of 58,753, and the fact that a very large number of witnesses would in all probability be called on behalf of the petitioner, the period of seven days was insufficient to enable the respondent adequately to prepare his case.

Coward, for the respondent, in support of the motion. — The affidavit discloses sufficient special circumstances to warrant the enlargement of the time. It is true that the general rule has been to make a seven days' order, but that rule is not inflexible. In Lenham v. Barber, 31 W. R. 428, 10 Q. B. D. 293, the Hereford case, although the order made was a seven days' order, it was said by the judges that the general rule did not mean that a hard and fast line was to be drawn. The precedents in practice have chiefly been in cases of small boroughs, where the same difficulties did not exist.

Roskill, for the petitioners.—If this motion succeeds it will have the effect of making the order for particulars bad for want of jurisdiction, inasmuch as it will be granting ten days where six only are allowed by rule 7 of the Rules of Michaelmas Term, 1868, which applies to particulars of the votes objected to and the objection to such votes upon a claim of the seat. It would, therefore, have the effect also of anticipating the scrutiny list. [In order to meet this latter objection it was, however, agreed by counsel to limit the particulars in such a way as should not have this effect, and to confine those in reference to heads 4, 6, 7, and 8 to allegations against the respondent and his election agent.] The object of limiting the time to seven days is to prevent, so far as possible, any tampering with the witnesses, and the practice has been almost universal in favour of the seven days' order.

POLLOCK, B.—The order for these particulars was made by Barnes, J., and it was directed that they should be delivered seven days before the trial of the petition. The respondent now seeks to enlarge the time from seven to ten days. We should, of course, in substance, observe the rule in vogue in such matters. In ordinary civil actions, when there are a large number of witnesses, a period of ten days would not be unreasonable, and an election petition is a peculiar inquiry, and may involve a prolonged preliminary investigation which might be insufficient if curtailed. The question really depends on the population, and the area of the constituency, and the number of witnesses to be called. It is quite clear that a small borough like Hereford is but a weak analogy to the present case. There you might very likely have a ferment during the inquiry, but when you come to a large place like Stepney it is not likely to be so much disturbed. Now here the matters I have mentioned are material, and I think, especially as it is not the sole case in which a ten days' order has been made, that ten days is a reasonable time, and well within our power to order.

HAWKINS, J.—I agree.

Coward asked for the costs of the motion.

Roskill.—That part of the motion which we were compelled to resist as anticipating the scrutiny list, and so rendering the order bad for want of jurisdiction, has been abandoned with the petitioner's consent, and they ought not, therefore, to be ordered to pay the costs.

KNIGHT v. LEE. (a.)

Gaming—Betting—Employment of agent to bet—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 Vict. c. 9)—Bet made and paid before passing of Act—Action brought after passing of Act—Whether Act retrospective.

The Gaming Act, 1892, does not apply to a promise made before the Act came into operation.

Before the Act came into operation a betting agent made certain bets at the request of and for a principal.

Before the Act came into operation the betting agent received the winnings and paid the losses in respect of such bets. The result of these transactions was that there was a balance against the principal.

After the Act came into operation the agent brought an action against the principal to recover the balance.

Held, that he was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Mackonochie, sitting at the County Court of Wiltshire, holden at Salisbury. The question was whether, after the Gaming Act, 1892, came into operation, an action could be brought to recover £11 12s. 6d., the amount which the plaintiff, Knight, who was a betting agent, had paid before the Act came into operation for bets made by him at the request of and for the defendant, Lee.

Between November 4 and November 28, 1891, the plaintiff executed certain betting commissions for the defendant. The plaintiff made bets for the defendant, collected the winnings, paid the losses, and rendered an account to the defendant, charging a certain commission for his trouble. On November 28, 1891, there was a balance of £11 12s. 6d. against the defendant in respect of these transactions. The Act came into operation on May 20, 1892. After the Act came into operation the plaintiff brought an action in the county court to recover from the defendant the balance of £11 12s. 6d.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the Act related solely to promises made after the Act came into operation.

The defendant appealed.

Morten, for the appellant, referred to the Act.

D'Eyncourt, for the respondent.—A debt lawfully incurred before the statute can be sued for after the Act came into operation.

He referred to Moon v. Durden, 2 Ex. 22; Towler v. Chatterton, 6 Bing. 258; Gillmore v. Shooter, 2 Mod. 310.

Morten, in reply.—Some effect must be given to the words, "no action shall be brought." [MATHEW, J.—They are quite consistent with the Act being prospective.] The first part of the section would make void all promises to pay sums of money made before the Act, therefore the second part is not needed unless it applies to promises made before the Act. Moon v. Durden is distinguishable.

MATHEW, J.—The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. I think his judgment must be affirmed. A betting agent had been employed and had paid money for his principal. Under Read v. Anderson, 32 W. R. 950, 13 Q. B. D. 779, he was entitled to recover the money. He had a vested right to recover the money at the time the Act came into operation. Then comes the statute? Is it retrospective or prospective? Mr. Morten says that the intention of the Legislature was that it should be retrospective, otherwise the second part of the section would not have been needed. Now the section provides that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of the 8th and 9 Victoria, chapter one hundred and nine, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any service in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void. . . . ." So far all is prospective, and after the word "promise" you must read in "hereafter made." The section continues, "and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money," and it is argued that that is both prospective and retrospective. I cannot agree with that view, which would give no meaning whatever to the word "such." The word "such" is a repetition of the earlier part of the section, and shows that the second part of the section deals only with the sums of money dealt with in the first part—that is, sums of money due on a promise hereafter made.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff's right accrued before the statute passed. It is possible to give a construction which will carry out the intention of the Legislature without any such harsh construction as that contended for by the appellant.

Appeal dismissed.

Game—Dealing in game without licence—Exposing for sale and selling hare and black game killed in Russia—Game Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32)—2 & 3 Vict. c. 35—23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, ss. 13, 14—24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 17.

Held, that, the hare and black game having been killed abroad, it was not necessary to hold the excise licence.

This was a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

On the 24th of March, 1892, the respondent Eccles exposed for sale at his shop, 325, Old Kent-road, a hare and a brace of black game, which he on the same day sold to the appellant Pudney, an officer of Inland Revenue. The respondent at the time of such sale did not hold an excise licence to deal in game. The hare and black game had been killed abroad (in Russia) and imported into this country for sale.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The magistrate found as a fact that the brace of black game were of the same species as, and indistinguishable from, the black game found in the United Kingdom, and named in section 2 of the Game Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32), and that the hare was of the same species as, and indistinguishable from, the hares found in Scotland (commonly called blue hares), and named in section 2 of the Game Act, 1831.

On the 14th of June, 1892, the respondent was summoned before the magistrate at the Southwark Police-court to answer an information exhibited by the appellant which charged the respondent with dealing in game without having in force such a licence as by the statute in that behalf is required. The magistrate dismissed the information, being of opinion that on the facts no excise licence was necessary. The question for the opinion of the court was whether, under the circumstances, the respondent was guilty of the offence charged against him.

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, s. 14, every person dealing in game in England, Scotland, or Ireland is required to obtain an excise licence upon payment of the duty of £2, and any person who purchases or sells or otherwise deals in game before he obtains such a licence is to forfeit the sum of £20.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 17, it is enacted that in any information exhibited for recovery of the said penalty it shall be sufficient to allege and, upon the trial thereof to prove, that the defendant dealt in game without the licence required by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90.

By section 13 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90 all the clauses, provisions, and penalties of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 and of the Act 2 & 3 Vict. c. 35 relating to dealers in game and to the selling of game are, so far as the same are consistent with the express provisions of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, and as the same are altered and amended by that Act, to extend to and be of full force and effect in and throughout the United Kingdom, and are to be observed, applied, and enforced as if the same, so altered and amended and made consistent with the express provisions of that Act, had been therein repeated and specially enacted.

Section 2 of the Game Act, 1831, enacts that the word "game" shall, for all the purposes of that Act, be deemed to include hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath or moor game, black game, and bustards.

Danckwerts, for the appellant.—The respondent ought to have been convicted. If the magistrate is right, a person dealing in foreign game requires no licence, while if he deals in English game he does. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90 was passed for the protection of the revenue.

He referred to Guyer v. Reg., 37 W. R. 586, 23 Q. B. D. 100; Saunders v. Baldy, 14 W. R. 176, L. R. 1 Q. B. 87.

Sutton, for the magistrate.

The respondent was not represented.

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that the magistrates were right. The question is whether the fact that this person did not procure the excise licence mentioned in 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, s. 14, renders him liable to prosecution, seeing that the birds he sold did not belong to the United Kingdom, but came from abroad. You can only construe the later Acts by reference to the former Act of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32. By that Act it was intended to impose the obligation of obtaining a certificate to sell game. The obligation was imposed on the dealer to obtain a licence. The form of licence makes the section perfectly plain. [The learned judge read the form of licence in Schedule (A).] The licence was intended to apply to English game only. The subsequent statutes were passed extending the provisions of the Act of Will. 4. It has been said that revenue clauses of statutes ought to be construed widely, and that the Act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 90) is a revenue Act, and that the intention was to raise a revenue upon the sale of game of any description. But it clearly refers to the earlier Act. Section 14 says: [The learned judge read section 14 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 90.] The reasoning of Hawkins, J., in Guyer v. Reg. is perfectly accurate.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the later statute must be read by reference to the earlier.

HOWARD v. SADLER. (a.)

Company—Director—Shares held for purpose of qualification—Charging order—"In his own right"—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14.

Shares standing in the name of a judgment debtor in the books of a company cannot be made the subject of a charging order if he is not the beneficial owner of them, but is merely registered as owner for the purpose of qualifying as a director of the company.

Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610, commented on and followed.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from an order of the judge in chambers discharging a charging order nisi.

The plaintiffs, having recovered a judgment for £43 against the defendant, obtained a charging order nisi on fifty shares standing in the defendant's name in the books of the Oldbury Railway Co. The defendant was a director of that company, and the company's private Act provided that the qualification for a director should be the possession, in his own right, of not less than fifty shares. After the charging order nisi had been obtained the plaintiffs were informed by the Great Western Railway Co. that that company had purchased the defendant's shares in the Oldbury Railway Co. in 1889, but that they had been left in his name in order that he might continue to be qualified as a director, and that this transfer had not been registered. By the Oldbury Railway Act, 1881, the Great Western Railway Co. were empowered to nominate three out of the five directors of the Oldbury Railway Co.

Gregson Ellis, for the plaintiffs.—This case can be distinguished from Cooper v. Griffin, 40 W. R. 420, [1892] 1 Q. B. 740, because here the defendant held himself out to the plaintiffs as the real owner of the shares, and is, therefore, estopped from now denying it, and also because the Great Western Railway Co., which has power to appoint three out of the five Oldbury Co. directors, has, by purchasing the defendant's shares, practically appointed a fourth director. This is an evasion of the Oldbury Railway Act, 1881, and is possibly ultrà vires.

J. V. Austin, for the Great Western Railway Co.—This case is covered by Cooper v. Griffin, which case followed Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610, in which Jessel, M.R., held that possession of shares, in his own right, by a director for the purpose of qualification did not necessitate beneficial ownership. Assuming that the Great Western Railway Co. did act illegally in purchasing the defendant's shares, that is a fraud against the shareholders, not against the plaintiffs. The defendant is a trustee for the Great Western Railway Co., and therefore the plaintiffs cannot have a charging order against the shares: In re The Blakeley Ordnance Co., 25 W. R. 111. [He was stopped by the court.]

Atherley Jones, for the defendant.

Gregson Ellis, in reply.—In Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co. the words "in his own right" were contained in the articles of association of the company, and that case is no authority for the construction of words in an Act of Parliament, as is the case here.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. I quite concur with what was said by the Court of Appeal in Cooper v. Griffin as to the case of Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co. being a binding decision. That case was decided some time ago, and has often been acted on since, and it would cause great confusion if the interpretation placed by Jessel, M.R., on these words, "in his own right," was now to be called in question. I am unable to distinguish this case from Cooper v. Griffin.

WILLS, J.—I agree, and have only to add that I regret the decision in Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., because I think it has a tendency to make people commit themselves to shams.

HASTINGS (LIMITED) v. PEARSON. (a.)

Pawnbroker—Liability—Goods pledged by person entrusted to him by the owner for purposes of sale—Mercantile agent—Ordinary course of business—Factors Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 45), ss. 1, 2.

Where a person entrusted with goods for the purpose of sale only, pledges them with a pawnbroker, he is not a mercantile agent "acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent" within the meaning of section 2 of the Factors Act, 1889, and the pawnbroker is not protected by that section from an action by the owner to recover the value of the goods.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Bristowe at the Lambeth County Court, giving judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs were dealers in watches and jewellery, and employed a person named Brook to take articles to private houses for the purpose of selling them. Brook was paid by means of a small salary and a commission on the price of the articles which he sold. Brook pledged certain articles which had been so entrusted to him for sale with the defendant, who was a pawnbroker, and who received them in good faith, believing them to be the property of Brook.

The plaintiff then brought this action against the defendant, claiming to recover the goods or their value. The county court judge held that Brook was a "mercantile agent" within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889, and that the defendant was protected from liability by section 2 of that Act, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Factors Act, 1889, enacts (section 1) that for the purposes of the Act (1) the expression "mercantile agent" shall mean a mercantile agent having, in the customary course of his business as such agent, authority either to sell goods or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods."

Section 2, sub-section (1), provides that "where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods, or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same: provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not, at the time of the disposition, notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

Finlay, Q.C., and Cluer, for the appellant.—Brook was not a mercantile agent; and if he was, he was not "acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent" in pledging these articles.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and C. Attenborough, for the respondent.—The terms used in the definition of a mercantile agent are disjunctive, and if a person comes within one of the terms he is a mercantile agent for all purposes. Brook, being authorized to sell articles for the plaintiff, was a mercantile agent, and therefore, by section 2, the defendant is protected in dealing with him.

They cited Heyman v. Flewker, 13 C. B. N. S. 519, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54.

MATHEW, J.—I think that this appeal must be allowed. The argument that we have just heard has the effect of striking out of the 2nd section of the Act very material and very important words which are to be found there. What appear to be the facts in this case are these—a jeweller entrusted a man, who appears to have acted as a sort of traveller, with certain articles of jewellery for sale. There was no authority whatever to pledge. He pledged them with the defendant and thereupon the plaintiff brought an action to recover the goods from the defendant. A defence was set up under the Factors Act that the defendant in dealing with this traveller was dealing with a mercantile agent and was protected by the terms of the Act. The only section upon which reliance can be placed is section 2. [His lordship read section 2, and continued:—] I think that what the section means to refer to is a person of a class ordinarily carrying on that description of business; such a person held out to the world as belonging to that class is within the Factors Act a person who binds his principal. There is no evidence of a person here who answers to that description, because, so far as at present known, there is no class of persons whose business it is to go about pledging watches on commission or for wages on the part of their employers. That being so, it seems to me that the Act does not apply, and the judgment must, therefore, be reversed.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

RIDGEWAY (Appellant) v. FARNDALE (Respondent). (a.)

Criminal law—Gaming—Betting in a public place—"At any game or pretended game of chance"—Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 38), s. 3.

In order to obtain a conviction on a charge of betting by way of wagering, under section 3 of the Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873, it is necessary to allege and prove that the wagering was at some game or pretended game of chance.

Special case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Birmingham.

An information was laid by the respondent, the Chief Constable of Birmingham, against the appellant charging him that he did unlawfully bet, by way of wagering in a certain street, with certain articles used as a means of such wagering—namely, written papers and coins, contrary to section 3 of the Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873.

The information did not allege that the wagering by the appellant had been at any game or pretended game of chance, and it was contended on behalf of the appellant that owing to that omission the information did not disclose any offence. The magistrate, however, convicted the appellant, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Section 3 of the Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873, provides that every person playing or betting by way of wagering or gaming in any street, &c., to which the public have access, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, or any coin, card, token, or other article used as an instrument or means of such wagering or gaming at any game or pretended game of chance, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and may be convicted as such.

A question was also raised as to whether what the appellant had done was betting with any coin as an instrument or means of gaming within the Act; but it became unnecessary to decide that point, and so much of the case as refers to it is therefore omitted.

Poland, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with him), for the appellant.—In order to obtain a conviction under section 3 of the Act of 1873 it is necessary that the playing or betting should be "at a game or pretended game of chance." That has not been alleged or proved in this case, and the conviction, therefore, was wrong.

Channell, Q.C. (Hugo Young with him), for the respondent.—The conviction was right. The words "at any game of chance" only apply when the charge is one of playing or gaming, but when it is a case of betting solely, like the present case, these words are immaterial.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be quashed. The original offence was created by 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, and is in these words, "Every person playing or betting in any street, &c., at or with any table or instrument of gaming, at any game or pretended game of chance." That was extended by the Act of 1873 by including other instruments of gaming, such as coins or cards. But it still remains essential that the betting or gaming should be "at a game or pretended game of chance." The magistrate has not come to any finding on that point, and therefore the conviction is invalid on the face of it and must be quashed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction quashed.

REG. v. TIDY. (a.)

Quo warranto — Acceptance of incompatible office—Churchwarden and vestry clerk—Non-corporate office.

The defendant, while holding the office of churchwarden, was proposed for the office of vestry clerk and declared elected. He published a letter thanking the electors, but never acted as vestry clerk.

Held, that the defendant had not exercised the office of vestry clerk in such a way as to render the remedy by quo warranto applicable.

Reg. v. Jones, 28 L. T. N. S. 270, 21 W. R. Dig. 210, followed.

On the 12th of May, 1892, a rule nisi was granted for an information in the nature of a quo warranto to show by what authority one Tidy claimed to exercise the office of vestry clerk for the parish of Ealing.

Tidy was churchwarden, and his term of office expired at Easter, 1892. Before that date, and while he was still churchwarden, Tidy was proposed for the office of vestry clerk and declared duly elected. He published a letter thanking the electors for having elected him, but up to the date at which these proceedings were instituted he had not acted as vestry clerk, and had declared that he only accepted the office of vestry clerk on the condition that he should not act until he had ceased to be churchwarden.

Channell, Q.C. (Wedderburn with him), showed cause.

A. B. Kempe, in support of the rule.

The following cases were cited in the course of the arguments:—Rex v. Ponsonby, Sayer, 245, 2 Bro. P. C. 311; Rex v. Whitwell, 5 T. R. 85; Rex v. Tate, 4 East, 337; Reg. v. Slatter, 11 A. & E. 505; Reg. v. Coaks, 3 E. & B. 249, 2 W. R. C. L. Dig. 191; Reg. v. Jones, 28 L. T. N. S. 270, 21 W. R. Dig. 210; Pritchard v. Mayor of Bangor, 37 W. R. 103, 13 App. Cas. 241.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged, on the ground that we are bound by Reg. v. Jones. That case was decided in 1873, and must have been frequently considered. Apart from that case I think that a great deal might have been said in favour of the view that, when all has been done that ought to be done, the office must be regarded as being full, and the remedy by quo warranto is applicable. But the case of Reg. v. Jones is an authority that in the case of a non-corporate office something more than mere acceptance is necessary. I desire to guard against the notion that in all cases it is necessary that the person elected should exercise the office, because in the case of a corporate office the rule is that election, acceptance, and admission are enough. I also agree with Mr. Channell that a conditional acceptance, such as in the present case, is no acceptance at all.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

CHARLESWORTH v. MILLS. (a.)

Bill of sale—Pledge—Transfer of property—Possession—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

The sheriff having seized the goods of A. under a fi. fa., the appellant (an auctioneer) agreed verbally with A. to pay out the sheriff, provided he was put into possession, with authority to sell by auction and to repay himself, handing over the balance (if any) to A. The sheriff was paid out, the man in possession remaining in possession, not for the sheriff, but for the appellant, and a document was then drawn up embodying this arrangement.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 39 W. R. 1, 25 Q. B. D. 421), that the appellant did not get his title under the document, but by virtue of the transaction, and, consequently, that there was no bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882.

Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690, approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), reported 39 W. R. 1, 25 Q. B. D. 421.

The facts are set out in the report in the court below, and are shortly as follows:—The goods of one Wilson were seized by the sheriff's officer under an execution. On the 9th of December, 1887, Wilson applied to the appellant Charlesworth, an auctioneer, to pay the sheriff out, and he agreed to do so, provided the goods seized were of sufficient value, and also that the sheriff's officer, by his bailiff, should continue in possession, not for the sheriff, but for Charlesworth. The sheriff's officer agreed, and the sheriff was paid out; the bailiff, as arranged, remaining in possession. Wilson then gave Charlesworth a letter, which was as follows:—"December 9, 1887.—Mr. Charlesworth, Auctioneer, Hull.—Sir, In consideration of your paying the sheriff's officer £62 15s. 1d., I hereby authorize and request you to hold possession of my furniture and effects now on the premises, No. 2, Pendrill-street, Hull, and to sell the whole by auction as soon as convenient, and after deducting the above amount and your charges, pay over the balance (if any) to me.—Yours truly, H. P. WILSON."

On the 10th of December Wilson executed a bill of sale to the respondent Mills, who knew nothing of the seizure, nor of the arrangement with Charlesworth; and the bill of sale was duly registered. On becoming aware of this, Charlesworth moved and sold the goods.

The respondent Mills sought to recover their value from the appellant, and Day, J., gave judgment for him. The majority of the Court of Appeal held that the letter was essential to the proof of Charlesworth's title; that it was a bill of sale, and void for want of registration.

From these decisions the appellant (the original defendant in the action) appealed.

Witt, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the appellant.—There was no act to be done to perfect Charlesworth's title. Nothing could be done under the document. Ours is an à fortiori case to Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690, and is not within Ex parte Parsons, 34 W. R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532.

Arnold Statham and Dyer, for the respondent.—What took place was one transaction, and until Wilson's signature to the letter the possession had not passed.

Wordall v. Smith, 1 Camp. 333; Seal v. Claridge, 29 W. R. 598, 7 Q. B. D. 516; Newlove v. Shrewsbury, 36 W. R. 835, 21 Q. B. D 41, were also referred to.

The appellant's counsel were not heard in reply.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I confess that but for the doubts which have been in the minds of the learned judges in the court below, I should have thought that this was a very plain case. I am not quite certain that I appreciate at this moment what the learned judge who tried the cause meant by the phrases which he used. I can quite understand that what he called "the mischief" intended to be remedied by the Bills of Sale Act may have been very prominent before the learned judge's mind, but what it had to do with the facts of this case I am not able at present to fathom.

That the Bills of Sale Acts of 1854 and 1878 were intended to prevent false credit being given to people who had been allowed to remain in possession of goods which apparently were theirs, the ownership of which, however, they had parted with, is manifest enough by the language of those statutes. It was intended to prevent persons getting false credit by being permitted to remain in possession of goods of which they were no longer the owners. The Acts of Parliament, therefore, intended, in a case with creditors, that if people were allowed to remain in possession of goods, of which, nevertheless, the ownership was no longer theirs, those goods and chattels should be subject to the execution of bonâ fide creditors who ought not to have been induced to give credit by the apparent ownership of the goods being in those persons, and were, therefore, entitled to have their debts satisfied when by the default of the assignees of those goods they had been allowed to continue in the possession of persons to whom the property in them no longer belonged. That was the intended policy; and for such purposes it is manifest that the Legislature would desire to give the widest possible interpretation to every one of the documents by which the ownership was really intended to be practically changed, while the goods still remained in the apparent possession and dominion of the persons from whom the ownership had, nevertheless, really passed away.

The Act of 1882 was directed to a totally different subject-matter. It was thought by the Legislature, rightly or wrongly, that a great number of impecunious debtors might be induced to sign documents, the legal effect of which those persons did not understand—that there might be some question of future property vesting in a person who had sent money to impecunious debtors who were likely to become the victims of that sort of deceit. It was, therefore, intended by the Legislature, in order to protect them, to give a particular form of words which should plainly express the nature of the contract as to the loan and the security for the loan. The Legislature, accordingly, in order to effect its object, gave a form of bill of sale, and made every bill of sale void unless it was in the form given by the statute.

It seems to me that the Legislature neither intended to interfere, nor is it the effect of the legislation to which I have referred to interfere, with other transactions than those which the Legislature has expressly pointed out.

Now let us see what the transaction here is. First of all, is it within the mischief of either the Act of 1854 or the Act of 1878, the object and purpose of which I have described? The transaction here is a very plain one. The debtor here has an execution in his house—the sheriff takes possession (upon what the effect and quality of that possession is, I will say a word presently), the debtor is under the impression that he can raise sufficient money upon the security of the goods of which the sheriff has taken possession to satisfy him, and also perhaps to leave a surplus for himself. For that purpose it is necessary that the execution should be paid out—the sheriff will not relinquish possession, and for his own security he cannot relinquish possession until he has been paid the money. Accordingly the debtor goes to the appellant, Mr. Charlesworth, and invites him to lend him the money upon the security of the goods, which at that moment are in the possession of the sheriff. Mr. Charlesworth agrees to do so, but he bargains for, and makes it a necessary part of the transaction, without which he will not advance his money, that he shall get possession of the goods. That is agreed to. The effect and value of what is done I will discuss presently, as I have said, when I am dealing with what was in the possession of the sheriff. That was a bargain that the possession should be changed from the person to whom the money was being advanced to the person lending it. That, therefore, undoubtedly was not within the mischief intended to be cured by the Acts of 1854 and 1878. The transaction is completed, the money is advanced, and the sheriff is paid out.

But it is said that this is a bill of sale within the Act of 1882, that the form of the instrument by which the property in these goods is changed, and the form by which the assignment of the goods is made, is within the Act of 1882, and that therefore inasmuch as the Act of 1882, in furtherance of the objects which I have described, makes a bill of sale in such a form void, even as against the grantor himself, no property passed by this instrument, and therefore the act of the fraudulent debtor, who, immediately after he had executed this instrument, went and assigned the goods to somebody else, and got more money upon them—the fraudulent debtor's act in doing that, is to be affirmed, because the instrument which it is said he executed, was void under the Act of 1882. The very simple answer to that is that the whole foundation of that argument fails. There was no assignment, there was no bill of sale, there was nothing that in the meaning of the Act of 1882 can be relied upon by reason of its operating a change of property, no such thing took place. The instrument itself does not purport to do any such thing. That which operated the change of property was the actual change of one guardian and keeper of the property by his filling one character instead of another. The reasoning of the Court of Appeal, so far as I can follow it at present, appears to be this—that although they affirm and rely upon their own decision in Ex parte Hubbard, they raise what, to my mind, would be a most serious and important question, having very wide consequences indeed; they raise a distinction between what is suggested as physical possession and formal possession.

Now I must say that I received a very candid answer from the bar when I put the question, what was the difference in the nature of the possession between the possession by the sheriff and the possession by the man who held the property on the part of Mr. Charlesworth? It was admitted with great candour that there was no difference at all in the character or quality of the possession. Then it comes to this, that the possession of the sheriff in this case, nay, I may say the possession of the sheriff in every case, must be regarded as open to that question, as to whether or not it is a physical possession or a formal possession. I am not quite certain that I am able to comprehend the exact distinction which has been pointed out. I understand what possession is (at least I think so), and I never understood that the possession of the sheriff was other than physical and actual possession. I do not mean by that, that the sheriff's man has at every moment in his possession every article which exists in the house. It is obvious that such a possession, if it is to be limited to that, would be absolutely impossible; it would make the question of whether or not there was possession sufficient to vest the property in the sheriff, a question depending upon the particular article or class of articles of which he was in possession, because some of them would be incapable of being grasped by the hand, if that is what is meant by taking physical possession. But what do I find occurred here? I find that there was a man in the house for the purpose of preventing any other person interfering with, or removing, or taking away any of the property in question; and it is not denied that if the assignor or anyone on his behalf had attempted to remove any of the articles which were in the house at the time when this man was in possession, on behalf of Mr. Charlesworth, he would have been immediately stopped. Therefore I should have thought that this possession was just as much a physical and actual possession as it is possible for any one man to have of articles which are distributed all over a house.

Under these circumstances, what is the problem which your lordships are called upon to solve? We have the fact that the debtor has given a perfectly good mandate. I am not quite satisfied that the word "pledge" is properly applicable to it, although I do not deny that in some respects the rights of a pledgor may come in question; but the transaction is this: the man says, "I hand over these goods to you," in the only sense in which goods that are distributed over a house are capable of being handed over, "in consideration of your paying money to the sheriff and getting them out of the hands of the sheriff"; and then he draws up a document in which he says, "Now keep this possession for me and sell the goods for what they will fetch by auction," and of course after he has done that, the person to whom they are handed holds them with this kind of trust attached to them, and when they are realized, if there is anything remaining beyond the amount of £62 which he has advanced upon them, he holds that money to the order of the person who has given him the mandate.

That is the transaction. What that has to do either with the mischief contemplated by the Bills of Sale Acts, or what it has to do with a bill of sale at all, I confess myself totally unable to understand. It is a transaction in which, simultaneously with the handing over of the goods and advancing the money (and I affirm that the words "handing over the goods" are perfectly applicable to such a transaction as this, because they are handed over in the only way in which goods, distributed all over a house, can be handed over) a document is signed by the borrower which says, "Pay yourself the money which you have advanced, and hand me the surplus, if there is any such."

It seems to me, therefore, that the whole argument based upon the assumption that this is a bill of sale transaction at all entirely fails. It, therefore, appears to me to be obvious that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

There is one further observation which I wish to make, because it appears to me that there has been a confusion both in the argument and (I say it with all respect) I think in one of the judgments between what it is necessary to establish in a court of law when you are proving a transaction, and the operative part of the transaction itself. I can well understand and appreciate that where upon a trial this was elicited, that after the statement of the loan had taken place and after what the transaction was, had been deposed to, one of the witnesses might have said: "There was a writing drawn up and it had relation to the transaction," then the judge would, of course, insist upon the production of the instrument in order to see whether or not the rights of the parties had been reduced to writing, and would not allow a mere parol description of the transaction to go on without the writing being produced. But, after all, that only comes to producing the writing, such as it is, and if the writing, when it is produced, does not affect the rights of the parties, or make them different from what they would have been before, or from what they would have been if no writing had been referred to, no particular magic is applicable to such a thing as that.

One very cogent observation which appears to me to have been made by the Master of the Rolls on this subject, commenting on his own judgment and that of the rest of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Hubbard, was this, that in Ex parte Hubbard the whole transaction was disclosed upon the writing, including the making of the advance and the terms upon which that advance was made; and but for one circumstance it might be very fairly and reasonably have been argued to have been a bill of sale within the Act; but the distinction was this, that it recorded a transaction which, in respect of possession, was already passed, possession had been given, and the relation of the parties had so far changed that there was no room for the application of any one of the definitions of the Bills of Sale Act; and the result was that, although that document did profess to disclose the whole terms of the transaction, it was held, and I think rightly held (and I should have thought that the Court of Appeal were in this case bound by their own decision in Ex parte Hubbard), that the Bills of Sale Act did not apply at all; that the transaction was one in which the possession had been already taken, and that it excluded the application of any of the definitions in the Bills of Sale Act, which, therefore, were not applicable to the case then under discussion.

Under these circumstances I have to move your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed.

Lord WATSON.—I can have no hesitation in concurring in the judgment which has been proposed, because I am quite unable to distinguish the present case in principle from that of Ex parte Hubbard. The document of December 9, 1887, which has been treated as a bill of sale by the majority of the Appeal Court, does not give any licence to take possession of the goods, and it did not constitute the title upon which possession was given to the appellant. It contains a mandate to hold and sell the goods, but it was not intended to operate, and did not in point of fact come into operation, until possession had been actually transferred from the sheriff to the appellant. In any question with the present respondent the case seems to me to be the same as if the goods had been sent for sale to the appellant's premises and an advance made against them by the appellant before the document in question was either written or delivered.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case must be decided in precisely the same way as if the debtor whose transactions have given rise to the controversy had been himself bringing this action; and it certainly would be startling, to my mind shocking, if there were anything in the state of the law which compelled us to say that under the circumstances which occurred in this case he could successfully maintain such an action.

Now I think that in a case of this description it is most important to bear in mind the distinction between the Acts of 1854 and 1878, relating to bills of sale, and the Act of 1882. The only Act which can have any operation in this case to make the transaction void is the Act of 1882; and the earlier Act of 1878 is only important as containing the definition of a bill of sale which is imported into the Act of 1882. But any reference to the Act of 1878 beyond that which is necessary for the purpose of transferring, so to speak, the definition contained in that Act to the Act of 1882 can only lead to misunderstanding and mischief.

Now the Act of 1882 no doubt makes a bill of sale void which is not in the prescribed form; but in order to make the Act operate at all it is essential in the first place to prove that the transaction was one which was effected by a bill of sale—of course, using those words in the sense which is attributed to them by the Act of 1878. Well, was it so effected? It is true that a document was drawn up simultaneously with the other acts which were done for the purpose of completing the right of Charlesworth in relation to these goods; but it is absolutely clear that it is not every document which may be drawn up at the time when a transaction is being carried out for the purpose of transferring goods from one party to another, that is a bill of sale. In each case one must look at the circumstances in order to see what the transaction was, and what the document was.

Now this document beyond all question was not a document which was intended to transfer or did transfer the property in these goods; because if there is anything clear in the transaction it is this, that at the time at which this document, whatever its effect, began to operate, Charlesworth was in possession of the goods under an arrangement by which he was to have, for certain purposes at least, a title to them. He did not get his title under that document, he got his title by virtue of the transaction, and the document never began to operate at a time at which he had not possession. Under those circumstances, what words in the Act of 1878 are supposed to cover it? For the reasons which I have given, it cannot be an "assurance." It certainly is not "a bill of sale" in the ordinary sense of those words. Is it a "licence to take possession"? The statement which I have just made seems to me to be conclusive that it is not a licence to take possession, because those words can only apply, as was pointed out by all the judges in Ex parte Hubbard, when the possession is to be taken subsequently to the signature of the document.

The case of Ex parte Hubbard seems to me to be absolutely indistinguishable from the present case. In that case there was a document drawn up, containing the terms upon which the advance was to be made, the sale of the goods was to be effected, and the repayment was to be required. That was much more like a bill of sale than anything which is to be found in the present case, and yet it was held that because the transaction was one of pledge where the possession was given and taken independently of that document, although you might be obliged to have recourse to that document if there was a controversy about the terms of the advance, nevertheless you did not need to have recourse to the document for the purpose of establishing title. Now what is the distinction between that case and the present? None that I have heard, unless it be that in this case Charlesworth was not put in possession of the goods simultaneously with the signature of this document. If Charlesworth was not put in possession of these goods simultaneously with the signature of the document, it seems to me that the sheriff was never in possession. I am quite unable to accede to the argument that a possession which is sufficient possession to make good the title of the sheriff under his authority to seize, is not a possession as between the person giving it and the person taking it, which is the only point we have to decide in the present case. The question whether it is a possession which excludes the apparent possession of the other party might arise under the Act of 1878, but is not of the slightest importance in the present case. Is it a possession as between the person giving it and the person taking it? When once it is admitted, as it was inevitably admitted by the learned counsel for the respondent, that it was a possession sufficient as between those two persons to constitute a good pledge, it seems to me that the case is at an end. I say "inevitably admitted" because how can it be disputed that as between the two persons to the transaction it would have been impossible for the person who had received an advance on giving this possession to say that he had not given the other person a possession of the goods which would entitle him to hold them as a security for the advance? And that after all, is all that a pledge is.

Then, if that be so, it seems to me to show conclusively that the case is within Ex parte Hubbard, because what was there decided was that if the transaction be one only of pledge, arising from a delivery by one party to the other, of the possession of his goods as a security for the money advanced, it is immaterial that the terms upon which those goods are pledged are reduced to writing. It does not make it a bill of sale. The decision in Ex parte Hubbard seems to me to be absolutely conclusive of this case.

But even if this were not a pledge there is another possible view of it—namely, that the goods were delivered to Charlesworth in his capacity of auctioneer, to be held by him as auctioneer, with authority to sell them, and to retain out of the money which arose from that sale the advance which he had made. If that is really the true nature of the transaction—possibly even that, might be a pledge with an authority to sell—but supposing it is not, strictly speaking, a pledge, and that what I have stated is a more accurate description of the transaction, the same result would follow, it would be an authority to sell which would be irrevocable, except upon the terms of paying back the money; and it seems to me impossible to say that, because the document which was given in this case was given simultaneously with the entering into that transaction, it was a bill of sale in any sense in which those words are used within the definition clause of the Act of 1878.

For these reasons it seems to me that the case of Ex parte Hubbard really governs this case. I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, instead of seeing any reason to doubt the correctness of the decision in Ex parte Hubbard, I am very glad that that decision was arrived at—it has my hearty concurrence; and between that case and the present I can see no distinction.

Court of Appeal

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Oct. 31.

DAVIDSON v. CARLTON BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Bill of sale—Inventory or schedule therein referred to—Registration—Specific description of chattels—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, sub-section 2—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 4.

A bill of sale was given in respect of the furniture and other chattels in the grantor's house. The schedule annexed to the bill specified the furniture and other chattels in each room of the house. Under the heading "Study" was the item, "Eighteen hundred books, as per catalogue." The bill of sale and the schedule were registered, but not the catalogue. No evidence was given that there was any difficulty in identifying the books.

Held (affirming the judgment of Cave, J.), that the catalogue was not referred to in the bill of sale within the meaning of section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and that the non-registration of the catalogue did not, therefore, render the bill of sale void; and that the books were "specifically described" in the schedule within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Cave, J., at the trial of an interpleader issue without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the claimants under a bill of sale of goods taken in execution at the suit of the defendants. The bill of sale was given to secure money advanced to the grantor of the bill by the plaintiffs. At the date of the execution of the bill of sale, the bona fides of which transaction was not disputed, the grantor was possessed of furniture and other chattels, including certain books to the number of 1,800 volumes, which were in a study at the grantor's residence. The schedule to the bill of sale commenced with the following words, "The whole of the chattels at present at Westhoe Vicarage, and consisting, inter alia, of the following." The schedule then set out the furniture and other chattels contained in each room of the house. Under the head "Study" was the item "Eighteen hundred volumes of books, as per catalogue." There was a catalogue of the books in existence which had been made prior to the granting of the bill of sale, but this catalogue was not put in evidence at the trial.

There was no evidence of any extrinsic facts showing that there was any ambiguity in the description of the books assigned, or any difficulty in identifying the books referred to by the description in the schedule. The bill of sale and the schedule were registered, but not the catalogue.

At the trial it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the bill of sale was void as against them because the catalogue had not been registered, and it was also contended that as regards the books the bill of sale was inoperative because the books were not specifically described in the schedule. Cave, J., decided against the defendants on both points and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Willis, Q.C., and Colam, for the defendants.—First, the bill of sale was void because the catalogue of the books was not registered. Section 10, subsection 2, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, requires the registration of the bill, with every schedule or inventory thereto annexed or therein referred to. This catalogue was referred to in the schedule, and the effect of section 4 of the Act of 1882 is to make the schedule part of the bill of sale. Secondly, the bill of sale is inoperative as to the books, because they are not specifically described in the schedule: Carpenter v. Deen, 23 Q. B. D. 566, 38 W. R. Dig. 22; Witt v. Banner, 36 W. R. 115, 20 Q. B. D. 114. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—There is no evidence that there were more than 1,800 books in the study, and it was for the plaintiffs to show that the description in the schedule gave rise to ambiguity.]

Hickley v. Greenwood, 38 W. R. 686, 25 Q. B. D. 277, and Roberts v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 605, 13 Q. B. D. 794, were also referred to.

Reid, Q.C., and Simey, for the plaintiffs.—In Witt v. Banner Lord Esher, M.R., said, "The words 'specifically described' are used in section 4 of the Act of 1882 in connection with the word 'inventory,' which must mean an inventory in ordinary business parlance." This schedule was a sufficient inventory within that rule, and the catalogue was not required. [They were stopped by the court.]

Colam replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision of Cave, J., was right. A bill of sale was given by this clergyman on his goods, including, amongst other things, 1,800 volumes of books in his study. The schedule to the bill, under the head "Study," said "eighteen hundred volumes, as per catalogue." Are we to read that as meaning that he only gave such books as were described in the catalogue, or that he gave all the books in the study, and they were in the catalogue? Clearly the latter is the proper construction. It was his intention to give all his books, and they were, in fact, 1,800 in number. The words "as per catalogue" are mere description, and were not required. The inventory in the schedule is a proper inventory, and the books were sufficiently described for the purposes of identification. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The first objection to this bill of sale is that the catalogue ought to have been registered. The answer to that objection is that as the catalogue is not referred to in the bill, registration was not necessary. Another objection taken was that the description of the 1,800 volumes was not sufficiently specific to comply with section 4 of the Act of 1882. It is said that if it had been simply "eighteen hundred books," there would have been no difficulty, but that the addition of the words "as per catalogue" makes the description uncertain. In Carpenter v. Deen it was said by Cotton, L.J., that the meaning of the words "specifically described" is that there must be such a description in the schedule of the chattels described in the bill of sale as that they may be easily identified. In my opinion the words in this schedule entirely answer that requirement.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. With regard to the first point, the bill of sale is sharply distinguished from the schedule in section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and the inventory which that section says must be registered is an inventory referred to in the bill, and not in the schedule. Then, as to the second point, the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1882 is that the schedule must contain a description of the goods sufficient to identify them without reference to any other document at all. If it had been proved in this case that the books could only be identified by reference to the catalogue, then the description in the schedule would not be sufficient, but there is no evidence to that effect. In my opinion, the true meaning of the schedule is, all the books in the study, 1,800 in number. Further reference to the catalogue, therefore, was unnecessary to identify the books.

Appeal dismissed.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH INVESTMENT CO. v. BRUNTON. (a.)

Company—Debenture—Charge on all property, present and future—Clause restricting creation of prior charge—Subsequent mortgage of chose in action—Mortgagee without knowledge of contents of debentures—Notice of mortgage to debtor—Priority as between mortgagee and debenture-holders—Constructive notice.

The plaintiffs were applied to by the E. Corporation for a loan to be secured by a mortgage of certain insurance moneys due to the E. Corporation from a fire insurance office. The E. Corporation had issued a series of first mortgage debentures, whereby they charged their undertaking and all their property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. The debentures were to be a first charge on the property thereby charged, and the charge thereby created was to be a floating security, but so that the corporation were not be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge in priority thereto. During the negotiations for the loan the plaintiffs' solicitor, being informed that the corporation had issued debentures, asked the manager of the corporation whether the debentures were secured by any trust deed which covered the insurance moneys proposed to be mortgaged. The manager replied in the negative. The loan was advanced and the mortgage executed, and the plaintiffs gave notice thereof to the insurance office. The E. Corporation having gone into liquidation, and claims being made on the insurance moneys by the plaintiffs, and also by the defendant representing the debenture-holders, interpleader proceedings were instituted by the insurance office. At the trial the plaintiffs' solicitor said that at the time of the negotiations he had never seen or heard of debentures which prohibited the creation of any charge in priority thereto.

Held (affirming the judgment of Charles, J.), that the plaintiffs ought not to be fixed with constructive notice of the contents of the debentures, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs' claim against the insurance moneys ought to take priority over the claim of the debenture-holders.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 26.—The following judgment was read by Charles, J.:—This was an interpleader issue directed to try the right of the plaintiffs and the defendant respectively, to the sum of £1,834 15s. 4d., or some part thereof, which had been paid into court by the Sun Fire Insurance Co. to abide the event. The plaintiffs claimed so much of this amount as would be sufficient to satisfy their claim to a sum of £1,400 and interest lent by them on Friday, February 26, 1891, to the Electrical Engineering Corporation (Limited). The defendant, who represented the debenture-holders of the corporation, claimed the fund in court for them.

The Electrical Engineering Corporation was registered in January, 1890, with a capital of £150,000 in £5 shares. Power was given to the corporation "to borrow on any terms and conditions any sum or sums of money, and to mortgage and charge the undertaking and all or any part of the real and personal property, present or future, and all or any of the uncalled capital for the time being of the company, and to issue debentures, debenture stock, and mortgage debentures, payable to bearer or otherwise," and in the articles of association it was provided that the directors might, for the purpose of securing borrowed money and interest, "issue mortgage or other debentures, whether payable to bearer or otherwise . . . and charge or mortgage in any form the whole or any part of any property, funds, assets, or effects of the company, including after-acquired property and uncalled capital as a specific charge or floating security." In pursuance of these powers there were issued 200 "First Mortgage" debentures of £100 each prior to February 26, 1891, and on that day the moneys secured by these debentures were and still are due to the debenture-holders represented by the defendant.

The form of debenture, as far as is material, is as follows:—"No. —. £100. The Electrical Engineering Corporation (Limited) will, on the 15th of October, 1900, or on such earlier day as the principal moneys hereby secured become payable, according to the conditions hereof, pay to —— or other, the holder for the time being, on presentation and delivery of this debenture, the sum of £100, and will in the meantime pay interest on the said sum of £100 at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum by equal half-yearly payments, on the 1st day of January and the 1st of July in each year, or on such other day as the principal moneys hereby secured become payable, according to the conditions hereof. The corporation hereby charges with such payments its undertaking and all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future. This debenture is issued subject to the conditions indorsed hereon. Given under the common seal of the corporation this — day of ——, 189—. Conditions (1).—This debenture is one of a series of 200 debentures issued or about to be issued by the corporation. The debentures of the said series are all to rank pari passu as a first charge on the property hereby charged, without any preference or priority one over another, and the charge hereby created is to be a floating security, but so that the corporation is not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge in priority to the said debentures."

Early in the year 1891, further money being required for the purposes of the undertaking, Mr. Statter, the managing director, placed the matter in the hands of Messrs. Close & Co., solicitors, with the view of their finding a lender. They communicated on the 19th of February with Mr. Van Lauer, the manager of the plaintiffs. At this time there was coming due to the corporation from the Sun Fire Office a large sum upon a policy of insurance on the premises of the corporation at West Drayton, where a fire had recently taken place; and Mr. Jones, partner in the firm of Messrs. Close & Co., stated to Mr. Van Lauer that the corporation proposed to borrow on the security of the insurance moneys. Mr. Van Lauer said that he must be satisfied that his company would be absolutely secured, and thereupon Mr. Jones obtained from the secretary of the Sun Fire Office and handed to Mr. Van Lauer a letter in these terms:

"Dear Sir,—Electrical Engineering Co. (Limited). Referring to your call here to-day, I have to inform you that, although an examination of the estimate of loss is not complete, I am able to state that we have no doubt whatever that the sum which we shall finally have to pay to the claimants will very far exceed the sum of £2,000 which they are desirous of obtaining as an advance from your client. We have not received notice of any charge upon the loss money, nor do we know of any circumstances which will prevent an assignment of the amount due or of any part thereof being made."

This letter was forwarded to Mr. W. Paine, a member of the firm of Paine, Son, & Pollock, solicitors to the plaintiffs, with instructions to carry out the loan, which was to be of £1,900 (afterwards reduced to £1,400) for three months, with interest at the rate of 20 per cent., with a rebate if the advance was paid off earlier, and was to be secured by a charge on the claim against the Sun Fire Office.

On the 24th of February Mr. Paine saw Mr. Jones and discussed the subject. Mr. Paine, referring to the last sentence of the letter referred to, said to Mr. Jones, "I may take it from you that you are not aware of any dealings with this insurance." Mr. Jones said that he was not. He was aware, I may here state, of an unsuccessful attempt which had been made in the previous month through another solicitor to borrow money from another person, but he did not know that during the progress of the negotiations Mr. Statter had become fully alive to the difficulty of creating any charge on any part of the assets of the undertaking which should have priority over the debenture-holders. He did not, indeed, know of the existence of debentures at all until he received Mr. Statter's letter on the 24th of February, to which reference is made below. Mr. Paine also made some inquiry as to the borrowing powers of the company, and said he should wish to see the memorandum and articles of association. Jones went and fetched them, and later on the same afternoon brought also the Sun's covering note. Mr. Paine then engrossed the draft and sent it to Mr. Jones. On the 25th Messrs. Paine addressed an inquiry direct to the Sun Office, and received a reply that no notice had been received of any charges upon the moneys ultimately payable by the company to the corporation. In the afternoon the parties met to complete. There were present Mr. Jones, Mr. Statter, Mr. Scrutton, secretary of the corporation, and Mr. Paine. There was a direct conflict of evidence as to what then took place, but I do not feel any doubt that I ought to accept Mr. Paine's account as substantially accurate.

The letters from the secretary of the Sun Office were read, and so also was the letter from Mr. Statter to Mr. Jones's firm, Messrs. Close & Co., which was as follows:—"Since meeting Mr. Jones to-day I received a telegram from Mr. Van Busch (another director) asking me to write to you re capital of company. The subscribed capital is nearly £60,000, and of the debenture issue of £20,000, £14,500 are placed and the balance held as security for a loan of £5,000." Mr. Paine, on reading this letter, asked whether the debentures were secured by any trust deed which might cover the insurance to be assigned. Mr. Statter replied that they were not. "Nothing whatever," added Mr. Paine, "was said conveying to me in any way that there was anything in the debenture which could interfere with the security. . . . I am positive no form of debenture was produced." Mr. Statter, who was to some extent corroborated by Mr. Scrutton, declared that a form was produced, and, indeed, read; but after carefully considering the examination and cross-examination of these witnesses, I have come to the conclusion that no form was either shown to Mr. Paine or read, and that he received no notice of the existence of the debentures beyond that which he states. I think I ought to add that Mr. Statter, on the part of the company, practised, in my opinion, a reticence much to be regretted upon this occasion. I am unable to accept his assurance that it never struck him that the restrictive clause in the debenture materially affected the matter. The effect of that clause had been fully brought to his notice very shortly before, when the previous attempt to borrow had been made, and must, I think, have been present to his mind. The deed was then executed, but was not delivered, as some doubt had arisen as to the amount of the indebtedness which the Sun Office was ready to admit. The deed stated the amount to be £2,000, and the loan was to be £1,900 on that assumption; but on the following day Mr. Paine learnt from the secretary that £1,500 and no more could be then admitted, and accordingly that sum was, on the afternoon of the 26th, inserted in the deed, and the loan reduced to £1,400. In its altered form it was delivered to Mr. Paine.

The deed was made between the corporation and the plaintiffs as mortgagees, and after reciting the insurances by the mortgagors with the Sun Office, and that a claim had arisen entitling them to at least £1,500, and that they had applied to the mortgagees for a loan of £1,400, which the mortgagees had agreed to lend upon repayment being secured in the manner thereinafter appearing, proceeded to assign by way of security the insurances and all moneys payable or to become payable thereunder. The mortgagors were to repay the loan, with interest at the rate of 20 per cent., on the 26th of May then next, or, if they repaid it earlier, then 20 per cent. was to be charged up to the date of such repayment, and thenceforward until the 26th of May at the rate of 15 per cent. Upon payment of principal and interest the policies were to be reassigned.

At the interview between Mr. Jones and Mr. Paine at which the deed was handed over, Mr. Van Busch, another director of the corporation was present, and on Mr. Paine's again referring to Mr. Statter's letter of the 25th of February, added and signed the following postcript:—"With the exception of the above debentures there is no other loan." On the 27th of February, Messrs. Paine & Son gave notice of the agreement of the 26th of February to the Sun Office, and received an acknowledgment on the same day. Shortly after this date the defendant, on behalf of the debenture-holders, commenced an action against the corporation, in which a receiver and manager was on the 20th of March duly appointed. In April the corporation went into voluntary liquidation, and the receiver was appointed liquidator. On the 2nd of May a supervision order was made, and leave was given to continue the debenture-holders' action. On the 15th of June the receiver and manager gave notice to the Sun Fire Office and to the plaintiffs that the debenture-holders claimed the insurance moneys in priority to the plaintiffs. An action against the Sun Co. was shortly afterwards commenced by the defendants, and these interpleader proceedings followed, in which I have now to determine the question of priority between the parties.

It was suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that they had, even prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 6, a legal title; but it appears clear to me that, appart from the statute, their title was equitable and not legal, and they could not in their own name have maintained an action. By virtue of the 25th section, sub-section 6, they now can, no doubt, do so, although the assignment purports to be by way of charge only. See Tancred v. Delagoa Bay and East Africa Railway Co., 38 W. R. 15, 23 Q. B. D. 239. But their position is not thereby improved, for the sub-section expressly enacts that the assignee is to hold "subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this Act had not passed." I must, therefore, regard the question as one between two persons having equitable titles, both having a charge on the insurance fund, the title of the debenture-holder being first in point of time, but not perfected by notice to the insurance company until after the plaintiffs had given the company notice of their title, Now, there can be no doubt that, as a general rule, the giving of notice entitles the assignee who gives it to priority over a previous assignee who has not given notice. But it is said this rule does not apply between two equitable assignees, the first of whom holds a security in such a form as renders a notice by him practically impossible, but only between two successive assignees of a specific sum where each can give a notice if he pleases.

The foundation of the doctrine that he who gives the notice first has a better equity was said to be the negligence to be imputed to the assignee who fails to give the notice. See Ryall v. Rowles, 1 Ves. sen. 348; Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1; Loveridge v. Cooper, 3 Russ. 30; In re Freshfield's Trust, 11 Ch. D. 198. The mere failure to give it constitutes negligence; and it is equitable that the title of the assignee who is thus guilty of negligence should be postponed to that of him who uses diligence. Now, here it was pointed out that the debenture-holders were not in a position to give the Sun Fire Office a notice. Their charge was on the property of the corporation generally, they were not the assignees of the insurance fund specifically, and were, indeed, ignorant of its existence. No negligence could therefore be charged against them, and so it was contended that the doctrine of Dearle v. Hall and other cases referred to did not apply. But I do not think that this view of the rule is supported by authority. It is, in my opinion, the giving of the notice which creates the priority, see Foster v. Cockerell, 3 Cl. & Fin. 456; and if the former assignee is precluded from giving the notice either by contract with the assignor, as might often be the case, or by the nature of the charge which he holds, the same result should follow as in a case where a prior assignee has negligently omitted to give the notice which he might have given.

There does not appear to me to be any difference in principle between the case—(1) of a person who can give the notice and does not; (2) of a person who has contracted not to give it; and (3) of a person who, like the debenture-holder here, holds a security which, from its nature, prevents notice from being effectively given. In each case, I think, notice gives priority unless the giver of it himself has either actual notice of the prior incumbrance or else is in such a position and has such a degree of knowledge as is in equity equivalent to actual notice.

Now, in this case, Mr. Paine, it is not disputed, knew that the corporation had issued debentures, and it was proved that a debenture might, according to present usage, be in one of three forms—(1) it might be simply an acknowledgment of debt under seal; (2), and this is the more common form, it might be an instrument not only acknowledging the debt, but charging the property of the company issuing it with repayment; (3) it might be an instrument acknowledging the debt, charging the property of the company with repayment, and restricting the company from giving any prior charge. Either of the two first-named forms would not in any way affect the priority of the plaintiffs. A mere acknowledgment under seal of indebtedness would not avail against an assignee of a specific fund, and it was decided in Wheatley v. Silkstone and Haigh Moor Coal Co., 33 W. R. 797, 29 Ch. D. 715, that debentures in a form purporting to charge the property of the company with the debenture debts did not preclude the company from creating in the ordinary course, and for the purpose of their business, a charge in priority of the debenture-holders. It was, it would seem, in consequence of this decision that the third form of debenture was adopted, and both forms appear in Palmer's Precedents, ed. 1888. Mr. Paine had never, in fact, seen a debenture in the third form with the restrictive clause, and states that he had no suspicion after the interview of the 25th of February that the plaintiffs' security could be interfered with. All he knew was that debentures existed, and I think it must be taken that he did know that they were, at all events, in the form which had become usual in 1891—namely, that of a floating security on the property present or future of the undertaking. Mr. Paine ought to have insisted on seeing the debenture itself, when he would have discovered the restrictive clause, and the question in the cause really reduces itself to this: Was his failure to look at the debenture or to make further inquiry into its contents that sort of negligence which ought to deprive the plaintiffs of the priority which their notice otherwise conferred upon them?

The authorities cited on this part of the case were very numerous, and appear to establish the principle that the negligence which will deprive a person, who has done everything he can to complete his title, of priority must be gross or culpable—must, indeed, be such a wilful shutting of the eyes to inquiry as amounts to evidence of fraud: see Ware v. Lord Egmont, 3 W. R. 48, 4 De G. M. & G., at p. 473, and Montefiore v. Browne, 7 H. L. Cas. 241, 7 W. R. H. L. Dig. 5.

Now, applying this principle to the present case, I do not think that, having regard to what passed on the 25th of February, Mr. Paine can be held guilty of culpable negligence in not pursuing his inquiries further. Constructive notice of the restrictive clause cannot, on that ground, in my opinion, be imputed to him; and he ought not to be affected merely because he has omitted to do all which a cautious and prudent person might have done: Fisher on Mortgages, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 565. But it was also urged that actual notice of the existence of debentures was enough to affect Mr. Paine with constructive notice of their form and contents, and that I ought to apply the rule according to which a purchaser or lessee having notice of a deed forming part of the chain or title of his vendor or lessor is held to have constructive notice of the contents of that deed. There appears, however, to be a clear distinction between documents which must necessarily and those which may or may not affect title: see Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare, at p. 55, and Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353. To the latter class the rule is not applicable, and it is to this class that these debentures belong. In the result, then, I cannot impute constructive notice of the contents of the debentures to Mr. Paine, and my judgment must be, therefore, for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff advanced a sum of money to a trading corporation, took from them an assignment of a debt by way of mortgage, and gave notice thereof to the debtor. There were at the time debentures in existence, which, if he had had knowledge of their contents, would have prevented him in equity from claiming that his having given notice conferred on him priority over the debenture-holders. Had he such knowledge? In fact, he had not; that is admitted. He did not know that there were debentures which contained a clause preventing the creation of any mortgage or charge in priority thereto. It is said, however, that he had constructive knowledge of this. The doctrine of constructive knowledge, or constructive notice, is an equitable doctrine. There is an inference of fact known to common lawyers which comes very near it. If a man has knowledge of facts which point clearly to the existence of something which tells against him, and he wilfully shuts his eyes so as to avoid seeing that thing, an inference may be drawn that, though he never actually saw the thing, and was never expressly told of it, yet, in fact, he knew it. That is not constructive knowledge; it is an inference of actual knowledge. Constructive knowledge is a doctrine of equity which was not known to the common law, but has now to be adopted by the common law courts. The equity judges, after inventing the doctrine and putting it into shape, in later years saw that it was being carried further than had been intended, and they all agree in saying that it ought not to be extended any further. That the doctrine is a dangerous one, as being contrary to truth, has been pointed out in some of the cases. The foundation of the thing is that a man does not know, and yet is to be treated as if he did know.

We must consider the doctrine in the shape in which it is applicable to the present case. We have to deal with a mortgage of a debt given by a company, which had power to grant mortgages, and also had power to issue debentures. The person to whom this mortgage was offered knew that the company had power to issue debentures, and that they had issued some debentures. What he did not know, and what he wanted to know, was whether debentures had been issued which interfered with the validity of that which was offered to him. He asked this question of another person, who knew. But the answer was such as to deceive him. We have to apply the doctrine of constructive knowledge to these facts.

The doctrine is accurately stated in the note to Le Neve v. Le Neve, in Tudor's Leading Cases, vol. 2, p. 55: "Although, as we have already seen, where a party has notice of a deed, which from the nature of it must affect the property, or is told at the time that it does affect it, he is considered to have notice of the contents of that deed and of all other deeds to which it refers; nevertheless, where a party has notice of a deed which does not necessarily affect the property, and is told that, in fact, it does not affect it, but relates to some other property, and such party acts fairly in the transaction, believing the representation to be true, he will not be fixed with notice of the contents of the instrument."

Now, if it would be unreasonable to suppose that the instrument in question did not affect the property, then I think it "must affect" it within the meaning of this proposition. If it be an instrument which may or may not affect the property, then it "does not necessarily affect" it within the meaning of the proposition. This is in accordance with what was said by Lord Lyndhurst in Jones v. Smith, 1 Ph. 244. The proposition was considered and dealt with by Jessel, M.R., in Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353. The distinction is between a deed which must necessarily, in the sense I have stated, affect the property, and a deed which may or may not affect it. If the intending mortgagee has notice of a deed of such a class that it would be unreasonable to suppose it would not affect the mortgage for which he is negotiating, he ought not to accept a statement that, in fact, it does not affect it; if he has notice of a deed of such a sort that it may or may not affect the mortgage, he is entitled to accept a statement that, in fact, it does not affect it.

Now, were debentures issued by such a company as this deeds of such a nature that they must necessarily have affected the proposed mortgage, or were they deeds of such a nature that they might or might not have affected it? According to the evidence which was given in the court below, there are three classes of debentures in existence. Debentures of the first class do not affect title to property at all, and, therefore, would not have affected this transaction. Debentures of the second class would not have affected it. It was only debentures of the third class which could have affected it. I think Charles, J., was right in saying that when the mortgagee was told there were debentures, that was a statement that there was something which might or might not affect his title to the property proposed to be mortgaged. He was further told that they did not affect it. Under these circumstances constructive notice would not have been attributed to him in equity, and therefore must not be attributed to him by us. I think the judgment of Charles, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Of the three forms in which debentures are drawn, the first is a simple admission of debt, and does not contain anything to charge property. A debenture in the second form contains something which purports to charge property, but does not create any priority; this has now become a very common form of debenture. The third form is that in which the present debentures were drawn. Mr. Paine did not know in what form these debentures were drawn. He knew there were debentures, but he did not know there were debentures which charged the property of the company, though I think he must be taken to have known there were debentures which might charge the property of the company. He certainly neither knew nor thought there was anything in the debentures which could prejudice his client's security. For debentures in the first form would not affect property at all, debentures in the second form would not create any priority, and as to the third form he did not know that such a form existed. He inquired whether the debentures were secured by any trust deed which covered the debt proposed to be mortgaged. He couched his inquiry according to his limited knowledge, the result being that he asked the wrong question; and he was answered by the card. He honestly understood that there was nothing outstanding which could affect the security.

We have to apply to this state of facts the law as to constructive notice. I agree with the Master of the Rolls as to the necessity of resisting any extension of the doctrine of constructive notice. I think it is a doctrine which is not to be run to death. In Jones v. Smith Lord Lyndhurst was dealing with documents affecting landed estates. He said, "The question, therefore, resolves itself into this, whether when a party is informed of the existence of an instrument which may, but which does not necessarily, affect the property he is about to purchase, or upon which he is about to advance money, and it is at the same time stated that the instrument does not affect that property, but relates to some other property, whether if he acts fairly and honestly, and believes that statement to be true, but it turns out in the result that he is misled, and that the instrument does relate to the property, he is under such circumstances to be fixed with notice of the contents of the instrument." He then proceeds to state the principle of law: "Undoubtedly where a party has notice of a deed, which from the nature of it must affect the property, or is told at the time that it does affect it, he is considered to have notice of the contents of that deed, and of all other deeds to which it refers. But where a party has notice of a deed which does not necessarily — which may or may not — affect the property, and is told that in fact it does not affect it, but relates to some other property, and the party acts fairly in the transaction, and believes the representation to be true, there is no decision which goes the length of saying that, if he is misled, he is fixed with notice of the instrument." When we pass from landed property to choses in action, it is at least worthy of consideration whether we should not express the rule thus: "Where a party has notice of a deed which from the nature of it must affect his security, or his title to that which he is purchasing, he is considered to have notice of the deed." If that be the right way of expressing the rule with regard to the subject-matter with which we have to deal, this case becomes clear, because the debentures would not from their nature necessarily affect the plaintiffs' security, or their title to that which they were purchasing. But whether that be so or not, we can deal with this case under the second part of the rule. I assume that when the rule is applied to choses in action the words "may or may not" refer to such reasonable probability as would regulate the action of a reasonable person in the affairs of life. Lord Lyndhurst's proposition, then, is, that where a person knows there is a deed which a prudent man would honestly and reasonable think might or might not affect the property, and is told that in fact it does not affect it, and believes that representation to be true, he is not fixed with notice of its contents. Perhaps in applying the doctrine to the case of a chose in action it is not necessary that the person should be told that the deed does not affect the property. I am inclined to think that possibly it might be sufficient, if he did not know or honestly think, and if it was reasonable that he should not know or honestly think, that the deed was one which must affect his security. But I will assume that the entire doctrine laid down by Lord Lyndhurst is to be applied to the present subject-matter. I think it is clear that the plaintiffs' solicitor must have known that the debentures were instruments which might or might not affect the property of the company, but that he certainly did not know that they would probably affect his clients' security. And further he was told, and it was reasonable for him to believe, that there was nothing in them which could affect the security. I am of opinion that the appeal must fail.

In re VINCE.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Advance to person in business—Interest varying with profits—Allowance to be made on inability to pay agreed interest by reason of deficiency of profits—Agreement void for uncertainty—Right to prove for money lent—Partnership Act, 1890, ss. 2 (3) (d), 3—28 & 29 Vict. c. 86 (Bovill's Act), ss. 1, 5.

By an agreement between A. and B., which recited that a statement of account signed by A., showing the credits and liabilities of his business, was the basis of the proposal thereinafter made, and that B. had agreed to advance A. the sum of £4,500, it was provided that, in consideration of the said sum paid to A. by B., A. would punctually pay interest on the same by two regular half-yearly payments of £462 10*s. for every half-year; and that, in case A. should be unable to pay any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of* £4,500 by reason of the deficiency of the profits of A., then and upon every such occasion a due allowance should be made by B. to A. in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner.

In pursuance of this agreement the sum of £4,500 was advanced by B. to A. Subsequently A. was adjudicated a bankrupt, and B. tendered a proof for the amount of his loan, which was rejected, on the ground that it was an advance to a person in business on a contract that the lender should receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, and that, by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86 (Bovill's Act), s. 5, B. was postponed to the other creditors.

Held, that there was nothing in the agreement to show how the allowance in respect of interest was to be calculated; that, as the agreement showed that some allowance was contemplated, and the intention was expressed in such vague terms that no allowance could have been enforced, the whole agreement was void for uncertainty; consequently, the loan was outside Bovill's Act altogether, and B. was entitled to prove for the amount with the other creditors.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (40 W. R. 428) reversed.

(a.) Reported by JOHN P. MELLOR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Collins, JJ.) setting aside an order made in the bankruptcy of John Vince by the county court judge sitting at Norwich, which order directed that the proof of Dudley Baxter should rank for dividend with the claims of the other creditors against the estate.

By an agreement between John Vince and Dudley Baxter, which recited, as the basis of the proposal thereinafter made, a statement signed by Vince of the credits and liabilities of his business at that date, Baxter agreed to advance to Vince £4,500, and Vince agreed to pay interest on the same by two half-yearly payments of £462 10s. for every half-year; and that "in case John Vince should be unable to pay unto Dudley Baxter any portion of the half-yearly payments upon any part of the said sum of £4,500, by reason of the deficiency of the profits of John Vince, then and upon every such occasion a due allowance shall be made by Dudley Baxter to John Vince in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner."

The sum of £4,500 was advanced by Baxter to Vince, and Vince was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt.

The trustee rejected Baxter's claim to prove with the other creditors, on the ground that his advance to Vince came within section 5 of Bovill's Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 86), and consequently was postponed till the other claims had been satisfied. This decision was reversed by the county court judge, but restored by the Divisional Court.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Eversley, for the appellant.—The court below have construed this agreement as if inability to pay by reason of the deficiency of the profits was equivalent to inability to pay out of the profits. But the words "out of the profits" ought not to be read into the agreement. It was never intended that an allowance should be made in respect of the agreed interest every half-year that the profits fell below some undisclosed standard. The whole of the £462 10s. was to be paid every six months unless there should be a total inability on the debtor's part to pay it. This is not a contract for a rate of interest varying with the profits, but for a fixed rate of interest with an undertaking by the creditor to make some allowance in respect of the interest if the debtor, by reason of the falling off of his business, should be without the means to pay the whole of it. Moreover, there is no standard in this agreement by which the allowance in respect of interest is to be calculated.

They cited Ex parte Mills, In re Tew, 21 W. R. 557, L. R. 8 Ch. 569; Manby v. Gresham Life Assurance Co., 9 W. R. 547, 29 Beav. 439.

M. Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—This is an agreement for a rate of interest varying with the profits within Bovill's Act and the Partnership Act, 1890. It is immaterial that the interest is only to vary by way of reduction. The interest is fixed at a high rate corresponding to the largest amount of profits that it was thought that the business could make, and that rate is to be reduced in proportion as the profits fall below the highest possible. [Lord ESHER, M.R.—That is assuming that the interest was, under this agreement, to be paid out of profits, and that inability to pay any portion of the interest by reason of the deficiency of the profits means inability to pay out of the profits. Unless words that are not in the agreement are read into it Bovill's Act does not apply.] The terms of the agreement show that this was an investment of £4,500 in the business, and that the interest was to come out of the profits. There would be no difficulty in ascertaining what due allowance should be made when there was a deficiency in the profits. As the contemplated profits were to the actual profits in any given year, so would £925 be to the interest to be paid in that year. Vaughan Williams, J., in his judgment in the court below, said that there was no reason why the contemplated profit should not be ascertained. His words were: "Then if the court should be of opinion that the non-payment was due to the falling off in the profits, it seems to me the court would have been able to take the further step of fixing what was the proper reduction. No doubt in order to do so one would have to ascertain what were the circumstances at the time when the agreement was first entered into, or what was the rate of net profit which was expected by the parties at the moment when the agreement was entered into. I do not see why the court should not do this, and I do not see why, for the purpose of our present decision, we are bound to quantify that factor which would be one of the factors of the rule of three sum which necessarily would have to be done."

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the appellant, who is a creditor in the bankruptcy of John Vince, has lent a sum of £4,500 to the bankrupt, and desires to prove for that sum in the bankruptcy. The answer which is made to his claim is that he has entered into an agreement with regard to the loan of the money in such terms that it is within the provisions of Bovill's Act, and that consequently he is not entitled to recover any portion of his principal until the claims of the other creditors have been satisfied. That raises the question whether the agreement, upon the true construction of it, has brought this loan within the terms of Bovill's Act. The court has, therefore, to construe this agreement; but, in order to come to a conclusion whether it is within the Act by reason of the rate of interest varying with the profits, they must find some measure agreed upon in the instrument by which to ascertain what is meant by a deficiency in the profits, and in what respects the rate of interest is to vary. I am of opinion that the agreement is worded so artificially and so mysteriously that it is impossible to know what the provisions as to the rate of interest mean. If I cannot attach any definite meaning to those provisions so as to ascertain whether the agreement comes within Bovill's Act, I certainly could not treat it as coming within that Act. But I think that we must treat this agreement as being too vague to be a binding one in any respect. If that is so, the creditor has lent this money and it must be repaid in the ordinary way; he is, therefore, entitled to prove for the amount. I will read from a book that has been handed to me the principle on which we decide this case: "A promise must be reasonably certain; and if the parties have expressed the matter of their agreement in such uncertain or imperfect terms that it is impossible to ascertain any definite meaning, the agreement is necessarily void; for 'in every deed there must be such a degree of moral certainty as to leave in the mind of a reasonable man no doubt of the intent of the parties'" (Leake on the Law of Contracts, 3rd ed., p. 591, citing Tenterden, C.J., in Coles v. Hulme, 8 B. & C. 573).

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion; and were it not for our established practice, when differing from the court below, to give our reasons individually, I should not add anything to what the Master of the Rolls has said. The question is, Whether this is the case of a loan on a contract that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits? If it is such a case, then the Partnership Act, 1890, applies, and the lender is postponed to the other creditors of the borrower upon his insolvency. The question whether this is money lent upon such an agreement depends upon the construction of the particular agreement. There is really no law to be laid down in this case, except that which is stated in the passage which the Master of the Rolls has read. Primarily, it is a question as to the construction of a particular provision with regard to the payment of interest contained in an agreement. A fixed sum is to be paid each half-year for interest; but if there should be inability to pay any portion of the sum by reason of the deficiency of the profits, upon every such occasion due allowance is to be made in respect of the same in a fair and reasonable manner. If we came to the conclusion that there was a standard in the agreement by which the measure of a due allowance and a reasonable manner was to be fixed, then we should have to determine the difficult question whether such a provision was within Bovill's Act at all. It seems to me, however, that there is nothing in this agreement by which a reasonable person could arrive at the standard rate of profits by which the allowance is to be measured. Are you to take as your standard rate the actual profits for the half-year previous to the advance being made, or the £462 10s., or the amount of profits expected in future by the parties at the date of the agreement? I think the last was the one finally accepted by Mr. Mackenzie, and also adopted by the court below. I cannot myself see that the agreement points to one more than to another. But if the last is taken it is a measure that is so uncertain, so absolutely incapable of being even approximately fixed, that it would make the operation of the provision as to an allowance a mere matter of chance. Pearce v. Watts, 23 W. R. 771, L. R. 20 Eq. 492, shows that where that is so, where there is a reservation which is too vague to be given effect to, the whole agreement becomes void. Even if this provision as to an allowance being made when there is an inability to pay could be cut adrift, it would cut adrift the only clause that could bring this agreement within Bovill's Act, But, in my opinion, you cannot cut adrift that provision, and the agreement is void for uncertainty. Then Bovill's Act only applies to agreements that the law recognizes; it cannot apply to void agreements. Consequently the appellant is entitled to have his money returned, and is, therefore, entitled to prove for it. The court below have held that inability to pay the agreed interest by reason of the deficiency of the profits means inability to pay out of the profits. On that point I say nothing. They have also held that the allowance to be made in respect of profits when such an inability arose was to be calculated with reference to the amount of the profits which in the expectation of the parties at the time of the agreement the business would have realized. If that was so it is too uncertain a basis of calculation to have entitled the borrower to enforce an allowance upon that footing. But there is nothing in the agreement to show that the factor upon which the allowance is to be based is the amount of profit in the expectation of the parties at the time of the agreement.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—If this agreement had contained some mode of measuring the allowance to be made in case of a deficiency of profits, I should have been of the same opinion as the Divisional Court, that this was an agreement with the bankrupt that the appellant should receive a rate of interest varying with the profits of the bankrupt's business, and consequently was within Bovill's Act. But when the question comes to be argued as to the basis on which the allowance in respect of interest is to be assesssed, it becomes impossible to ascertain what that basis is to be. The more the question is discussed the more difficult it is to see what is to be the measure of the allowance. The learned judges in the court below were not agreed upon that point. Vaughan Williams, J., thought that the due allowance could be ascerained by measuring the profits actually made with the profits contemplated at the time the agreement was entered into. Collins, J., on the other hand, seems to have thought that the amount of the allowance was to be calculated by comparing the amount of the profit made with the amount fixed by the agreement as the normal interest. In his argument here Mr. Mackenzie finally rested on the former view as to the construction of the agreement, saying, as Vaughan Williams, J., did, that the measure was to be the profit contemplated by the parties at the time of the agreement. If that measure is adopted I cannot see how there could be any possibility of ascertaining from this agreement what the parties contemplated that the future profits of the business would be. In my opinion, therefore, this provision as to an allowance in respect of interest is too uncertain to have been enforced, and I quite agree with what Bowen, L.J., has said, that if that provision can be cut adrift and the rest of the agreement left standing, the only clause that could bring this agreement within Bovill's Act is taken out of it.

In re CARTER. (a.)

Tenant for life—Remaindermen—Income in specie—Discretion in trustees to retain—Rule as to wasting securities—Originating summons—Practice.

Where the trustees of a will held freehold and leasehold estate in trust for sale, with power to postpone at discretion,

Held, that the words of the will were insufficient to entitle the tenant for life to enjoy in specie the income arising from the leaseholds prior to sale.

Semble, in an originating summons the court will not, at the instance of the respondent, decide a point not raised by the plaintiff taking out the summons.

Adjourned summons.

A testator by his will, after various specific bequests of personalty, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to, at their discretion, sell, convert, and invest such parts of his real and personal estate as were "not thereinafter specifically devised and bequeathed," with power, at their discretion, to continue his business of pawnbroker as long as they should think fit. He directed his trustees to pay the rents, profits, and income of all his real and personal estate "not thereinbefore directed to be sold," and also the interest, dividends, and income of the moneys to arise from the sale of such property as was "directed to be sold," and of the stocks, shares, and securities in which the same might be invested, to his wife during widowhood, and that upon the death or remarriage of his wife his trustees should stand possessed of the whole of his real and personal estate, "both that which might then be converted" and that which might "then be unconverted," upon certain trusts, as to specific freeholds; leaseholds, and annuities, in favour of his children nominatim, with remainder over. He further directed that as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of his real and personal estate "not otherwise thereinbefore specifically disposed of," his trustees should forthwith sell and dispose of the same unless previously sold and converted under the power thereinbefore contained, and invest the proceeds and stand possessed of the same upon the trusts thereinafter declared.

By an order in chambers it was declared that the trustees held the real and personal property of the testator (other than what was specifically devised and bequeathed by the will) upon trust for sale with a discretion as to the time of sale of any part thereof.

Upon this arose the main question whether the tenant for life was entitled to enjoy in specie the income of unconverted estate held on trust for sale.

C. Lyttelton Chubb, for the tenant for life.—I am entitled to income in specie. In re Laing, 14 W. R. 328, L. R. 1 Eq. 416, places this beyond a doubt as to freeholds, and the general scheme of the will shows sufficiently the intention with regard to leaseholds. Testator gives income of freeholds and leaseholds specifically devised and bequeathed to his widow, also she is to have the income of realty on trust for sale (In re Laing), and the testator obviously did not intend the leaseholds on trust for sale to be dealt with in a different manner to the rest of the property: In re Thomas, 40 W. R. 75, [1891] 3 Ch. 482; In re Chancellor, 32 W. R. 465, 26 Ch. D. 42.

A. W. M. Baillie, for the remaindermen.—Here there is no such expression of intention as was laid down in In re Thomas to be necessary in order that the tenant for life may enjoy in specie the income until sale.

He cited Brown v. Gellatly, 15 W. R. 1188, L. R. 2 Ch. 751, and also referred to the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in In re Chancellor, at p. 45 of 26 Q. B. D.

KEKEWICH, J.—In my opinion the language in this will is not sufficient to justify the widow enjoying in specie the income of the unconverted leaseholds. I may not guess at the testator's intentions. Probably he did intend her to have it, but, if so, he has not expressed his intention. There is nothing here whatever to justify me in saying that he has done so. He has divided his property into two classes: (1) "All my property not hereinafter specifically bequeathed"; (2) "All my property not hereinbefore directed to be sold." Why he has used long phrases and those not convenient I do not know, but it is plain that property "hereinbefore directed to be sold" is all his property "not specifically bequeathed," and property "specifically bequeathed" is "property not directed to be sold."

He has directed that the one part should be sold, and has given the trustees a discretion as to the time of sale, but he has not said that his widow is to be entitled to the income until sale. What he has said is that she is to have the income of the proceeds of sale, and it seems to me that as far as there is any expressed intention there is no gift of income until sale.

Abundant cases show that in the case of real property, where a sale is directed, with discretion to postpone, this discretion is given not for the convenience of persons but of the estate; and, therefore, the tenant for life may have the income, and the trustees may not postpone the enjoyment of any object of the trusts.

Then comes in the rule of law with regard to wasting property, to the effect that you must adopt a rule of thumb and give the tenant for life a fair equivalent only proportioned to his interest in the whole—that is to say, you calculate the value of the property and give him a fixed rate of interest thereon.

Both these doctrines apply in the present case. The tenant for life is entitled to enjoy the income in specie of the real estate until sale, but with regard to the leaseholds they are governed by the rule of law to which I have just referred.

Bramwell Davis asked for a declaration, in answer to question (2) of the summons, that the tenant for life was entitled to 4 per cent. on the capital value as at the death of the testator.

A. W. M. Baillie.—The declaration should be as at, and from the death of the testator.

KEKEWICH, J.—That would be raising a question which the trustees do not ask. All the court has to do on this summons is to answer questions raised by the trustees. It is open to the remaindermen to raise this question hereafter.

Solicitor, Arthur B. Chubb.

Q. B. Div. (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.) Nov. 3, 4.

GOSLING v. GREEN. (a.)

Shipping — Thames Conservancy — Bye-laws — Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 133), bye-law 99—Thames Conservancy Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113), bye-law 36.

By the 99th bye-law under the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, if the master, &c., of any steam vessel navigated on the Thames within a certain district "shall not (when practicable) remain, continue, and be on one of the paddle-boxes or on the bridge" of such vessel, or on the deck cabin adjoining, "or shall not cause and procure a proper look-out to be kept from the bow" of such vessel, he shall incur a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

By the 36th bye-law made under the Thames Conservancy Act, 1864, the master of every steam vessel navigating the river shall be and remain on one of the paddle-boxes or bridge, "and shall cause a proper look-out to be kept from the said vessel."

The appellant, the master of a steamboat, was convicted and fined for not having caused a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of the vessel, contrary to bye-law 99 of the first-mentioned Act.

Held (affirming the conviction), that the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, and the Thames Conservancy Act, 1864, being intended to be read together, the bye-laws under the latter Act did not supersede generally those made under the former, and that the provisions in question of bye-law 99 of the former Act were not inconsistent with bye-law 36 of the latter, and remained, therefore, in force.

Case stated by Mr. De Rutzen, metropolitan police magistrate.

A summons was taken on the 17th of June, 1891, by Harry Gosling under the 99th bye-law of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Amendment Act, 1859, against George Green, charging that on the 17th of June, 1892, between Southwark Bridge and Westminster Bridge, he, being the master or person in charge of the steamboat Rifleman, did navigate the same without causing a proper look-out to be kept from the bow of such vessel, contrary to the bye-law.

The summons was heard on the 29th of June, 1892, and the 6th of July, and it was then contended by counsel for the defendant that the bye-law 99 of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Act, 1859, was bad as being inconsistent with the bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy made under the Act of 1864. The learned magistrate found as a fact that there was no person in the bow of the vessel on the day charged in the summons. He convicted the defendant and fined him five shillings and three guineas costs, but stated a case for the opinion of the court, which now came on to be argued.

J. P. Grain, for the appellants.

Horace Avory, for the respondents.

The nature of the argument, which turned upon the construction of the Act of Parliament and bye-laws, sufficiently appears from the judgment.

POLLOCK, B.—This is an appeal upon a case stated by Mr. De Rutzen, a metropolitan police magistrate, and is a case of a summons under the 99th bye-law of the Watermen's and Lightermen's Act, 1859, charging the appellant with navigating a steam vessel called The Rifleman without a proper look-out in the bow. It was found as a fact that there was no person in the bow. The question of law which we have to determine is whether that bye-law is still valid. It was made in pursuance of the Watermen's Act, 1859. [The learned judge read the bye-law, and continued:—] There are two things required by it. First, the master is to remain on the bridge, and, secondly, he is to cause a proper look-out to be kept from the bow.

Now it is obvious that that was passed with the double intention of protecting the persons on the river, and also of pointing out how that protection is to be arrived at. But now comes the bye-law 36 of the Thames Conservancy, made under the power of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1864. That bye-law does not provide for a man to be kept in the bow, but for a "proper" look-out, and that might possibly be held to be kept by one man. Does this provision thus far repeal the bye-law under the Watermen's Act? They go together up to a certain point, and then the earlier one requires an additional look-out. I need hardly state so well known a proposition that where a new regulation of a new statute deals with an old statute it is no repeal of the older one unless it is inconsistent. I can hardly say that they are inconsistent here. It was pressed by Mr. Grain that it would be curious if two sets of provisions dealt with the navigation and look-out on the Thames. But the matter is really answered for this reason, that, by the Thames Conservancy Act, the Watermen's Company's Act was dealt with and limited in a series of sections, in one of which (58) it is provided that the two Acts are to be read as one. But bye-law 99 of the earlier

Act was not dealt with, and the clear intention of the Thames Conservancy Act being to leave that Act unaltered, except so far as it affected it, we think it follows that the conviction was right, and must be affirmed.

Parliament — Registration of voters — Lodger claim— Description of qualification—Mistake—Power to amend —Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), s. 28, sub-sections 2, 13.

Where, in a lodger claim, the character of the qualification is misdescribed, but the revising barrister is satisfied that the misdescription is the result of a mistake, and that the qualification, upon the facts, is sufficient, he may amend the claim under sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Registration Act of 1878; and sub-section 13 of the same section, which means that a person claiming in respect of one qualification may not prove for another and distinct qualification, does not apply to prevent the correction.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the revising barrister for the city of Exeter to state a case.

At the revision of the register of voters held in September last certain lodger claims were objected to by Baker on the ground of informality. The revising barrister amended and allowed the claims, and in answer to the application for an order upon him to state a case made a statement to the court which disclosed the following facts:—

Objection was taken to seven lodger claims on the ground that the declaration was not in the form required by the Registration Order, 1889, Schedule 3, Form H., No. 2.

The informality alleged was that in six of the claims the qualification was stated to be the sole use of a bed room "with joint use of dining room and sitting room," and the occupation in the declaration as being "partly sole and partly joint."

Objection was also taken to a seventh lodger claim on the ground that, being for a joint occupation the value stated was £10, whereas it ought to have been £20.

In answer to these objections it was alleged in support of the claims that in the first six cases the claims and declarations had been filled up under a misapprehension as to what facts were necessary to be stated to complete the qualifications; and in the seventh the claim for a "joint" occupation had been made upon a form of claim for a "sole" occupation, and the value stated had been left at £10 instead of being altered to £20.

It was further objected before the revising barrister that he had no power to amend these claims.

The barrister, however, having satisfied himself as to the facts, held that in each of the cases a "mistake" had been made, which, under sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Registration Act, 1878, he had power to amend. He therefore amended in the first six cases by striking out of the claims and declarations all mention of joint occupation, and in the seventh by altering the value stated from £10 to £20. A rule nisi for a mandamus was subsequently obtained and now came on to be argued.

Section 28 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 26), provides that the revising barrister shall have the powers enumerated in the sub-sections, and in sub-section (2) that "he shall correct any mistake which is proved to him to have been made in any list."

Sub-section (13) is as follows: "Except as herein provided, and whether any person is objected to or not, no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list or claim, as the case may be, nor shall the revising barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same."

J. A. Foote, for the voters, showed cause.—Here all the revising barrister did in each case was to correct a misdescription to make the claim accord with the true facts, which showed that the qualification was good. Such a "correction" of a bonâ fide mistake was not within sub-section 13, which only meant that the revising barrister might not amend a claim for one qualification so as to allow it in respect of a different one. The question of mistake was one of fact for the revising barrister.

He cited Ainslie v. Nicholson, 24 Q. B. D. 144, 38 W. R. Dig. 74.

J. V. Austin, in support of the rule.—It is admitted that in the seventh case the revising barrister had power to amend by altering the amount from £10 to £20. With regard to the others, it is sufficient for the purposes of the rule to show that there is primâ facie a question to be argued. What was done in these cases was to alter the "description" or nature of the qualification. It is conceded that under section 28, sub-section 2, of the Registration Act of 1878 the revising barrister has power to correct mistakes, but that sub-section is controlled by sub-section 13, which provides that "no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that described." That sub-section provides in effect, and the Court of Appeal have held, that there is no power to the revising barrister to make a change in the nature of the qualification: Foskett v. Kaufmann, 34 W. R. 90, 16 Q. B. D. 279. The claims made here for joint and sole occupation were either for a mixed qualification, unknown to the law and unwarranted by statute, or they were for alternatives of joint and sole occupations, and, therefore, bad as ambiguous between franchises which are entirely distinct, given by different statutes, and unprovided for by any form.

POLLOCK, B.—I think this rule must be discharged. It is clear that the court should not be too astute in picking holes in anything done by the revising barrister within his powers.

The first observation which is to be made is, that in so far as the correction of a mistake under sub-section 2 of section 28 of the Act of 1878 is based on a finding of fact, the court will not interfere where the element of intention in a question of mistake was a question of fact for the revising barrister, who has here found as a fact that there was a mistake in each of these cases. The second observation which I will make is, that it must not be supposed that we are not giving full effect to sub-section 13 of the same section. That section means that a person who claims in respect of a given qualification must not give evidence of another: he must not, for example, claim in respect of building A. and give evidence of building B. In

Foskett v. Kaufmann that was the sort of mischief dealt with, and that decision was necessary to give a proper construction of the Act. But where, as in the present cases, a person has misdescribed the character of his qualification, that objection does not apply. The revising barrister, having found that there was a mistake of this nature, had, therefore, power to amend in each case, and the rule must be discharged with costs.

MUNRO, Petitioner.
BALFOUR, Respondent.
MANCHESTER (EASTERN DIVISION) ELECTION PETITION. (a.)

Parliament—Election petition—Scrutiny—Particulars—Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868, rr. 6, 7.

The respondent in a parliamentary election petition, in which the petitioner claims the seat on grounds for a scrutiny, is not entitled to obtain particulars under rule 6 of the Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868. Rule 7 applies exclusively to such a case.

Appeal of the respondent, the Right Honourable Arthur James Balfour, against the refusal of Pollock, B., to order the petitioner, Mr. Joseph Edwin Crawford Munro, to deliver certain particulars.

The petitioner presented a petition against the return of the respondent at the parliamentary election for the eastern division of the borough of Manchester. Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4a, and 5 of the petition alleged that the respondent, by agents acting on his behalf, was guilty of bribery, treating, undue influence, and other illegal practices during the election, and that the election and return of the respondent were thereby rendered null and void. Paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 10a, and 11 alleged that many persons who voted at the election for the respondent were guilty of bribery, treating, undue influence, voting twice, and personation, or were disqualified by legal incapacity from voting; that the votes of all such persons ought to be struck off the poll; that the petitioner received a majority of the votes of electors duly qualified to vote, and was duly elected as a member to serve in Parliament for the borough, and ought to have been returned as such member.

The respondent took out a summons for the petitioner to deliver particulars (1) of the names and addresses of the agents of the respondent alleged in paragraphs 1-5 of the petition to have been guilty of the various acts of corruption, and the dates, nature, and character of such acts; (2) of the names and numbers on the register of the persons alleged in paragraphs 6-11 to have been guilty of such illegal practices that their votes ought to be struck off the poll, and the dates, places, and nature of all such illegal practices.

Pollock, B., ordered the petitioner to deliver the particulars asked for with regard to paragraphs 1-5 of the petition, but refused to order the particulars asked for as to the latter part of the petition.

The respondent appealed against this refusal.

Rule 6 of the Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1868, is as follows:—Evidence need not be stated in the petition, but the court or a judge may order such particulars as may be necessary to prevent surprise and unnecessary expense, and to insure a fair and effectual trial in the same way as in ordinary proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division, and upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as may be ordered.

Rule 7.—When a petitioner claims a seat for an unsuccessful candidate alleging that he had a majority of lawful votes, the party complaining of or defending the election or return shall, six days before the day appointed for trial, deliver to the master, and also at the address, if any, given by the petitioners and respondent, as the case may be, a list of the voters intended to be objected to, and of the heads of objection to each such vote, and the master shall allow inspection and office copies of such lists to all parties concerned; and no evidence shall be given against the validity of any vote, nor upon any head of objection not specified in the list, except by leave of the court or judge, upon such terms, as to amendment of the list, postponement of the inquiry, and payment of costs, as may be ordered.

Danckwerts, for the respondent.—This is an application under rule 6, not rule 7. The latter rule does apply to cases of scrutiny, but the object of it is to provide information for the court as to the nature of the case. Rule 6, which is quite independent of rule 7, also applies to cases of scrutiny, and under it we are entitled to receive, ten days before trial, the particulars which we ask for: The Salford Petition, 19 L. T. N. S. 502; The Guildford Petition, 19 L. T. N. S. 528.

Coward, for the petitioner, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this application must be refused. The petition first claims that the election of the respondent was void on the ground of bribery by his agents. That is an object to which rule 6 applies, and as to that portion of the petition the respondent has obtained the particulars which he requires. The petition then goes on to claim the seat for the petitioner, because it is alleged that the respondent's majority was gained by a number of votes being given for him which were disqualified or various reasons. It is admitted that rule 7 applies directly to a case of a scrutiny such as this, and it seems to me to be a very plain enactment of the Legislature to the effect that in the case of a scrutiny the petitioner must specify each vote that he attacks, and also state the ground of objection to it, and he is not to be allowed to give evidence as to any other ground of objection. It has been argued, however, that rule 7 does not limit rule 6, that rule 6 is general in its terms, and is to be applied to cases which would also come under rule 7. The effect of that would be to wipe out rule 7 entirely, because every case would come under rule 6, and there would, therefore, be no use for rule 7. I think that the true construction of these two rules is that rule 6 applies to all cases not under rule 7, but that as to these latter rule 7 is exclusive. This case comes under rule 7. The case of The Salford Petition is not in point here, because, although that was a case in which a scrutiny only was claimed, yet the petitioner also asked that the election might be declared void if, when the case as to a scrutiny was being gone into, any fact came to light which would have avoided the election if it had been previously known. Under those circumstances Willes, J., thought that rule 6 applied.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

REG. v. MACKENZIE AND OTHERS (JUSTICES) AND LAWRENCE. (a.)

Criminal law—Intimidation—Following a person with a view to compel him to abstain from doing acts which he has a legal right to do—Defective statement of offence in summons and conviction—Certiorari—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7—Bias of justices—Remote interest.

A summons and conviction under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, for following a person with a view to compel him to abstain from doing any act which he has a legal right to do, ought to state what was the act which the defendant, by following the informant, endeavoured to compel him to abstain from doing.

A conviction which did not contain such a statement held to be bad, and an amendment refused, it not appearing that evidence was given at the trial before the justices as to what was the act which the informant was prevented by the conduct of the defendant from doing.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up, in order that it might be quashed, a conviction of the defendant Johnson Henderson, made by the justices of Sunderland on May 19, 1892, under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875. That section provides that "every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do, or abstain from doing wrongfully and without legal authority; (2) persistently follows such other person about from place to place; or (5) follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road," shall on conviction be liable to pay a penalty or to be imprisoned.

The charge contained in the summons was that the defendant "on the 16th day of May, 1892, at the township of Bishopwearmouth, in the said borough, did unlawfully, with a view to compel the informant, John Thomas Lawrence, to abstain from doing or to do acts which the informant had a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority persistently follow the informant about from place to place, and followed the informant with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through High-street and West Sunniside in the said borough, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided."

An affidavit made in these proceedings by the four justices who tried the case stated as follows:—Para. 2. "It was proved before us that the complainant, Lawrence, is the agent at Sunderland of the Shipping Federation (Limited) and that the defendant is an official of the National Amalgamated Seamen's and Firemen's Union of Great Britain and Ireland, and that on the date in question the defendant led a large crowd of persons who in a disorderly manner followed the complainant through High-street and Sunniside with a view to compel him to abstain from following his occupation as the agent of the Shipping Federation, an act which he had a legal right to do, and we convicted the defendant of the said offence, and ordered him to be imprisoned for fourteen days with hard labour."

Para. 4. "The solicitor of the defendant objected to the information and summons herein on the ground that they did not disclose what were the acts with a view to compel the informant from doing which the following took place. We were of opinion that, as the offence was charged in the words of the statute creating it, the information and summons were good by virtue of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 39, and we overruled the objection, and the case proceeded."

The conviction was in the following form:—

"Johnson Henderson (hereinafter called the defendant) is this day convicted before this court for that he, on the sixteenth day of May, 1892, at the township of Bishopwearmouth, within the said borough, unlawfully did, with a view to compel one John Thomas Lawrence to abstain from doing acts which he, the said John Thomas Lawrence, had a legal right to do, wrongfully and without legal authority follow the said John Thomas Lawrence, with two or more other persons, in a disorderly manner in and through certain streets—to wit, High-street and West Sunniside, in the said borough—contrary to the statute in such case made and provided."

The rule nisi for the issue of the writ was obtained upon the grounds: (1) That the summons and conviction ought to have specified the acts with a view to compel the informant to abstain from doing which the defendant followed the informant. (2) That some of the convicting justices were interested or biassed.

The case, as regards the alleged bias, rested upon the following facts:—The defendant was a delegate of the Sunderland branch of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, an association formed with the object (amongst others) of protecting the interests of seafaring men. The informant, Lawrence, was district superintendent of the Shipping Federation (Limited), which was an association of shipowners and other persons and companies connected with the shipping trade formed for the purpose of protecting its members against losses in their trade and other purposes. There was some evidence of the existence for some time before the events out of which this prosecution arose of considerable antagonism between the members of the Union and of the Federation owing to disputes having arisen as to the rate of wages to be paid to seamen taken upon ships at the port of Sunderland. Three out of the four convicting justices owned shares in shipping companies whose ships were covered against certain risks by marine insurance companies which were members of the Federation. None of the justices, however, took any part in the management of the shipping companies, nor were they at the date of the conviction aware that the ships of these companies were covered by the insurance companies or that the insurance companies were members of the Federation.

Walton, Q.C., for the justices, and Temperley, for the informant, showed cause against the rule.—As to the alleged bias, the facts are not sufficient to show that it existed, or that it was likely to exist, and bias, in order to disqualify justices from acting, must be really existent: R. v. Rand, L. R. 1 Q. B. 230, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 47; R. v. Farrant, 36 W. R. 184, 20 Q. B. D. 58. As to the alleged defect in the summons and the conviction, it was unnecessary to specify the acts which the defendant endeavoured to compel the informant to abstain from doing. The description of the offence is substantially within the words of the Act creating it, and section 39, sub-section (1), of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), applies:—"The description of any offence in the words of the Act, or any order, bye-law, regulation, or other document creating the offence, or in similar words shall be sufficient in law." The defect is at all events one which should not be allowed to defeat the proceedings—Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 1—and is curable by amendment even at this stage under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7. A far more serious defect was amended after conviction in R. v. Biggins, 26 J. P. 437.

Asquith, Q.C., and Scott Fox, in support of the rule.—This conviction cannot be sustained. A conviction for a statutory offence must show on the face of it every ingredient of the offence as defined by the statute. Here mere "following" of itself is not the offence; it must be following with a view to compelling a person to do or abstain from doing acts which he had a right to abstain from doing or to do; therefore it is necessary to state in the conviction what were the acts which the defendant endeavoured to compel the informant to abstain from doing, in order that it may appear that they were acts of the nature specified in the section. The summons is in an alternative form, and is, therefore, clearly bad; the conviction is bad for not stating the statutory offence in accordance with the above requirements The statutes cited do not cure the defect. Section 1 of Jervis's Act has no application; it only relates to a discrepancy between the complaint and the evidence in support of it. The description of the offence here is not in the words of the Act, or in similar words, and therefore section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, does not apply. This is a substantial defect, and the court will not cure it now. In R. v. Biggins the objection was described as "trashy," and therefore the amendment was allowed (see 26 J. P. 244). As to the bias, there was sufficient evidence that the justices, although not pecuniarily interested in the result of the proceedings before them, were biassed in favour of the interests of shipowners, which were represented by the informant and against the defendant, who was thought to have opposed those interests. "It is a matter of public policy, so far as possible that judicial proceedings should not only be free from actual bias and prejudice of the judges, but that they should be free from the suspicion of bias or prejudice," per Fry, L.J., in Leeson v. General Medical Council, 38 W. R. 303, at p. 309, 43 Ch. D. 366. The same principle is to be found in R. v. Justices of Hertfordshire, 6 Q. B. 753, and in R. v. Farrant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20.—COLLINS, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the rule for a writ of certiorari should be made absolute on the first ground which was relied on—namely, that the summons and the conviction ought to have specified the acts with a view to compel the informant to abstain from doing which the defendant followed the informant. It seems to me that that defect is one of substance, and not of mere form. The conviction does not follow the words of the summons, but I think that, when one looks at the statute which constitutes the offence, it is clear that both the summons and the conviction are defective, not in mere form, but as not stating the substance of the offence as created by the statute. [His lordship read the summons and conviction, and section, and continued:—] The Legislature might, had it chosen, have made it an offence for one person simply to follow another in a disorderly manner; it has not done so: the following must be with a view to compel another person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. It would be competent for a defendant, upon a charge of this kind, to prove that his conduct could not have had, or was not intended to have, any such effect. It is, therefore, necessary to state what were the acts which the defendant attempted to compel the informant to abstain from doing; but this conviction merely says that the following was with a view to compel the informant to abstain from doing acts which are not specified: it is therefore defective. It is said that this is a defect which may be cured by amendment. I have looked through the affidavits to see what was actually proved at the trial, for it might be possible to make an amendment in the conviction if the offence were really proved. That is a good test of whether the defect in the conviction is one of substance, for I see that the laxity which appears in the conviction only reproduces the laxity with which the charge under this section was gone into at the trial. [His lordship read paragraph 2 of the affidavit of the justices.] Now that affidavit treats the informant's "following his occupation as the agent of the Shipping Federation" as if it were a single act, which it obviously was not. There appears, in fact, to have been no evidence as to any acts which the defendant attempted to compel the informant to abstain from doing, and consequently the evidence was not sufficient to establish the offence created by the section under which the man was chargeable. On that ground I think that the conviction was bad.

As to the other ground which was relied upon, although it is not necessary to give an opinion, I must say that I do not think the evidence supports that view. It is admitted that the justices had no pecuniary interest in the result of the trial, but it is said that there was bias. They were not the prosecutors either themselves or by their agents, and their connection with the Shipping Federation is so remote that it is difficult to state it in language. Looking at the facts I do not think that the elements necessary for making out a case of bias are established here. The facts upon which the case of bias rests fall very far short of the facts in Leeson's case. I think that no sufficient reason has been shown for quashing this conviction upon the second ground which was relied on.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that the gist of the offence created by this section is that the following should be with a view to compel a person to abstain from doing or to do acts which he has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. It was, therefore, necessary for the magistrates to find that the defendant had done this, and to state in the conviction that they had come to that conclusion. Cases were cited which show that under the old law it was necessary to set out in an indictment and to prove all the items which made up the offence. A well-known instance is that of an indictment for profane swearing, in which it was necessary to set out the actual words of the oath used. A question at first arose in my mind as to the effect of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879; if this conviction had followed the words of the section creating the offence there would have been some difficulty; but it does not follow the words of the section. It does not even appear that the justices had present to their minds the necessity of proving that what was done was done with a view to compel the informant to abstain from doing certain acts which he had a legal right to do.

As to the other point, I agree with my brother Collins that there was no evidence here of bias on the part of the justices. To establish a case of bias it must be shown that the justices had such a substantial interest in the result of the trial as to make it probable that their judgment would be affected. I do not think that there was anything here to show this.

Court of Appeal

From Chan. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) — Nov. 15.

RYAN v. MUTUAL WESTMINSTER CHAMBERS ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Specific performance—Landlord and tenant—Residential flat—Covenant to employ porter to perform certain duties—Injunction—Damages.

The defendants granted to the plaintiff a lease of a residential flat, the lease containing a covenant by the lessors to appoint a resident porter who should act as the servant of the tenants of the several rooms in the block, his duties being (inter alia) to be constantly in attendance in the block, either by himself or, in his temporary absence, by some trustworthy assistant. The defendants appointed as porter a cook, who spent the greater part of his time elsewhere in performing his duties as a cook at a neighbouring luncheon club; and his duties as resident porter were for the most part performed by a boy or a charwoman.

In an action claiming specific performance of the agreement to appoint a resident porter within the meaning of the covenant, A. L. Smith, J., held that there had been a breach of the covenant, and granted specific performance.

Held, on appeal, that this was not a contract of which the court would decree specific performance, and that the plaintiff must be left to his remedy in damages.

Appeal from the judgment of A. L. Smith, J. (sitting for Romer, J.), reported 40 W. R. 379, [1892] 1 Ch. 427.

By a lease, dated the 2nd of July, 1889, the defendants demised to the plaintiff a residential flat for a term of twenty-one years. The building in which the flat was situate contained other flats let for residential and business purposes. The lease was made subject to certain regulations, contained in the schedule thereto, made by the defendants with respect to the duties of the resident porter. By these regulations it was provided that the rooms in each block were, together with the entrance and staircase belonging to it, to be in charge of a resident porter appointed and removable by the defendants. The porter to act as the servant of the tenants of the several rooms in the block. The tenants were to have the right to the general services of the porter resident in their block, within the scope of his general duties, as defined by rule 6. By rule 6 the general duties of the porter, which the tenants were entitled to have performed for them free of extra charge, were as follows: To be constantly in attendance in the section of the building committed to his charge, either by himself, or in his temporary absence by some trustworthy assistant; and to receive and deliver to the several tenants all letters, parcels, and messages, and to receive the keys of the outer doors of the several sets of rooms from the tenants for safe custody on their leaving for the night. The tenants were also to have the right to certain special services of the porter, if required, at a fixed extra charge.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had not appointed a resident porter in accordance with the regulations, and that, though a porter had been appointed, he was not constantly in attendance, and that he neglected his duties to the plaintiff as required by the regulations. The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the agreement to appoint a resident porter, and an injunction to restrain them from employing as porter in charge any person who was not resident and constantly in attendance, and able and willing to act as the servant of the plaintiff, according to the regulations; and damages for breach of the agreement. The defendants contended that, if there had been a breach of the agreement, the proper remedy was in damages, and that the court would not decree specific performance of such an agreement.

According to the plaintiff's evidence, one Benton had been appointed by the defendants to act as porter, but rarely opened the front door or answered the bell. The bell was, generally speaking, answered by a charwoman or by a slovenly-looking boy in his shirt sleeves and wearing a workman's apron, and sometimes by Benton's niece. From the evidence of Benton it appeared that he was a cook, and during the first part of his period of employment as a porter had acted as cook at a restaurant in the City. Afterwards he acted as cook between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. on week days at a luncheon club in Victoria-street, but was in attendance all day on Sundays and at odd times during the week. His wife assisted him in his duties as porter, and he had, during the whole period, employed a boy as assistant.

The learned judge came to the conclusion that there had been a breach by the defendants of the agreement to appoint a resident porter able and willing to perform the duties required of him by the regulations, and granted an injunction and specific performance as claimed; but in case it was subsequently held that this was not the proper remedy, he assessed the damages down to the date of the writ at £25.

The defendants appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The point upon which I am about to decide this case does not seem to me to have been fully brought to the attention of the learned judge in the court below. The case seems to me to come within two recognized rules of the Court of Chancery, which prevent us from decreeing specific performance of such a contract as this. Speaking for myself, I do not think that the case comes within the rule of the Court of Chancery with reference to contracts for personal services. This is a contract between a person who has to employ a servant and a person for whose benefit the servant is to be employed. If the action had been against the servant the rule of the Court of Chancery as to refusing to decree specific performance of such a contract might be applicable. I express no opinion whether it would or not, nor do I express any opinion upon the rule, as it is not before us. This is a contract by a landlord with his tenant to employ a porter, who will perform certain services for the benefit of his tenants. The contract, therefore, is not merely that the landlord shall employ a porter, but that he shall employ a porter who will perform certain specified services. That contract is one and indivisible. The first part of it would be of no benefit to the tenants without the second part. As between landlord and tenant it is one contract. It is a contract to be performed from day to day during the continuance of the tenancy. In the first place, it is a contract which requires constant superintendence. If the court decreed specific performance the carrying out of the decree would require constant superintendence. Such superintendence the Court of Chancery has always declined to give. That, therefore, is a ground upon which the court will refuse to decree specific performance. It was then said that the court will grant specific performance of the term in the contract to employ a porter. That contention runs contrary to another rule of the Court of Chancery, that specific performance of part of a contract will not be granted where the court cannot grant specific performance of the whole. It was said that Rigby v. Great Western Railway Co. showed that part of a contract might be ordered to be specifically performed. That case, however, decided that where in one instrument there was an independent contract, the court was not prevented from ordering specific performance of that independent part by reason of there being other independent contracts in the same instrument. It was then said that the case came within the exception upon the general rule laid down by the Court of Chancery with reference to railway cases. But that exception in no way abolishes the old rule of the court as to other contracts. With regard to the decision of Lord Eldon in Lane v. Newdigate, I must decline to follow him in doing indirectly what cannot be done directly. The judgment for specific performance and the injunction granted by the learned judge must be discharged, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for £25.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two grounds upon which a court of equity will not give relief by way of specific performance in this case. In the first place, this is one entire contract. The contract is that the landlord will appoint a porter to act for the tenants in the performance of certain duties. In my opinion that contract does not consist of two independent contracts, but is one entire contract. It was said that one part was to appoint a porter, and that this was independent of the other part, as to the performance of the duties. It would be useless to the tenant simply to have specific performance of the part of the contract to appoint a porter, as the porter appointed might be quite incompetent for the performance of his duties. The contract is to appoint a porter who shall perform certain duties. If a court of equity granted specific performance of that contract, it would have to watch its carrying out. That would be against the rule of the Court of Chancery, and it would also be against its rule to grant specific performance of part of the contract where it cannot grant specific performance of the whole contract. In the second place, a court of equity will not grant specific performance if there is another adequate remedy. It seems to me that there is another adequate remedy—namely, damages. Upon a breach occurring an adequate remedy lies in damages.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The remedy by specific performance was originally intended and applied where an action for damages did not afford adequate compensation. The jurisdiction has always been treated as discretionary and has been applied according to well-known and recognized rules. The complaint of the plaintiff here is that the man appointed as porter was not a proper porter, and that the plaintiff did not get the advantages stipulated for, as the porter did not perform those duties which the plaintiff stipulated for. It would be curious if under those circumstances this contract could be divided. The contract was that the tenant should have certain services from the porter. I dissent from the contention that that covenant is divisible. The plaintiff now asks for a remedy under which he may have those duties performed. It was contended for the plaintiff that the court can decree specific performance to this extent, to compel the appointment of a proper porter. The contract, however, is that the tenant shall have the advantage of the duties of the porter, and there is no breach of the contract until the tenant has not had or has been deprived of the duties of the porter. The court will not decree specific performance of such a contract as that. Further, I agree that the court will not decree specific performance of part of a contract where it cannot decree specific performance of the whole. There is an exception to that rule, as was illustrated in the case of Lumley v. Wagner, namely, that, though the whole contract cannot be ordered to be specifically performed, still a negative stipulation contained in it may be enforced. There the Lord Chancellor said: "I may at once declare that, if I had only to deal with the affirmative covenant of the defendant, J. Wagner, that she would perform at Her Majesty's Threatre, I should not have granted any injunction." There was in that contract, besides the affirmative covenant, a negative term which could be ordered to be specifically performed. There is another exception. The court as a general rule will not order works, such as building works, to be carried out, because the court will not superintend their being carried out, and damages are an adequate remedy. There is an exception in the case of a railway company which has taken land and agreed to do certain works upon the land. There the court will order specific performance of the definite works which the company contracted to do upon taking the land. The present case does not come within either of those exceptions.

There is another reason why the court will not decree specific performance of this contract. The learned judge seems to have found no difficulty in assessing the damages for the breach up to the time of action brought. Why are they not an adequate remedy up to that time? If money compensation is an adequate remedy, as I think it is here, the Court of Chancery treats that as a reason for refusing specific performance.

Appeal allowed.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ.) Nov. 11.

YUNGMANN v. BRIESMANN. (a.)

Pledge—Detinue—Tender—Waiver.

In an action in detinue for the return of certain goods, Y. alleged that he had pledged the goods with B. to secure an advance. He subsequently requested B. to return the goods, as he had a purchaser for them. B. refused, alleging on his part that the goods had been sold to him. Y. did not tender the amount due under the pledge.

Held, that, assuming the transaction to have been one of pledge, in the absence of a waiver, tender and refusal of the amount due upon the pledge was a condition precedent to the right of action; that B.'s conduct did not amount to a waiver of tender; that his special property in the goods was not, therefore, determined; and that the action would not lie.

Motion by the plaintiff for a new trial, or that judgment, which had been entered for the defendant, should be entered for the plaintiff.

The action was brought in detinue and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from parting with certain pictures, and the plaintiff claimed the return of the pictures, which, he alleged, he had pledged with the defendant as security for certain advances, and for damages for their detention. The defendant alleged that the pictures were sold to him out and out.

The case was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and a jury. It appeared from the evidence of the plaintiff that he had requested the defendant to return him the pictures, because if he did so a friend of his was ready to purchase them, and he would be able then to pay off the amount advanced upon them. The defendant replied that this would be of no use, as the pictures were his absolute property by purchase.

In answer to the Lord Chief Justice the plaintiff admitted that at the time he requested the return of the pictures he was not in a position himself to pay the amount due, except by means of a sale, but that he would be able to do so now if he obtained a decision in his favour that the transaction was one of pledge.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., thereupon held, assuming the transaction to have been one of pledge, and not of sale, that the plaintiff had no right of action, inasmuch as he had made no tender of the amount due, and that there was nothing in the defendant's conduct to excuse him from doing so. His lordship therefore directed a verdict for the defendant, and gave judgment accordingly.

Channell, Q.C., and P. E. Dove, for the defendant.—The general property in a chattel pledged remains in the pledgor, and if he tenders the amount due under the pledge, but the pledgee refuses to accept it, the pledgee's special property is determined and the chattel can be recovered at law: see judgment of Privy Council in Bank of New South Wales v. O'Connor, 14 App. Cas., at p. 282, 37 W. R. Dig. 129. But the pledgee may by his conduct waive his right to tender, and the pledgor will then be in the same position as if he had tendered: Scarfe v. Morgan, 4 M. & W. 270. The defendant here said that the goods were his absolute property, and that it would, therefore, be of no use to bring a purchaser. We had evidence that the plaintiff was ready and willing to pay the amount within a reasonable time. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Jones v. Tarleton, 9 M. & W., per Alderson, B., at p. 677. The plaintiff could not be said to be ready unless he had the money in his hand.] We had a purchaser ready. It was not necessary that he should actually have the money in his pocket, as the defendant insisted that the goods had been sold to him. In Kerford v. Mondel, 8 W. R. Dig. 71, 28 L. J. Ex., at p. 306, Bramwell, B., said that when the defendant in effect said, "I claim these goods in respect of the lien for two different items. You need not trouble yourself to tender one of them, because if you do so I shall not deliver them up," it was a reasonable thing to show that he dispensed with what he owned would be a nugatory tender of the sum he was entitled to receive.

They also referred to Wallis v. Glynn, 19 Ves. 380; Boardman v. Gill, note to Attersol v. Briant, 1 Camp. 410.

Murphy, Q.C., and J. Eldon Bankes, for the defendant.—In Halliday v. Holgate, L. R. 3 Ex. 299, 16 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80, which was a case in which the pledgee had actually sold the goods, Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the court, said (at p. 302) that it would be a contradiction in fact to say that the pledgee consented by his act to revest in the pledgor the immediate interest or right in the pledge, which by the bargain is out of the pledgor and in the pledgee. In such a case, therefore, an action of trover or detinue, each of which assumed an immediate right to possession in the plaintiff, was not maintainable. That case lays down the principle applicable here.

Channell, Q.C., in reply.—[Lord ESHER, M.R.—In order to succeed here you must be entitled to immediate judgment. How do you meet Halliday v. Holgate, which says that the goods are the pledgor's until paid for?] All that case decided was that the transfer of the pledgee's rights did not determine the special property. It is distinguishable from this in which the pledgee sets up the whole and absolute property.

He also cited Senécal v. Panzé, 14 App. Cas. 637, 38 W. R. Dig. 27.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think this case is really governed by Halliday v. Holgate. It must be assumed for the purposes of the case that the plaintiff had made a pledge of the goods not amounting to a mortgage. The effect of that is that the general property is in the pledgor, but there is a special property in the pledgee, and the difference between pledge and lien is that in lien no property passes. In this case the pledgor, who has the general property, claims judgment for immediate delivery up to him of the goods by the pledgee, who has the possession and the special property. The question is whether he is entitled to that judgment.

It is admitted he did not tender the amount secured. But he says that he was excused from tender by the conduct of the pledgee, and that the special property of the pledgee was determined by that conduct, and that he (the pledgor) has, therefore the right to immediate possession of the goods. Now is there any authority for that? It has been said in some cases that tender and refusal entitles the pledgor to trover and detinue. But here there was no tender. You cannot tender by saying, "I have not got the money, but I have a friend who will pay if you will say the pictures are mine." You must have the amount then in your hand. Now we know here that the plaintiff not only had not got the money, but had no immediate right to it. But he says he was excused from tender because the defendant said what would have made it absurd. In Halliday v. Holgate the court said that the pledgor had no right to the goods without paying off the debt, and until the debt was paid the whole present interest was in the pledgee. The pledgor would have, therefore, to be ready to pay, and, I am inclined to think, continue to be ready to pay. And it is to be observed that in that case improper dealing with the goods so as to render tender useless was held to be no excuse for not tendering.

I am prepared to hold that the mere fact of the defendants saying, where he holds the special property, that tender is of no use is not an excuse for not tendering, and does not determine his special property. It is part of the pledgor's legal assertion to say "I did tender," but he must also say, "I was ready and willing to pay; and from that time to this was always ready and willing to pay." I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—In order to succeed in an action of detinue the plaintiff must make out his immediate right to possession. Now that he cannot do here because the special property has passed to the defendant, the pledgee, who has a right to retain the goods until payment. But then it is said that when there has been tender and refusal the property revests in the pledgor and the special property is determined. There is authority for that, no doubt; but tender and refusal are essential. It is clear that in this case there was none. The plaintiff never had the money, and was, therefore, never able to tender or to continue ready and willing to pay. Nor was there a refusal; all the defendant said was, the property in the goods is mine. That, it is said, excused the plaintiff from making tender. I can't adopt that view, for I think that Halliday v. Holgate is really a stronger case, and that there is nothing here made out like such a tender and refusal as is necessary. I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In some cases it was no doubt held that if tender was made of an amount owing on the security of the debt and was refused, the special property was determined and the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In the case of an ordinary mortgage that is certainly not law, because the whole property passed, and the effect of tender is simply to stop the payment of interest; but it has been said that in that case the money must be kept ready, or otherwise the interest would again become payable. But this case is not brought within the class of cases I have referred to by the fact that there was no tender here, for what was done did not amount to a tender and refusal; and there is no authority for saying that a statement that conduct such as that of the defendant in this case would excuse the plaintiff from tendering the money. In fact the case of Halliday v. Holgate was directly the other way.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. EVANS. (a.)

Minerals—Canal—Right of support—Subjacent minerals—Compensation—Lapse of time—Fulfilment of conditions precedent to be assumed—Statutory powers.

Ordinarily, where land is granted by private grant for the construction of specific works, the grant, in the absence of a contrary intention appearing on the face of it, carries by implication the right of reasonable and necessary support for the works to be constructed.

The same principle applies to titles and rights created by Act of Parliament, and, where an express statutory right is given to make and maintain a thing necessarily requiring support, the right to necessary support is, in the absence of a contrary context, implied to accompany the right to make and maintain the thing requiring support; and, in cases where a mode of compensation is provided for the owners of the lands furnishing such support, the reasons for implying that such right of support is intended by the Act are overwhelming.

By a private Act of 1754 the plaintiffs' predecessors in title were empowered to convert a brook and its branches into a navigable river for the use of the public, and to make and maintain such cuts and canals in, upon, and through the lands of owners adjoining as might be proper and requisite for the navigation and carrying out of the undertaking. The Act provided for "the said undertakers, their heirs and assigns, doing as little damage as may be in the premises, and first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, tenements, and tithes or hereditaments respectively, as shall be digged, cut, removed, or otherwise made use of, or that in any wise shall be diminished, prejudiced, or damaged by or for the carrying on, effecting, or preserving the said navigation, or for maintaining or managing the same," as the commissioners under the Act or a jury should decide.

The undertaking was carried out, and the undertakers paid an annual sum, under the provisions of the Act, to landowners in respect of the lands required and used for the purposes of the canal; but there was in the Act no express power for the undertakers to purchase lands (though persons under disability were authorized to sell lands required for the navigation), and no conveyances of surface lands were ever executed to them.

Under another private Act of 1864 the canal became vested in the plaintiffs. The defendants, who were lessees and owners of coal in the subjacent and adjacent lands over which the canal was constructed, in the ordinary course of working their coal endangered the canal. Upon the plaintiffs asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from so working their mines as to cause damage to the canal,

Held, that provisions for compensation to those whose lands would be required for the making and maintenance of the canal were to be found in the Act of 1754, authorizing the undertaking; that the right of support required for the canal and the value of the minerals underlying the lands taken and used might have been—whether or not they in fact were—taken into account and estimated in the price to be calculated and given to the landowners before the works were undertaken, had the landowners been sufficiently prescient to demand it; that, after so great a length of time, it must be presumed that all was paid for which was thought worth claiming for, and that all conditions precedent were fulfilled which were requisite to give the plaintiffs' predecessors the necessary right of support; and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to an injunction.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The question was, practically, whether a right granted by a private Act of Parliament to make a canal carried with it a right of support for the canal.

By a private Act of Parliament in 1754 (28 Geo. 2, c. viii.), certain persons therein referred to as "the undertakers" were empowered (section 1) to make a certain river or brook called Sankey Brook, falling into the river Mersey, and also certain branches thereof, "navigable, portable, and passable" for boats, flats, and other vessels, "and from time to time to continue, maintain, and use such navigation"; and for that purpose to clear, open, scour, enlarge, or straiten the said river or brook, and the several branches thereof, and, inter alia, "to make such new cuts, canals, trenches, or passages for water in, upon, or through the lands and grounds adjoining or near unto the same river," or the said branches, as they should think proper and requisite; to remove all obstructions which might impede the navigation; to dig, take, and carry away soil, clay, gravel, or stone requisite for carrying on and constructing the said works and undertaking in and from the grounds of any person or persons adjoining the said river or brook; and to do all other things as the undertakers should think necessary for making and maintaining the same river or brook, branches, cuts, canals and passages navigable and passable as aforesaid, "the said undertakers, their heirs and assigns, doing as little damage as may be to the premises, and first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, tenements, tithes, or hereditaments respectively as shall be digged, cut, removed, or otherwise made use of, or that in any wise shall be diminished, prejudiced, or damaged by or for the carrying on, effecting, or preserving the said navigation, or for maintaining and managing the same," as the commissioners thereinafter named should adjudge in case the undertakers should not otherwise agree with the proprietors of such lands, &c.

By section 3 commissioners were appointed for determining questions between the undertakers and owners and occupiers of lands affected by the said navigation; and they were authorized to determine what satisfaction, either by an annual rent or payment, or by a sum of money in gross, any person should have for such part of his lands, &c., as "shall be cut, dug, or removed, or made use of as aforesaid, and for the damage that shall be thereby sustained."

By section 25 the undertakers were required to secure the adjacent lands from being flooded, and to make fences, bridges, and other works for the accommodation of adjoining landowners.

By section 26 it was provided that in certain cases of damage the amount of compensation should be assessed by the commissioners or by a jury.

By section 35 it was enacted that the said river or brook, and the several branches thereof, cuts, and canals, should for ever thereafter be taken to be an open, common, and navigable river from the river Mersey below Sankey Bridge up Sankey Brook and its said several branches and such cuts and canals, and that the public should have free passage along and right of navigating the same upon payment of the tolls authorized by the Act.

The undertaking authorized by the Act was duly completed by the construction of a navigable canal, and by another private Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. cxvii.) the canal became vested in the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway Co., it being enacted that the railway referred to in the Act should be subject to the provisions of any general Act relating to railways which might in the then present or any future session be passed.

By another private Act, in 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. ccxcvi.), the canal, then known as the St. Helen's Canal, and also the St. Helen's Railway, became vested in the plaintiffs in the present action, who by that Act were required to keep the canal in repair and in navigable condition; and it was provided that the railway and the canal should be subject to the provisions of any general Act relating to railways or canals then in force or which might be passed.

The Acts contained no reference to mines or minerals in subjacent or adjacent lands, nor any express power for the undertakers to purchase lands, although they empowered persons under disability to sell lands required for the undertaking. No conveyances of surface lands appeared to have ever been executed to the undertakers, but annual payments were paid by them under the principal Act to landowners in respect of lands taken and used for the purposes of the canal.

The defendants were lessees of parts and owners of parts of the coal under part of the lands over which the canal was constructed, and also under adjacent land, which, at the passing of the first-mentioned private Act, was vested in persons who were then the owners of land over which the canal was constructed.

On the 1st of February, 1877, the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice in writing, under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that they intended to work the coal under the canal, but that they were willing to leave it unworked on receiving compensation. On the 5th of March, 1877, the plaintiffs replied by letter that they claimed support for the canal. They did not offer to make compensation for the mines, and, in fact, no compensation was ever made by the plaintiffs. The defendants proceeded to work the coal, causing subsidences of portions of the bank and bed of the canal thereby.

The plaintiffs brought the present action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from working or getting any coal so as to cause damage or injury to the canal, and from otherwise causing any damage or injury to the plaintiffs as owners of the canal; and damages.

Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the injunction asked.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellants.—We ask for an injunction and a declaration of right. The landowner might have prevented the undertakers entering on his land until paid compensation. It must be presumed the landowner was compensated. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The strength of your case is, I think, this: that payment of compensation was a condition precedent to the landowners letting you make the canal, and as the canal is made, compensation must be presumed to have been paid.] In Roderick v. Aston Local Board, 25 W. R. 403, at p. 405, 5 Ch. D. 328, at p. 332, Jessel, M.R., explained the principle of the decision in Metropolitan Board of Works v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 16 W. R. 1117, 17 W. R. 416, L. Rigby, S.G., Renshaw, Q.C., and Warrington, for the respondents.—[BOWEN, L.J.—Does not the fact of the right to make the canal having been purchased imply a right of support?] There was no severance of the surface from the minerals, and therefore the appellants had no right of support. It is a case here of conflicting rights, and the question is which right is to prevail. The right of support is not absolute, but only such as is reasonable, and it is qualified by the circumstances of each particular case. [They referred to In re Corporation of Dudley, Consett Waterworks Co. v. Ritson, Metropolitan Board of Works v. Metropolitan Railway Co., and Roderick v. Aston Local Board.] [BOWEN, L.J.—In the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works the board "might, if they thought fit, construct their sewer without requiring any lateral support from the owners of adjacent lands": per Bovill, C.J., L. R. 3 C. P., at p. 623.]

Sir Henry James, Q.C., in reply.—It is a general principle that if you grant the use of the surface of land which necessarily requires support, that grant is also a grant of such right of support. If the right of the respondent to compensation has been lost, it has been lost through his own fault.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 7.—LINDLEY, L.J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgments which are about to be delivered, and I need only say that I concur with them.

BOWEN, L.J.—The plaintiffs, the London and North-Western Railway Co., have succeeded to the ownership of the St. Helen's Canal and to the rights and liabilities of its original proprietors under an old Act of Parliament passed in the year 1754. The defendants are lessees and occupiers of coal mines in the subjacent and adjacent lands over which a branch of the canal has been constructed, and, in the ordinary course of working their coal, are endangering this branch. Thereupon the London and North-Western Railway Co. ask for an injunction to restrain the defendants from so working their mines as to cause damage to the canal. The plaintiffs contend that, together with an express right to make and to maintain their canal, the Act of 1754 conferred on them by implication the right to such support as was necessary for the existence of the canal and its branches. The right to make the canal, they argue, was subject to the condition precedent of their making compensation to the owners of the lands taken or used for the purposes of the canal. Such compensation, they urge, was paid to the predecessors in title of the defendants; and, thereupon, the necessary right of the support requisite for the due maintenance of the canal was acquired. The defendants, on the other hand, allege that the compensation so paid was in respect only of the actual lands taken, but nothing was paid for minerals, and that, if the plaintiffs succeed in their present claim, the defendants, as owners of the minerals, will have been prevented from using in a legitimate and ordinary manner what still is their own property. How far the predecessors in title actually received compensation is a question that will hereafter be examined in the judgment to be delivered by my brother A. L. Smith. Meanwhile, it is desirable clearly to state the point of view from which the construction of the Act of Parliament, upon which the question in this case mainly turns, ought to be approached.

In dealing with an ordinary grant of lands it is undoubted law that, where such grant is made for a specific purpose, such as the construction on the lands of a house, canal, railway, or other permanent work, the grant, in the absence of a contrary intention appearing on its face, carries with it by implication the right of reasonable and necessary support for the works so to be erected from the subjacent or adjacent lands of the grantor. This maxim of law and of good sense applies whether the grant is voluntary or under the compulsory powers of a statute—see Elliott v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 11 W. R. 604, 10 H. L. Cas. 333; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Sprot. When we pass from private grants between individuals to titles and rights created by an Act of Parliament, the exact subject-matter is altered, but similar rules of good sense and law obtain when we have to interpret sections which do not expressly decide the matter. These canons do not override the language of a statute where the language is clear; they are only guides to enable us to understand what is inferential. In each case the Act of Parliament is all-powerful, and, when its meaning is unequivocally expressed, the necessity for rules of construction disappears and reaches its vanishing point. Where the intention of the Legislature has been left to be collected from principles of reason, there are one or two obvious principles which have to be borne in mind. One such maxim, similar to that which has been alluded to as governing the case of private grants, seems obvious also with regard to Acts of Parliament. Where an express statutory right is given to make and maintain a thing necessarily requiring support, the statute, in the absence of a context implying the contrary, must be taken to mean that the right to necessary support of the thing constructed shall accompany the right to make and to maintain it. More especially would this seem reasonable when the thing to be constructed is one of public advantage and utility, in which the public are to have rights. The maxim of good sense and law so stated becomes applicable with more or less stringency according to the scope of the Act of Parliament. On the other hand, the Legislature cannot fairly be supposed to intend, in the absence of clear words to the contrary, that one man's property shall be confiscated for the benefit of others, or of the public, without any compensation being provided for him in respect of what is taken compulsorily from him. Parliament in its omnipotence can, of course, override or disregard this ordinary principle as it can override the former, if it seems fit to do so, but it is not likely that it will be found disregarding it, without plain expressions of such a purpose.

These two maxims or principles appear to bear on the construction of statutes like the present, and may be called canons of construction, not because they are inflexible doctrines, but because they are doctrines of sound sense and obvious justice, to be borne in mind in dealing with legislation, which cannot be supposed, unless it so explicitly states, to neglect what is reasonable and businesslike on the one hand, or what is natural justice upon the other. It is evident that when both a right to make and maintain a work necessarily requiring support is given, and a mode of compensation also is provided for those whose lands will have to furnish such support, the two maxims work in harmony, and are not drawn into conflict with one another. The reasons for supposing, in the absence of a controlling context, that the Act designed the right of necessary support to be enjoyed seem in such a case to become overwhelming. When no right of compensation is furnished by the Act the case is different. The two maxims, then, appear to draw us in different directions, and their antinomies have to be adjusted by a careful examination of the statute itself. It is by the light of these two principles when they coincide in favour of one view of the statute, by their adjustment and reconciliation when they appear to conflict, that various cases have been decided, falling on one side or the other of the line, according to differences in the statutes which have to be construed; such cases, for instance, as The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., as explained by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Roderick v. Aston Local Board, In re the Corporation of Dudley, and in The Benfieldside Local Board v. Consett Iron Co. If in the present case compensation for the right of support has been in fact provided for by the Act of 1754, the two maxims of good sense, so far from creating a conflict of reasoning, both will operate in favour of the plaintiffs' claim to the right of support, and the point to be decided upon the present appeal will become reasonably clear.

For reasons which have been elaborated by my brother A. L. Smith, with which I agree, and which I will leave to him to state at length, it seems to me that in the present case apt words of compensation for those whose lands would be required for the making and maintenance of the canal are to be found in the statute of 1754. The words "first making satisfaction to the owners of such lands as shall be made use of" ought to be reasonably construed as wide enough to secure such just compensation. It is true that at the date of the Act the minerals were not thought to be of value, and were not taken into account in assessing the actual compensation exacted. But if the right of support was not substantially measured in the price given for the lands taken and used, it might have been demanded and estimated in the price had the owners been sufficiently prescient; and after this length of time it must be assumed that all was paid for which was capable of calculation or measurement and that was thought worth claiming by the owners, and that all conditions precedent have been fulfilled which were requisite to give the canal proprietors the right to the necessary support for the maintenance and making of their canal. The appeal accordingly ought to succeed, and the injunction ought to be granted to the plaintiffs, with the costs of the action both in the court below and in this court.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question to be determined in this case is whether the undertakers, who were empowered by the Act of 28 Geo. 2, c. viii. (1754), to convert Saukey brook, in the county of Lancaster, and its branches into a navigable river for the use of the public, and also to make and maintain such new cuts and canals in, upon, and through the lands of owners adjoining as might be proper and requisite for the navigation and carrying out of the contemplated undertaking, acquired the right of subjacent support by virtue of that Act from the lands underneath such new cuts and canals, or whether the landowners possessed of the minerals lying under the cuts and canals are entitled to win them in the ordinary and accustomed manner, even though by so doing they let down the surface and destroy the cuts and canals. It may be taken, without referring to the Acts passed since the Act of 1754, that, if the undertakers under that Act obtained the right to subjacent support, the present plaintiffs have also such right. It is settled law that where minerals are severed from the surface by deed, instrument, or Act of Parliament, the mineral owner is not entitled to let down the surface, unless by the deed, instrument, or Act of Parliament by which the minerals are severed it appears that the surface owner has parted with the right of support, or, in other words, that the mineral owner's right to get the minerals is thereby limited to getting them in such a manner as not to occasion injury to the surface owner. If authority were wanted, the cases of The Caledonian Railway Co. v. Sprot; Bell v. Love, 10 Q. B. D., at p. 558; and Davis v. Treharne, 29 W. R. 869, 6 App. Cas., at p. 466, will suffice.

But it is said by the Solicitor-General for the defendants that, though this may be so, it does not apply to the present case, because by the Act of 1754 there had been no severance of the surface from the minerals, and in this he is correct, for by that Act no property in the surface soil is vested in the plaintiffs, nor is there any severance of surface at all from the minerals. It is a correct proposition of law that when an Act of Parliament empowers undertakers to make and maintain works for the benefit of the public upon the land of others, and such works of necessity require the support of the subjacent soil, and the Act provides for compensating the landowners for damages, both to the surface and subjacent minerals, by reason of the execution of the contemplated works, then, unless there is something in the Act to the contrary, a necessary implication arises that the Act gives to the undertakers a right to subjacent support for the works authorized to be constructed and maintained. In stating this proposition I do not wish to be understood as holding that nothing less than the above will suffice to raise the implication of the right to subjacent support, but this case does not, in my opinion, necessitate an inquiry as to what (if anything less) will suffice. In my judgment, if the conditions above stated are to be found in an Act of Parliament, a necessary implication does arise that the undertakers are entitled to subjacent support for their works as against the mineral owner below. This proposition appears to be me one which is irresistible, for it is impossible to suppose in the premises mentioned that the Legislature contemplated that the mineral owner might let down and destroy the works authorized to be constructed for the benefit of the public.

The case of In re Corporation of Dudley, before my brothers Denman and Watkin Williams, whose decision was affirmed on appeal by this court, was decided upon this principle. In that case the Corporation of Dudley were empowered by the Public Health Act, 1875, to construct a sewer through, under, and upon the lands of Earl Dudley. By the Act Earl Dudley was entitled to claim compensation for damages sustained by him in being deprived of the free power to work his minerals subjacent to the sewer. It was held that, in these circumstances, the earl was under obligation to preserve to such sewer subjacent support. Denman, J., in his judgment, said: "It appears to me a matter of common-sense inference that, where a statute for the public benefit gives such a power as this to persons laying down such things as sewers, it must at the same time give them a right not to be undermined by persons having minerals underneath." It must be remembered that in that case the right to compensation was given to the mineral owner, and Denman, J, had this in his mind when he made the statement above. The case of The Benfieldside Local Board v. The Consett Iron Co. was decided upon similar grounds.

The question next for consideration is—Does the Act of 1754 contain the conditions above stated? The Act not only empowers the undertakers to make and maintain the cuts and canals for the benefit of the public, but, by sections 25 and 29, it enacts that they shall erect and maintain sufficient bridges over the cuts and canals as the commissioners shall direct. It enacts (section 35) that the brook, cuts, and canals shall for ever after the passing of the Act be an open, common, and navigable river for all the King's people upon payment of tolls; and section 53 points definitively to some of the public advantages likely to arise from the undertaking. It is manifest that the cuts, canals, and other works contemplated by the Act of necessity required the support of the subjacent soil, and cannot be maintained without, and section 1 of the Act provides for compensating landowners in the following terms:—"The said undertakers, their heirs and assigns, doing as little damage as may be in the premises, and first giving satisfaction to the owners or proprietors of such lands, tenements, and tithes, or hereditaments respectively as shall be digged, cut, removed, or otherwise made use of, or that in any wise shall be diminished, prejudiced, or damaged by or for the carrying on, effecting, or preserving the said navigation, or for maintaining or managing the same" as the commissioners shall adjudge. By section 3 the commissioners were to settle and determine what satisfaction, either by an annual rent or payment, or by a sum of money in gross, every person should have for such part of their lands, tenements, tithes, or hereditaments as should be cut, dug, removed, or made use of, and in certain cases a jury was to be summoned to assess such damages and recompense to be awarded to the owners and occupiers of such lands, tenements, tithes, or hereditaments as should be used for, or damnified by, or by means of the said intended navigation or works.

It seems impossible to hold, as the Solicitor-General invited us to do, that this right to compensation was limited to surface damage, and I cannot doubt that, if on or about the date of the construction of the works it had been thought worth while to make a claim for loss thereafter to be suffered by the landowner by his being deprived of his right to remove minerals in the same way he would have been able to do without the works, such a claim ought to have been received and adjudicated upon under the provisions for compensation above set forth. It is true that the claim which the landowners and occupiers then made appears to be for surface damage only, and that payment for such has been continued down to the present time, but that fact does not establish that the compensation clauses did not confer upon the landowner the right to be compensated for damage about to be done to the value of his minerals, if any, or that the clauses ought not, consequently, to be read in the way their language imports. The Solicitor-General urged that the canal proprietors had always heretofore mended the canal and its banks when subsidences occurred; but Sir H. James stated that since 1877, when the subsidences began to be serious, the mendings had always been done under protest, and that now the point was brought up for adjudication. The case of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., on appeal, was cited as an authority against the plaintiff's right to subjacent support, but when the facts of that case are ascertained it will be seen that, in the first place, the sewer could have been constructed without the lateral support which was there claimed, and that there was no right to compensation given to the person against whom the lateral support was claimed. Sir G. Jessel points this out in the case of Roderick v. Aston Local Board, 5 Ch. D., at p. 332. In my judgment the requisites necessary to support the proposition of law above stated are proved to exist in this case, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought, and this appeal must be allowed. The plaintiffs are entitled to the agreed damages, £900, and to an injunction restraining the defendant from working so as to injure the plaintiffs' canal, and to the costs of the appeal, and in the court below.

"THE DART." (a.)

Practice—County court—Admiralty action—Judgment of county court varied by divisional court—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Leave to appeal—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 45—County Courts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), s. 10—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 188, sub-section 5.

Where a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division alters on appeal the judgment of a county court in an admiralty action, an appeal lies without leave from the judgment of the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal, notwithstanding the repeal of section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1875, by section 188 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of a divisional court in admiralty.

The action was brought on the admiralty side of the Rochester County Court by Joseph Westwood and others against the owners of the sailing barge Dart. The county court judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants. The plaintiffs having appealed, the Divisional Court (Sir Francis Jeune and Bruce, J.) reversed the decision of the county court judge, and refused the defendants leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

The defendants appealed.

Pyke, Q.C. (H. Stokes with him), for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay.—The case is governed by section 45 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which enacts that the determination of an appeal from a county court by a divisional court shall be final unless special leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court. Here such leave was refused by the Divisional Court. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, provided, by section 29, that "there shall be no appeal from a decree or order of the High Court of Admiralty of England made on appeal from a county court, except by express permission of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty." This section was repealed by section 12 of the County Courts Acts, 1875, and section 10 of that Act substituted the following provision in its place:—"There shall be no appeal from a decree or order of the High Court of Admiralty of England made on appeal from the county court when such decree or order affirms the judgment of the county court, except by express permission of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty. When upon an appeal the High Court of Admiralty alters the judgment of the county court no leave to appeal to her Majesty in Council shall be necessary." The jurisdiction of her Majesty in Council over appeals from the High Court of Admiralty is now vested in this court: Judicature Act, 1873, s. 18, sub-section 5. Under the County Courts Act, 1875, there would have been an appeal in the present case: The Lydia, 37 W. R. 161, 14 P. D. 1. But the whole of the County Courts Act, 1875, is now repealed by section 188 of the County Courts Act, 1888. There is now no statutory provision dealing specially with the power of appealing from a judgment of a divisional court in admiralty on an appeal from a county court. Therefore section 45 of the Judicature Act, which deals with county court appeals generally, must apply to this case.

Bucknill, Q.C. (J. C. Gordon and H. S. Q. Henriques with him), for the defendants.—The Judicature Act of 1873 came into operation on the 1st of November, 1875; the County Courts Act, 1875, came into operation on the 2nd of November, 1875. Section 45 of the Judicature Act is inconsistent with section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1875. Therefore, so far as the inconsistency goes, the former section must be taken to have been repealed the day after it came into operation. After the passing of the County Courts Act, 1875, section 45 of the Judicature Act had no force so far as concerned admiralty appeals in which the judgment of the county court was altered. Then section 188 of the County Courts Act, 1888, repealed the County Courts Act, 1875; but sub-section 5 of that section provided that the repeal was not to revive any enactment not in force at the date of the repeal. Therefore section 45 of the Judicature Act, not being an enactment then in force so far as concerned admiralty cases, in which the Divisional Court altered the judgment of the county court, was not revived. As there is now no enactment which precludes an appeal in such a case as this, the general right of appeal given by section 19 of the Judicature Act applies.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that an appeal lies in this case.

LOPES, L.J.—Section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1875, is different from and inconsistent with section 45 of the Judicature Act. The two sections cannot be read together. After the passing of the County Courts Act, 1875, section 45 of the Judicature Act did not apply to an admiralty appeal, where the Divisional Court varied the judgment of the county court. Then section 188 of the County Courts Act, 1888, in repealing the County Courts Act, 1875, expressly provides that the repeal is not to revive any enactment not in force at the commencement of the Act. Therefore section 45 of the Judicature Act is not revived so far as regards admiralty appeals where the Divisional Court has varied the judgment of the county court. I am of opinion that an appeal lies.

KAY, L.J., concurred.

Objection overruled.

The court proceeded to hear the case, and in the result the appeal was dismissed.

In re ABBOTT.
PEACOCK v. FRIGOUT. (a.)

Will—Power of appointment—Remoteness—Rule against perpetuities—Effect of invalidity of power on subsequent limitations.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed a sum of money to trustees upon trust for her stepdaughter C. A. for life, with remainder to her husband for life, and after the death of the survivor for the children of the marriage as the parents or the survivor of them should appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children of the marriage who, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age, share and share alike. At the death of the testatrix C. A. was unmarried, but she had since married F., and she and her husband were now living. The question was raised whether the trusts of the sum of money were to any, and what, extent void, having regard to the rule against perpetuities.

Held, that, even assuming that the power of appointment conferred upon a husband of C. A. who might survive her might be invalid, the trusts in favour of the children, in default of appointment, were not thereby invalidated, inasmuch as the intention of the testatrix was that the money should go to C. A.'s children unless their interests were effectually displaced by the exercise of the power of appointment.

Adjourned summons.

The testatrix, Sarah Abbott, widow, by her will, dated the 6th of December, 1890, made a bequest in the following form: "I give and bequeath the sum of £1,000 to and for the benefit of my goddaughter Anna, the wife of Sidney Willis, of 50, Acacia-road, St. John's Wood. And I direct my trustees to invest the said sum of £1,000 in their names in any investment allowed by law for trust funds, and to hold the same respectively upon trusts for the benefit of the said Mrs. Sidney Willis and her husband and family as follows: that is to say, upon trust to pay the income to the wife for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death to the husband for life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for such one or more of the children of the marriage as the parents or the survivor shall by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children of the marriage who, being sons or a son, shall attain the age of twenty-one years or, being daughters or a daughter, shall attain that age or marry under that age, share and share alike, but subject to hotchpot in respect of any appointed share, and in default of any children upon trust for such persons as the wife shall by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for the persons who would, under the Statute of Distributions, be entitled to the personal estate of the wife if she had died intestate and without having been married." The testatrix afterwards bequeathed a sum of £3,500 to each of the children of her late husband, naming them, and amongst others Catherine Abbott, and she directed that the said sums should not be paid to any of her said stepchildren, being sons, until he should have completed his twenty-fifth year, and that the shares of such of her said stepchildren as might be daughters should be invested by her said trustees, and held by them upon the same or similar trusts corresponding to those expressed of and concerning the legacy of £1,000 given to her goddaughter Anna, the wife of Sidney Willis.

At the time of the death of the testatrix Catherine Abbott was unmarried. She had since married, and was now the wife of Augustus Frigout.

This summons was taken out by the trustees of the will for the determination of the question whether the trusts declared of the sum of £3,500, bequeathed by the said Catherine, Mrs. Frigout, as aforesaid, were to any, and what, extent void having regard to the rule against perpetuities.

Beale, Q.C., and Fossett Lock, for the trustees and the children.—The limitations over in favour of the children are valid, and are not affected by the invalidity of the power of appointment, should it be invalid. The husband here must be ascertained in the lifetime of the wife, and the power is good. In re Harvey, Peek v. Savory, 39 Ch. D. 289, 37 W. R. Dig. 203; In re Frost, 38 W. R. 264, 43 Ch. D. 246; and In re Hargreaves, Midgley v. Tatky, 38 W. R. 470, 43 Ch. D. 401, are distinguishable, for they are cases of absolute powers given to persons who might never come into existence.

Buckley, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for Mrs. Frigout.—The limitations after the life interests are void, for although they are in favour of persons whose lives commence in the wife's lifetime, the selection is to be made by the parents or the survivor of them. Suppose the husband married after the testatrix's death were to survive his wife, he might, as such survivor, exercise the power and the estate would be tied up beyond the period allowed by law. The power of appointment itself is invalid. The fact that the children have come into existence has nothing to do with it. The test is whether it is possible that the determination of the persons to take would be suspended during the time of a life not in existence at the testatrix's death. The principle of In re Harvey, Peek v. Savory and the other cases cited applies here. The gift to the children is an original one in case of a contingency happening. [STIRLING, J., said that Slark v. Dakyns, 23 W. R. 118, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 35, showed that the gift over was not invalidated by the invalidity of the power of appointment. He also referred to Webb v. Sadler, 21 W. R. 394, 8 Ch. App. 419.] The limitations in Slark v. Dakyns are not similar to those in the present case.

They also mentioned In re Thatcher's Trusts, 26 Beav. 369, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 104.

Hastings, Q.C., for Mrs. Whitehead, tenant for life of the residue.

Ashton Cross, for Mr. Frigout.—The husband's life interest is valid.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2.—STIRLING, J., referred to the will, and continued:—The question which I am called upon by the summons to decide is whether the trusts by the will declared of the legacy of £3,500 are to any, and what, extent void within the rule against perpetuities. The objection to the validity of the trusts arises on the trust in favour of such one or more of Mrs. Frigout's children as the parents or the survivor of them shall by deed or will appoint. It is said that Mrs. Frigout might have married, or (if she become a widow) may hereafter marry, a husband who was not living at the death of the testatrix; that such husband may survive her and be in a position to exercise the power of appointment conferred on him as such survivor, and that as the result of this the property would or might be tied up for a greater period than the duration of a life or lives in being at the death of the testatrix and twenty-one years after that event; and it is contended that, not only is the power of appointment bad, but that the trusts in default of appointment are bad also. The powers of appointment conferred on Mrs. Frigout jointly with her husband, and on her if she survives her husband, appear to me to be valid; but the powers purported to be conferred on a husband of hers who may survive her may be, and I will assume are, open to objection. The main question which I have to consider is whether the trusts in default of appointment are thereby invalidated.

It is unquestionable that any limitation depending or expectant upon a prior limitation which is void for remoteness is invalid. The reason is that the persons entitled under the subsequent limitation are not intended to take unless and until the prior limitations are exhausted; and as the prior limitation, which is void for remoteness, can never come into operation, much less be exhausted, it is impossible to give effect to the intentions of the settlor in favour of the beneficiaries under the subsequent limitation: see Robinson v. Hardcastle, 2 T. R. 241; Routledge v. Dorril, 2 Ves. jun. 357; Beard v. Westcott, 5 B. & Ald. 801, Turn. & R. 25, and especially the comments of Lord St. Leonards on the last-mentioned case in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145, at pp. 181, 182. Speaking of the case of Beard v. Westcott he said that the Court of King's Bench held that "the gift over was void, not because it was not within the line of perpetuity, but expressly on the ground that I have adverted to—namely, that the limitation over was never intended by the testator to take effect unless the persons whom he intended to take under the previous limitation would, if they had been alive, have been capable of enjoying the estate, and that he did not intend that the estate should wait for persons to take in a given event, where the person to take was actually in existence but could not take."

This reasoning does not necessarily apply to limitations in default of appointment. In many, if not in most, cases of such limitations the intention is that they should take effect unless displaced by a valid exercise of the preceding power of appointment. For example, in Webb v. Sadler, 21 W. R. 394, 8 Ch. App. 419, where the donees of a limited power of appointment purported to exercise it by appointing to trustees upon such trusts as A. B., one of the objects of the power, should, with certain consents, appoint, and, in default of and subject to any such appointment, upon certain trusts that were within the power, it was held by the Court of Appeal that although the power of appointment purported to be conferred on A. B. was void, the trusts in default of appointment were valid. Lord Selborne, L.C., at p. 426, says: "The next question is, whether the subsequent appointments, 'in default of and subject to any such limitation or appointment,' containing dispositions in favour of the son, are so connected with the void power that, the void power failing, they fail also. It seems to me that such a construction would be expressly contrary to the declared intention. The declared intention is, that unless estates that would displace this gift to a son are created in favour of other persons by means of the power, then the son is to take under this part of the instrument; and if the power is void, then no such estate could be created, and the event never could arise which alone was meant to prevent the gift in favour of the son taking effect. The words 'and subject to' confirm this view. If it had been intended to create a charge, and the gift made to the son were 'subject to the charge,' then, if the charge did not arise, the son would have taken it free from that charge."

Although the words "subject to" do not occur in this case, it does not seem to me that the absence of them is material. The gift is in common form—viz., to the wife for life, with remainder to the husband for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage as the parents, or the survivor of them, should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children at twenty-one, or as regards daughters on marriage; and I think the intention was that the fund should pass to such of Mrs. Frigout's children as, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry, unless the interests then vested in their favour were effectually displaced by means of the power. If the power is to any extent invalid, the only result would be that these interests can never be displaced; it is not contended that these interests are in themselves obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, and in my opinion the trusts in default of appointment are valid.

During the argument I was strongly under the impression, which I still retain, that this very point had been repeatedly decided in accordance with the view which I have just expressed. I have searched for such cases, but have only been able to discover one—viz., Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq. 165, decided by Giffard, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, and it may be right that I should make a few remarks on that case. There a testatrix having power under her marriage settlement to appoint a fund in favour of her children, appointed a portion of the fund to her son for life with remainder to such persons as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for the three daughters of the marriage. Then she appointed further portions, and the will contained an ultimate residuary gift in favour of the three daughters. There is no judgment, but after the argument the Vice-Chancellor held that the power of appointment given by the will to the son was void for remoteness, but that the trust fund was well appointed to the three daughters of the testatrix under the residuary appointment. It is to be observed that the same persons take under the residuary gift as in default of appointment, so that the Vice-Chancellor had not to decide on the effect of the gift in default. Further, the power of appointment by will to strangers could only be valid on the footing of its being for the benefit of the child, but, as pointed out by Lord Selborne in Morgan v. Gronow, L. R. 16 Eq. 1, 21 W. R. Dig. 176, in such case the gift would be dependent on a condition that could only be ascertained beyond the perpetuity limits, and consequently the case might be treated as one of a limitation expectant on a limitation which is itself too remote. I propose, therefore, to declare that the trusts in default of appointment are valid; beyond this it seems unnecessary to go.

TUCKER v. VOWLES. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Plots sold by reference to plan—Printed form of agreement—Building scheme—Restrictive covenants, whether implied as governing the whole estate.

When plots forming part of a building estate are purchased, having been selected by reference to a plan showing a number of building plots with a house on each, and a printed form of contract for sale containing restrictive covenants is used, but with written variations in the purchaser's particular case, the purchaser is not justified in assuming the existence of a building scheme with restrictive covenants like his own binding on all the other plots.

The plaintiffs bought at a fee farm rent several plots, part of a building estate, having been shown a plan of the various plots, each with a house upon it. In the course of the negotiations they were informed by the vendors that the houses to be placed on the plots were to be of a value of not less than £800 each, and that on certain plots a stable might also be erected. They signed a printed form of agreement, with written variations, one of the printed clauses being to the effect that a purchaser should not place on his plot any building other than a dwelling-house of not less than £800 value, except a greenhouse.

The plaintiffs, having built a dwelling-house of the required value on each of their plots, obtained conveyances of their plots, whereby they covenanted not to alter the external elevation of any of their dwelling-houses, and not to place any other building on any of their plots except a greenhouse.

The defendant, one of the vendors, subsequently acquired the interest of his co-vendor in some other plots, facing those of the plaintiffs, and erected thereon a billiard room, conservatory, and stables for the use of his own house. He did not thereby commit a breach of any covenant contained in the conveyance to him.

Held, that the plaintiffs had no right to assume, when they purchased their plots, the existence of a building scheme, with restrictive covenants similar to their own, binding on every plot, and had no right of action against the defendant in respect of the buildings erected by him.

Trial of action.

In or about the year 1885 the defendant and another person named Shorland purchased some land at Clifton, near Bristol, amounting to six acres or thereabouts, which they proceeded to develop as a building estate by disposing of the greater part of it in plots as building sites at fee farm rents. A block plan, which had been prepared for the approval of the local sanitary authority, represented the property as divided into a number of plots, each containing a semi-detached dwelling-house, but no other building; and a tracing of part of this plan was hung up in the office of the vendors' solicitor for reference by intending purchasers. The plaintiffs, being desirous of obtaining part of the property, were, in the course of their negotiations with the vendors for that purpose, shown this tracing, by reference to which they selected the plots which they ultimately purchased; and they were informed by the vendors that the houses to be built on the respective plots were to be of the value of at least £800 each, and that on certain plots, which were pointed out to them on the plan, stables might be erected. They entered into and duly signed a contract with the vendors whereby they agreed to purchase four of the plots, the contract being contained in a printed form, which had been used in most of the sales of plots which had previously been made, and which provided that the grantee would erect upon each plot a dwelling-house worth not less than £800, and would not erect any other building except a conservatory in the rear of such dwelling-house, and to be of a specified height. The plaintiffs, having erected on each of the four plots a dwelling-house of the stipulated value, obtained conveyances thereof, whereby they entered into restrictive covenants not to alter the external elevation of their dwelling-houses, and not to erect on any of their plots any building other than a conservatory. The defendant, having built and being in occupation of a dwelling-house, for his own use, facing the plaintiffs' plots, proceeded to acquire two or three other plots adjoining his own, and to erect upon them a billiard-room, a conservatory, and a stable, also for his own use.

The plaintiffs, alleging that the whole estate was governed by the building scheme referred to, and that no buildings should be erected on any plot but such as were shown on the above-mentioned plan and permitted by the contract, claimed a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant to remove his billiard-room, conservatory, and stable. Conflicting evidence was given as to the verbal representations made to the plaintiffs before entering into their contract; and the defendant submitted that there was no more than a scheme for the development of the property as a residential estate.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., and Seddon, for the plaintiffs.—The building scheme which is admitted to have existed must be ascertained by reference to the plan shown to intending purchasers and to the printed form of contract. As to the right of a purchaser of one of several building plots to the benefit of the covenants entered into by other purchasers see Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 28 Ibid. 9, 9 Ch. D. 125, 11 Ibid. 866. The absence of a covenant by the vendors is immaterial where each purchaser is to enter into restrictive covenants, and the vendors intend to sell the whole estate: Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 15 Q. B. D. 261, 16 Ibid. 778, 33 W. R. Dig. 231. Nor is it material that the common obligation of all the purchasers was not contained in conditions at a sale by auction: Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12. An implied agreement as to building upon the plots may be ascertained from the transaction, though there is no express covenant: Mackenzie v. Childers, 38 W. R. 243, 43 Ch. D. 265.

Bowes v. Law, 18 W. R. 640, L. R. 9 Eq. 636, and Collins v. Castle, 36 W. R. 300, 36 Ch. D. 243, were also referred to.

Neville, Q.C., and Waggett, for the defendant.—The plan and printed form of agreement had nothing to do with any building scheme, but were prepared for other purposes. The latter was altered in writing to suit the case of each purchaser. The defendant is not bound by any such scheme as is alleged, and has broken no restrictive covenant in the conveyance to him.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., replied.

ROMER, J.—In my judgment this action must be dismissed. The plaintiffs' case is that there was at the date of their purchase a building scheme on the estate of the vendors, of which the plaintiffs' properties form part, binding on each plot, and therefore binding on the plots on which the defendant has built in the manner complained of, under which scheme each plot was to be bound by restrictions on building similar to those contained in the printed form of contract. To entitle the plaintiffs to judgment they must also show that such scheme, if there was one, was communicated to them or either of them, or that they were led to believe in the existence of such a scheme, and that the intention was that each one of the several purchasers of the different lots should be bound by, and should, as against the others, have the benefit of the covenants to be entered into by each of the purchasers. No doubt the vendors at that time contemplated selling the estate in building lots, generally speaking, and substantially according to the plan deposited with the sanitary authority, and that the houses to be erected on the estate should be of a good class, and, again speaking generally, of not less than £800 value. I think it may also fairly be said against them that they contemplated that as to many of the lots there should be some more or less restrictive covenants, and probably in many cases covenants somewhat similar to those into which the plaintiffs entered. But beyond this I do not think there ever was at the date I am considering, or at any time, a definite building scheme formed by the vendors, even to the effect that each plot should of necessity have one house upon it of a certain value, to which they intended to enforce rigid adherence. Nor do I think that the plaintiffs or either of them can be held to have been entitled, from any representations made, or from the plan which was seen by them, or at any rate by one of them, or from the fact that the body of the agreement signed was printed, to assume or to believe in the existence of any such definite building scheme as is suggested. On the contrary, I find that no inquiry was made by the plaintiffs or either of them as to the plan, that no representation of any kind was made by or on behalf of the vendors with respect to this printed agreement, and that the plaintiffs when they signed the agreement saw in their own case that the printed form in many respects was altered to suit the circumstances of their own special contract. And, lastly, I am satisfied on the evidence that it was not the intention that each one of the purchasers of these several lots should be bound by, or should as against the others have the benefit of, the covenants into which the plaintiffs entered in their agreement or any similar covenants.

No case has been cited at all like the present one. The court is asked to decide that if a vendor prepares a plan of a building estate showing lots with houses marked upon them, and a purchaser is shown that plan or sees it, and then his agreement with regard to a plot purchased by him happens to be on a printed form with alterations, the purchaser is entitled to assume that the whole estate is governed by a building scheme that each plot shall be definitely and without variation built upon strictly in accordance with the indications on the plan, and, moreover, that each plot shall be governed of necessity by the printed portions of his agreement. I think that to come to such a conclusion as this would be unjust.

I think this case fails for the reasons I have given, and the action must be dismissed, with costs.

Company — Winding up — Jurisdiction — Transfer of liquidation proceedings — Court without bankruptcy jurisdiction—Building society—City of London Court —Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 1, sub-section (5); s. 3, sub-section (1)—Order of Lord Chancellor of the 29*th of November*, 1890—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 96.

There is no jurisdiction to order the transfer of the winding-up proceedings of a limited company which is being wound up under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, to the City of London Court, the last-mentioned court being excluded from having jurisdiction to wind up under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

This was a summons by C. J. Stewart, the official receiver and provisional liquidator of the Real Estates Co. (Limited), for an order that all further proceedings in the liquidation of the company might be transferred to the City of London Court, where the winding-up proceedings of the Liberator Permanent Benefit Building Society were being carried on. It was stated in support of the application that the company was formed for the purpose of taking over properties of which the Liberator Society held mortgages, and that the assets of the company consisted of equities of redemption of small value, and that in order to realize the assets of the society it would be convenient to sell in many cases with the concurrence of the company, and the cost of the concurrence of the company would be materially diminished if the liquidation were in the same court as that in which the liquidation of the society was being carried on. The Liberator Society was established under the Building Societies Act, 1874. An order had been made to wind up the Real Estates

Co. in the High Court subsequently to the order to wind up the Liberator Society. The summons had been issued at the request of Mr. Commissioner Kerr. The application was made in both liquidations.

Theobald, for the summons.

Buckley, Q.C., and Whinney, for mortgagees of the Real Estates Co., opposed the summons for transfer. They admitted that they had no locus standi to appear on the summons, but were allowed to address the court in opposition to the summons. They suggested that the winding up of the company should be continued in the High Court, and the winding up of the Liberator Society transferred to the High Court.

The summons was heard on the 19th of November, and judgment delivered on the 3rd of December.

December 3.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a summons by the Real Estates Co. which asks that all further proceedings in the liquidation may be transferred to the City of London Court. I should have been extremely anxious if I had had the power to make the order asked for on this summons, because I am told that the company is very intimately connected with the Liberator Society, which is being wound up in the City of London Court, and it seems a desirable thing to do to have this company wound up by the same authority as that which is winding up the Liberator Society, which is really the principal matter, while this company is merely a subsidiary matter. I have, however, arrived at the conclusion that I have no power to make the transfer. The power of transfer which I have is given to me by section 3 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which enacts that (sub-section 1) "the winding up of a company or any proceedings therein may at any time and at any stage, and either with or without application from any of the parties thereto, be transferred from one court to another court, or may be retained in the court in which the proceedings were commenced, although it may not be the court in which the proceedings ought to have been commenced."

Now, in my judgment the word "court" necessarily means a court having jurisdiction under the Act to wind up, and, in my judgment, I have no power to transfer these proceedings to the City of London Court unless that court has jurisdiction to wind up, for if it did not the order would be futile, and the City of London Court, notwithstanding the order of transfer, would have no jurisdiction to continue the proceedings. It seems to me that there is no jurisdiction, the matter being governed by the provisions to which I will presently refer.

Sub-section 5 of section 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, provides that "the Lord Chancellor may, by order, exclude a county court from having jurisdiction under this Act, and, for the purposes of such jurisdiction, may attach its district, or any part thereof, to the High Court or to any other county court, and may revoke or vary any such order. In exercising his powers under this section the Lord Chancellor shall provide that a county court shall not have jurisdiction under this Act unless it has for the time being jurisdiction in bankruptcy." An order has been made by the Lord Chancellor, dated November 29, 1890, to the following effect:—"A county court which, at the time of the coming into operation of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, is excluded from having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, shall be excluded from having jurisdiction under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, until further order, and the district of any such county court shall, for the purposes of jurisdiction under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, be attached, until further order, to the court to which that district is attached at the time of the coming into operation of this Act for the purposes of jurisdiction in bankruptcy."

That being so, the question is whether the City of London Court was, at the time of coming into operation of the Act of 1890, excluded from having jurisdiction in bankruptcy.

Section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides as follows:—"The London Bankruptcy District shall, for the purposes of this Act, comprise the City of London and the liberties thereof, and all such parts of the metropolis and other places as are situated within the district of any county court described as a metropolitan county court in the list contained in the third schedule." The City of London Court is not mentioned in the third schedule, but the district over which it has jurisdiction is part of the district referred to in section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It seems to me, therefore, that, the City of London Court having no jurisdiction to wind up, I have no power to transfer these proceedings to that court. Although the question is not raised on this summons, it has been suggested that the proceedings in the City of London Court in the matter of the Liberator Society should be transferred to this court. But in my opinion there is no power to make such a transfer.

That appears to be the effect of the decision of North, J., in In re The London and Suburban Bank, 40 W. R. 326, [1892] 1 Ch. 604, where he held that a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876, is not within the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and cannot be wound up under that Act, and that such a society can only be wound up by the proper county court under the provisions of the Act of 1876 and the County Court Acts. The county court is also the court having jurisdiction to wind up building societies registered under the Act of 1874. In these circumstances I cannot take any step to bring these two liquidations together in a manner which it would be a benefit to all persons concerned that they should be.

He afterwards left the station and walked to certain licensed premises, where he was served with beer. The licensed premises were less than a mile from the station where he was employed, but more than three miles from his residence.

Held, that he was a bonâ fide traveller within section 10 of the Licensing Act, 1874.

Special case stated by the justices for the County of Chester.

At a court of petty sessions held at Daresbury, in Cheshire, the appellant, the holder of a licence for the "Horns Inn," Little Leigh, was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor to one Halsey during the time when the appellant's licensed premises were required by the Licensing Act, 1874, to be closed, viz., at 9.45 a.m. on a Sunday. Halsey was a porter in the employ of the London and North-Western Railway Co. His place of employment was at Acton Bridge Station, but he resided at Hartford, at a distance of more than three miles from the appellant's licensed premises by the nearest public thoroughfare. Early on the Sunday morning in question Halsey left his home, where he had slept on the previous night, walked to Hartford Station, a distance of three-quarters of a mile, and thence took the train to Acton Bridge Station, which was about two miles and a half from Hartford Station. After 8 a.m. Halsey had an interval of two hours, during which he was free from his work, and he walked along the road from Acton Bridge Station to the Horns Inn, which was less than a mile from the station. He entered the appellant's licensed premises, and was served with bread, cheese, and beer. The justices convicted the appellant, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of opinion that this conviction was wrong, and must be quashed. The only question is whether a person who is travelling bonâ fide may prolong his journey for the purpose of obtaining refreshment. Whether that is done habitually or only on one occasion is immaterial. This man, having done his work, was, in my opinion, entitled to go on to the appellant's premises, which were more than three miles from his house, for the purpose of obtaining refreshment. That was done bonâ fide by him, and not for the purpose of tippling, and therefore he was a bonâ fide traveller within the words of the Act.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. If Halsey's account of the matter is true and honest, and we must assume that it is, the case comes directly within the law as laid down in Oldham v. Sheasby.

At the date of the receiving order the debtor was in arrear in respect of gas supplied to his premises during the previous quarter, and the company in consequence cut off the supply, and declined to reconnect it at the request of the official receiver until the arrears were paid. The official reciver paid the amount claimed under protest. On application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for repayment,

Held, that the official receiver could not be said to be owner or occupier of the premises within section 11 of the Gas Act, 1871, and was, therefore, not entitled to call on the company to supply him with gas, and that the application of the trustee must fail.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order that a sum of £173, paid under protest by the official receiver to the South Metropolitan Gas Co., should be repaid.

The debtor, John Smith, was the owner of the Bon Marché at Brixton, and a receiving order was made against him on the 22nd of February, 1892.

The debtor was in arrear for the gas used in his business in respect of the quarter ending at Christmas, 1891, in the sum of £173 due to the South Metropolitan Gas Co., and on the 20th of February, 1892, he sent a cheque for the amount to the company.

This cheque was not presented at the bank until the 24th of February, 1892, after the receiving order had been made, and payment was in consequence refused.

An officer of the gas company thereupon called at the debtor's premises in respect of the matter, and on the debtor signifying his inability to give cash for the cheque, the company cut off the gas.

Information of this was given by the debtor to the official receiver, who wrote to the gas company guaranteeing payment for any future supply, but the company declined to reconnect the gas until the arrears had been paid.

The official receiver eventually paid the £173 under protest, and application was now made by the trustee in the bankruptcy for the repayment of this sum.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The question turns really upon the construction of the sections of the Gas Acts. The section mainly applicable is section 11 of the Act of 1871, which provides that the undertakers shall, upon being required so to do by the owner or occupier of any premises, give and continue to give a supply of gas for such premises, subject to certain conditions. I do not think it can be argued that the official receiver could be said to be the "owner," but I submit he falls within the word "occupier" of the premises. If the official receiver was occupier he had a right to demand a supply of gas and the company was bound to supply it. The position of the official receiver is defined by section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and he can fairly be described as the occupier of the estate. The business is very frequently no longer managed by the debtor, and he might really leave it.

They referred to the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, ss. 14, 17, 19, and to In re Thomas, 36 W. R. 143, 4 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 295.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mellor, for the South Metropolitan Gas Co.—The status of a person against whom a receiving order is made has been decided. His property is not divested: Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548. The wording of the Gas Acts is really conclusive of the present case. The official receiver cannot in any sense be called an occupier.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the gas company are right in their contention in this matter, and that the trustee is wrong. No doubt if the matter were to come before the Legislature again strong arguments would be urged for acquiring some provision to enable a receiver, under the circumstances of the receiver in the present case, to insist on a supply of gas without paying the arrears of the debtor against whom the receiving order is made. But I have no right to strain the Act of Parliament, and to insert into it by construction provisions which are not there in fact. It is conceded that the official receiver is not entitled to call on the gas company to supply him with gas unless he is an occupier or owner within the meaning of section 11. It is also conceded that there cannot be two owners or occupiers of the same undivided premises at the same time. That being so, it is plain the official receiver cannot claim the supply of gas as such official receiver unless he can say that the occupation of the debtor has determined. It is plain that the occupation of the debtor has not determined. The case of Rhodes v. Dawson shows that his estate is unaltered by the making of the receiving order. The same premises continue to be vested in him as before. But it was further said that the contract had been put an end to. I do not agree to that. Therefore we have it that the estate remained the same and the contract remained the same, and by that it seems to me that the occupation of the debtor remains the same. I do not know whether there might be a possible case where a debtor might abscond and leave his premises vacant under such circumstances that he would no longer be occupier. But there is no suggestion of that here, and the debtor was occupier in fact, notwithstanding the making of the receiving order and consequent appointment of the official receiver by virtue of the statute. The motion of the trustee must, therefore, be refused.

Application refused.

R. v. Dolan, Dears. C. C. 436, followed.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the chairman of the Court of Quarter Sessions of the county of London, as follows:—

Jacob Villensky and Mark Villensky were charged before me upon an indictment charging them with having feloniously received two dozen nightgowns of the goods and chattels of Carter, Paterson, & Co., before then feloniously stolen. Clark, the actual thief, pleaded "guilty" to the first count in the same indictment, charging him with the larceny of the same goods from Carter, Paterson, & Co.

It appeared from the evidence that the goods in question were packed in a parcel consigned by Messrs. McIntyre & Co., of the City of London, to Messrs. Crisp & Co., of Holloway, and the parcel was delivered by the consignors to Carter, Paterson, & Co., who are common carriers, for conveyance to the consignees. At the time of its delivery to the said carriers it had an address label upon it showing the name of the consignors as well as of the consignees.

In the ordinary course it arrived at the Goswell-road depôt of Carter, Paterson, & Co., and there also in the ordinary course it was, together with many other parcels, unloaded from the van in which it had been brought. Clark (the co-defendant who pleaded "guilty" to the larceny) was a carman in the employ of Carter, Paterson, & Co, and took part in the unloading, and was seen by Roberts, a fellow-servant, to remove the parcel from that part of the unloading platform which was appropriated for Holloway parcels and transfer it to the part appropriated for Spitalfields parcels.

Roberts, on examining the parcel, found on it a label addressed to "Jacobs & Co., Hanbury-street, Spitalfields." The prisoner Jacob Villensky resided and carried on business there as a chandler with the other prisoner Mark Villensky (who is his son), and it appeared that they were known by the name of "Jacobs."

Roberts reported to Carter, Paterson, & Co.'s superintendent, Mr. Waters, his finding of the parcel thus addressed.

Mr. Waters inspected it, and gave directions that it should be replaced in the Spitalfields part of the platform where Roberts had found it, and that a special delivery-sheet should be made out according to the label, "Jacobs & Co., Hanbury-street, Spitalfields," and that the parcel should be forwarded in a van to that address. In consequence of further directions from Mr. Waters two detectives travelled in the van to Hanbury-street. It did not appear that either Mr. Waters or Roberts knew at this time who were the consignees to whom the parcel had been addressed, and neither the consignors nor the consignees were informed of the substitution of the false address, nor of the consequent action of Mr. Waters, nor was Clark, the thief, informed of it.

The parcel was received by both the Villenskys in Hanbury-street under circumstances pointing clearly to the conclusion of complicity with the co-defendant Clark, and knowledge on their part that it had been stolen.

Upon that point no question arises.

At the conclusion of the evidence I inquired of the counsel for the prosecution whether he would desire that the indictment should be amended by substituting the names of the consignees, Crisp & Co., as the owners of the property for those of the bailees, Carter, Paterson, & Co. He declined to ask for any amendment.

Counsel for the defence then objected that there was no case to go to the jury, inasmuch as at the time the parcel was received by the Villenskys it had ceased to be stolen property, the bailees, Carter, Paterson, & Co., having recovered actual possession of it.

He cited, in support of this view, R. v. Dolan, Dears. C. C. 436, and R. v. Schmidt, 14 W. R. 286, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 15.

It appearing to me, however, that the present case was distinguishable from those, I overruled the objection, and I drew attention to the definition of the offence and to the words in the indictment following the statute "before then feloniously stolen" and "knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen."

The jury convicted both the Villenskys of feloniously receiving, but I postponed sentence and admitted them to bail pending the decision of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved upon the validity of the objection taken.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether that objection is, upon the facts above stated, a valid one or not. If valid the conviction to be quashed, if not valid it will stand.

Slade Butler, for the prisoner, cited R. v. Dolan, and was stopped by the court.

G. M. Cohen, for the prosecution.—The goods here had not come back into the possession of the owners; that distinguishes the present case from R. v. Dolan and R. v. Schmidt, and the conviction should stand.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think that this case is perfectly clear, and is covered by the case of R. v. Dolan. The prosecution, no doubt, have all the morals on their side, but unfortunately the law is not with them. The goods were stolen in the first instance, but the carriers, in whose name the prosecution was carried on, took them back and sent them away in a special van, giving instructions to their carter as to their delivery, and sending two detectives with them. It is perfectly clear that by this action they resumed possession of the goods, and, therefore, that the conviction cannot stand.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The only question is whether at the time the prisoners received these goods they were stolen property. That they were at first stolen there is no doubt, but the prosecutors afterwards resumed possession, and therefore when the prisoners received the goods they were not stolen.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. The case is concluded by R. v. Dolan, which seems to me to be not only good law, but sound sense also. To say that these prisoners can be convicted of feloniously receiving these goods because the words of the Act are "knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen" would be to make it an offence to receive goods which have at any past time been stolen.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Dolan's case is directly in point, and is an authority with which I entirely agree.

BRUCE, J.—I agree.

Conviction quashed.

Court of Appeal

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ.) [and Q. B. Div.] — Dec. 8.

JAY v. JOHNSTONE. (a.)

Limitation, Statutes of—Judgment debt—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8—Judgments Registration Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112).

Notwithstanding the Act 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, judgments come within section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and, in the absence of part payment or acknowledgment in writing, are barred by the lapse of twelve years.

Appeal from an order of Bruce, J., at chambers, refusing leave to the personal representatives of the deceased plaintiff to continue proceedings upon a judgment obtained against the defendant in 1878, upon the ground that the judgment debt was barred by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, the question being whether an ordinary judgment debt was barred after twelve years.

The action was tried in 1878 before Thesiger, L.J., and a jury at Cambridge, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for a sum of about £5,000. Proceedings had never been taken to enforce this judgment, nor had there been any acknowledgment or part payment.

In 1881 the plaintiff died, and in 1891 the defendant died. The executors of the defendant had become possessed of a large sum of money, and the personal representatives of the plaintiff now sought leave to be added as parties to, and to continue, the proceedings on the judgment obtained in 1878. The executors of the defendant resisted this application, and the master refused the application on the ground that the judgment debt was barred after the lapse of twelve years by reason of section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. The representatives of the plaintiff appealed.

Section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), provides: "No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued," &c.

The appeal was heard on the 1st and 2nd of November, 1892.

Montague Lush, for the appellants.—The question is whether the limitation applicable to ordinary personal judgments, such as the present, is twelve years, as provided by section 8 of the Act of 1874, or whether it is not twenty years. Section 40 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was identical with section 8 of the Act of 1874, except that in the Act of Will. 4 the period of limitation was twenty years, whereas in section 8 of the Act of 1874 it is twelve years. Otherwise the two sections are identical. The Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 referred exclusively to land, and the reason why judgments came under the twenty years' limitation in section 40 of that Act was because all judgments were then a charge upon land. From the time of the Statute of Westminster the Second, to the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, passed in 1864, judgments were a charge upon land, and became so, the moment the judgment was signed. So that when the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 was passed all judgments were a charge upon land; and when Shadwell, V.C., in Watson v. Birch, 15 Sim. 523, decided that the word "judgment" in section 40 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, applied to judgments generally, whether they affected land or not, the reason of that decision was that at that time all judgments were a charge upon land. In 1864 the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 was passed, and section 1 of that Act declared that judgments should no longer bind the land, until the land had been actually delivered in execution. Henceforward judgments ceased to be a charge on land, and the reason of the decision of the Vice-Chancellor in Watson v. Birch no longer applies. With the knowledge of this Act before them, the Legislature in passing the Act of 1874 might have expressly said that the word judgment there included all judgments, whether a charge on land or not. But they did not do so, which shows that they did not intend that judgments generally should be included in the Act of 1874. When Collins, J., decided this point in Hebblethwaite v. Peever, 40 W. R. 318, [1892] 1 Q. B. 124, he did so on the authority of Watson v. Birch, which is no longer applicable. The proper period of limitation is twenty years, as provided by section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 for actions of covenant or debt upon any bond or other specialty.

Finlay, Q.C., and Eve, for the respondents.—The case comes within section 8 of the Act of 1874, and the limitation applicable is twelve years. When a legal term has received a judicial interpretation, and when the Legislature afterwards uses that term, it must be taken that they have used the term in the meaning placed upon it by the judicial decision. This canon of construction was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Greaves v. Tofield, 28 W. R. 840, 14 Ch. D. 563. Applying that here, we find that in 1847 Shadwell, V.C., in Watson v. Birch, held that "judgment" in section 40 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, applied to judgments generally; therefore, when in 1874 the Legislature reproduce in section 8 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57 the identical words of section 40 of the Act of Will. 4, and use the same word "judgment," it must be taken that they so use the word with the judicial meaning already placed upon it by Shadwell, V.C. This shows that section 8 of the Act of 1874 applies to all judgments. As to the argument that the limitation applicable here is the twenty years given by section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, it must be remembered that this Act was passed in the same year, and soon after the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, which expressly dealt with judgments, and it is inconceivable that, when the Legislature had expressly dealt with judgments in section 40 of chapter 27 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, they should also intend judgments to be included in section 3 of chapter 42, without any mention whatever of judgments in that section.

They referred to Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511; Ex parte Tynte, 28 W. R. 767, 15 Ch. D. 125; and Hebblethwaite v. Peever.

Lush, in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case has been argued extremely well by Mr. Lush, but I confess I am unable to see any answer to the very short judgment I am about to pronounce, which appears to me to be founded upon principle and authority. The Act of 1874 limits the time for bringing actions and proceedings upon judgments to twelve years. It does that by way of reference to an Act of Will. 4, which had given twenty years. It is a well-known principle of construction, sanctioned by the Court of Appeal in Greaves v. Tofield, that where a subsequent Act uses a legal term, and that legal term has had put upon it a judicial interpretation, the Legislature uses the legal term in the sense affixed to it by legal interpretation. 'Judgment' in the Act of Will. 4 has received from Shadwell, V.C., such an interpretation. The word so interpreted is used by the Legislature in 1874, and it must be taken that the Legislature used the word 'judgment' in the sense in which Shadwell, V.C., construed it—that is to say, as including a judgment such as is now in dispute. I think that argument is clear and conclusive.

It is said, however, that there is an intermediate Act between the Act of Will. 4 and the Act of 1874, which has for certain purposes altered the word "judgment," and made the word "judgment" not to include land, and that, therefore, although this interpretation was placed on the word by the Vice-Chancellor in 1847, when it is said that judgments were a charge upon land, the same interpretation ought no longer to be placed on it as a judgment is no longer a charge on land. That result would be to my mind absurd; we must proceed upon certain well-known legal principles, and it seems to me that having got a decision founded on the grounds I have stated, the intermediate Act, which says nothing about limitation, does not affect limitation. Then we have a subsequent Act using the very same words as the Act of Will. 4, and this subsequent Act is to be construed according to legal principles by the light of legal interpretation. The Act of Parliament makes an end of the case, and ascertains that twelve years is for this sort of judgment, as well as for every other sort of judgment, the time in which the action or proceeding is to be brought. Not only are we proceeding upon well-known principles, but we have the authority of Shadwell, V.C., an authority never disputed since that time, and we have also a careful judgment of my brother Collins (Hebblethwaite v. Peever) to the same effect. We are therefore deciding in accordance with law, in accordance with the established principle of construction, and in accordance with the two decided cases. I think, therefore, the appellants' view must fail.

WILLS, J., concurred.

The representatives of the plaintiff appealed.

Witt, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the appellants.—When the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was passed judgments were charges on land. By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 they ceased per se to bind the land: Sheppard v. Duke, 9 Sim. 567; Watson v. Birch; Sutton v. Sutton; In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, 38 W. R. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106; Hebblethwaite v. Peever; Willaume v. Gorges, 1 Camp. 217; White v. Parnther, 1 Knapp. 179; Henry v. Smith, 2 Dr. & War. 381; Hunter v. Nockolds, 1 Mac. & G. 640. Under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 you have twenty years on a specialty. Therefore, if you have only twelve on a judgment, you will, by obtaining judgment on a covenant, shorten the period of limitation from twenty years to twelve. [LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt that the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 was passed over by the Legislature. I do not know if it was intended or not.] In the case of a judgment for payment by instalments, time would run from the date of the judgment, not from the date when an instalment became payable; for there may be "a present right to receive" before there is a present right to enforce: Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society, 38 W. R. 85, 24 Q. B. D. 1. If the respondents are right, nothing a creditor can do will stop the statute from running, unless he gets part payment or acknowledgment in writing, or brings a new action. In no case between 1864 and 1874 was the question ever raised.

Finlay, Q.C., and Eve, for the respondents, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This appeal is brought from a decision of the Divisional Court, and the question raised is an extremely important one—namely, whether any proceedings can be taken to enforce a judgment after the lapse of twelve years, there having been no payment or acknowledgment. Certainly there are difficulties arising from the course the Legislature has taken in dealing with the subject, and it is necessary to say a few words about the course of legislation. In the year 1833 Parliament, for some reason or other, passed two Acts relating to limitation. One was 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, which relates to actions for the recovery of land, and also (section 40) to actions for the recovery of money. Then there is 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, another Act which relates to specialties and certain other debts. Why the two were not blended in one I do not know, nor did it matter, because the time limited for the recovery of both classes of debts, and for bringing both classes of actions, was the same—namely, twenty years.

Whilst that was the state of the law the question arose, and came before Shadwell, V.C., which is the Act of Parliament which governs judgments? "Judgment" is specially mentioned in 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and not in the other Act, though, being a specialty, it might be, and primâ facie would be, included in 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. But Shadwell, V.C. (in Watson v. Birch), determined that, upon the true construction of these two statutes, the statute which related to judgments was 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40. Taking that view, he held that a judgment twenty years old could not be enforced even as against the personal estate of the judgment debtor. So he construed the Act in this way: not only cannot you enforce it against his real estate, but you cannot enforce it against his personal estate. That has been accepted and acted upon by everybody without question ever since, and the law, as settled by that decision and by other decisions which followed it, was to the short effect that under that Act a judgment was barred after twenty years.

Now it is very true that in 1833 and long afterwards judgments were charges on real estate and payable out of real estate, and it is very true that by reason of a change in the law relating to the registration of judgments a modification was introduced. In 1864 the law relating to the registration of judgments, which was well known to be extremely intricate and extremely troublesome, was simplified, and a judgment ceased to be a charge on land. Instead of it the writ of elegit was registered, and then, and not before, was there any charge in respect of the judgment debt; the practical effect of which was to render it unnecessary for purchasers of land to search for judgments. All they had to do was to search for writs; and another alteration was that a judgment per se did not operate as a charge so as to entitle a judgment creditor to priority. But it would have been straining the Act 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, which was passed for the purpose, and for the sole purpose, of improving the law relating to registration, to construe it so as to give effect to a totally different matter—namely, to alter the time within which a judgment could be enforced. So that I apprehend that, notwithstanding the alteration made in the registration of judgments by the Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), the true construction of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was in no way altered. There is no case which shows that after the Act 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 the construction of the Act of 1833 was altered, and I do not think it was.

Now we come to the Act of 1874, which is the present Act relating to the time for enforcing judgments. The key to that Act of Parliament is to be found, not in section 8, but in the preamble and in section 9. The preamble is this: "Whereas it is expedient further to limit the times within which actions or suits may be brought for the recovery of land or rent, and of charges thereon." Section 9 says: "From and after the commencement of this Act," 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 "shall remain in full force, and shall be construed together with this Act, and shall take effect as if" the period of twelve years had been substituted in such Act instead of the period of twenty years. The purpose is as clear as it can be. It is to substitute twelve years for twenty years in certain sections (including section 40) of the previous Act. It is not to change the meaning of the words used in the old Act, but to preserve it. I do not say that that is the whole, for there is a section relating to trusts, which has nothing to do with the case before us. Section 8 of the Act of 1874 is the one which more immediately applies to this case. Section 8 simply repeats the old language of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40, and runs thus [the Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] There is not a sign of any intention to alter the meaning of any of the words in that section and give them a meaning which they had not got, except to substitute twelve years for twenty years. The answer to the very ingenious argument we have heard is this, that it proceeds upon a mistake as to the effect of the Act of 1864 and upon a mistake in construing that Act so as to affect the Statute of Limitations, with which it had nothing at all to do. The argument is this, that in 1864 judgments ceased to be charges on land and therefore the Statute of Limitations ceased to affect them. But the fact is that in one sense they continued to be charges on land. That is the point. I am conscious of the perplexity in which people are put by the present state of the law on this subject. The cause of that perplexity is that in 1833 Parliament passed two Acts dealing with limitation, and that it has since altered one of them, but not the other. To adopt this argument would be to produce an effect never dreamt of by any one, and would be to reverse the course of decision for the last fifty years.

SIMON & CO. v. SEDGWICK. (a.)

Insurance, marine—Voyage—Risk—Distinction between insured voyage and risks insured—Deviation clause.

In construing an open policy of marine insurance in order to ascertain what risks are covered by the policy, it must first be ascertained what the voyage insured is. If the goods lost never were upon the insured voyage, then the policy never attached; and the fact that the policy contains a deviation clause is immaterial.

Consignors, at Bradford, of the goods in question, effected, through their agents at Liverpool, a marine policy of insurance from the Mersey to any port in Portugal or Spain "this side Gibraltar, and (or) at and from thence to any place in the interior, including all risks by any conveyance whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom until on board, . . . and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouse of the consignees." The policy contained the following marginal clause:—"Deviation and (or) change of voyage . . . not included in the policy, to be held covered at a premium to be arranged." The consignees were merchants at Madrid, and the consignors intended that the goods should be shipped at Liverpool for Seville and carried thence by land to Madrid. By the blunder of the consignors' agents the goods were in fact declared and shipped at Liverpool on board a vessel bound only for Carril and Huelva, on the west coast of Spain, and for Carthagena and other ports on the east coast of Spain. The bills of lading of the goods in question were made out for Carthagena. The consignors only discovered the mistake after the vessel had sailed. The vessel was lost between Liverpool and Carril, a part of the voyage common to vessels bound either for the west or the east coast of Spain.

Held, that the goods in question never were upon the insured voyage; that, consequently, the policy never attached; and that the underwriters were not liable to pay the consignors the amount of the goods in question.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought on a marine policy of assurance on merchandise and sundries "as interest may appear or be hereinafter declared . . . lost or not lost at and from the Mersey or London to any port in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar, and (or) at and from thence by any inland conveyances to any place or places in the interior; including all risks by any conveyance whatsoever from the time of leaving the warehouse in the United Kingdom until on board, in craft to or from vessel or vessels, of lighters on the rivers or elsewhere, of fire whilst awaiting shipment in docks, warehouses, hulks, or elsewhere, and (or) in transit of transhipment, of steam navigation, and all risks of every kind until safely delivered at the warehouses of the consignees, and including all liberties per bills of lading . . . of and in the good ship called. . . ." The policy contained the following marginal clause: "Deviation and (or) change of voyage, and (or) transhipments, not included in this policy, to be held covered at a premium to be arranged."

The plaintiffs in the action were manufacturers at Bradford, and the policy (which was an open policy and in the ordinary Lloyd's form) was made out in the name of insurance brokers on behalf of the plaintiffs; the defendants were the underwriters of the policy. The policy was dated the 18th of February, 1891. On the 27th of February and on the 2nd of March, 1891, the plaintiffs forwarded to Liverpool four packages (forming the subject-matter of the present action) of goods; the first package was sent by the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, and the other three by rail. The consignees of the goods were merchants at Madrid. The plaintiffs instructed their agents at Liverpool to insure the goods, and stated that the goods were going from Liverpool viâ Seville to Madrid. The plaintiffs' goods were, in fact, through some blunder, shipped by the plaintiffs' agent on board the vessel Lope de Vega (and the name of that vessel was afterwards—viz., on the 18th of March declared, and inserted in the policy) to be delivered to the consignees at Carthagena. The voyage of The Lope de Vega was first for Carril and Huelva on the west coast of Spain, and thence for Malaga and Carthagena on the east coast of Spain. She sailed from Liverpool bound for those places on the 7th of March, and was lost between Liverpool and Carril.

The plaintiffs claimed £425, the amount of their interest under the policy in respect of the four packages of goods.

Wright, J., at the trial of the action, gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the appellants.—The goods were shipped for Carthagena. The vessel by which they were shipped was totally lost before it got to Carril, a port on the west coast of Spain. The goods are covered by the policy: Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 21 W. R. 810, L. R. 8 C. P. 649. [They were stopped.]

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Archibald H. Hamilton, for the respondents.—The policy only attached to goods shipped from the Mersey to a port in Spain or Portugal this side Gibraltar. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Suppose the goods were lost in the canal going from Bradford to Liverpool; do you say the policy does not attach?] Yes; the policy would not then cover the goods, as there had been no appropriation of a shipment from the Mersey to a port in Spain or Portugal this side Gibraltar. The goods must have been forwarded on the voyage which the policy was intended to cover in order that the policy should attach. The voyage must be first defined before the words "excluding" or "including" become applicable. The policy is a marine policy, and it is marine risks substantially that are insured against. The governing words are those which limit the risks to marine risks, and the other words are subsidiary. If the marine voyage had been abandoned altogether, could it be said that the policy attached? A voyage means primarily the sea transit from one port to another; though the risks covered would include as well subsidiary risks inland.

Cohen, Q.C., in reply.—The terminus ad quem has never been altered, and unless the other side can show that the terminus ad quem was abandoned the policy attaches. [BOWEN, L.J.—It is put against you that it was an essential part of the terminus ad quem that the goods should be unloaded at a port this side Gibraltar. There may be more than one terminus; there may be a marine terminus and a land terminus, but the marine terminus is to govern.] The insured voyage is that in respect of which the underwriters insured the risk. The policy here includes the risks from any place in the United Kingdom to Liverpool, and the insured voyage would be included therein. The goods were on the insured voyage the moment they left Bradford.

LINDLEY, L.J.—[The Lord Justice read the policy above set out, and also the marginal clause therein, and proceeded:—] The real question we have to consider is whether this policy did, or did not, ever attach to the goods sent by the person for whom this policy was effected from Bradford, under the following circumstances: The goods were intended by the merchants (the plaintiffs) to go to Madrid; and I think the correspondence shows that they were intended to go to Madrid by the mode in which similar goods of the plaintiffs had gone before—i.e., viâ Liverpool and Seville. Unfortunately these goods were not shipped from Liverpool to any port west of Gibraltar, but by some blunder they were shipped to a port east of Gibraltar—namely, Carthagena, one of the places to which the vessel on which they were shipped was going. That port was not a port such as is described in the words of the policy—i.e., "a port in Portugal or Spain this side Gibraltar." The ship was lost between Liverpool and Carril; the ship was going first to Carril and then, as I understand, to a port in the south, which would be the place for discharging the goods if they were going to Seville, then the ship was going on through the Straits of Gibraltar to Carthagena and other places.

Mr. Cohen says that, upon the true construction of this policy, it was a policy from Bradford to Madrid. If it be so, then I think his opponents do not deny that the underwriters would be liable; but it is contended on their behalf that this is not a policy from Bradford to Madrid at all, and after consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the view of the underwriters is right, for the following reasons.

What are the risks included in the above policy? It is an insurance from the Mersey to some port in Spain this side Gibraltar, and unless these goods were insured for that voyage there is nothing to bring in these risks at all. The argument for the plaintiffs must first start with this, that the goods were insured from Liverpool to some place this side Gibraltar. They never were, and the plaintiffs cannot extend the policy to cover risks not included in the voyage for which these goods were insured. That appears to me to be the short and conclusive answer to Mr. Cohen's argument. In other words, this policy is not a policy from Bradford to Madrid, and the plaintiffs are unable, by reason of the blunder which has been committed, to bring themselves within the risks which are included in a voyage for which these goods are insured. I think the view taken by Wright, J., is right. I did not take the same view at first, but I do now. I think this policy never attached, and, that being so, the marginal clause about deviation or change of voyage does not affect the case.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The real fate of the appeal depends upon the answer we give to the question, "Did this policy ever attach?" The policy when construed seems to me to be tolerably clear. We start with this, that the policy is a marine policy to begin with—a land journey being superadded to it, but forming part of the entire journey which the goods are to make, and the duration of the risk becomes applicable accordingly to the entire journey.

The first thing we have to do is to discover what the voyage or journey is which is to be insured. We must do that in order to see what voyage or journey the duration of risk is applicable to, in order to consider what risks are included by enumeration under the policy.

The voyage is a distinct thing altogether from the enumeration of the risk. The voyage here seems to me to be fixed by words which it is impossible to extend, and which it is impossible to misunderstand. It is, "At and from the Mersey and (or) London, both or either to any port or ports in Portugal and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar." So much for the words which define the initial marine transit, to which is superadded the land transit, "and (or) at, and from, thence by any inland conveyance to any place or places in the interior, including all risks by rail and per steamer between Lisbon and Oporto." It seems to me that the terminus with which the voyage or journey begins is the "Mersey and (or) London, both or either." Then there is a terminus with which the marine transit is to end, which is an essential part of the definition of this journey, "To any port or ports in Portugal, and (or) Spain this side Gibraltar." Again, there is a further terminus, which is fixed for the land journey, which is superadded, "any place or places in the interior." Now the policy remains to a great extent a marine policy; it is not a marine policy which ends as soon as the sea is crossed, but a marine policy to which is superadded a land transit which is intended to be covered by the period during which the goods are to be protected. But the voyage is defined as clearly as a voyage can be defined.

Now we all know the general history of the extension of the protection which the policy provides for the goods, by the enumeration of risks slightly outside the marine transit. Mr. Hamilton referred to that, and I think he was correct in saying that it was by slow growth that risks outside the sea journey have been swept under—so to say—the shelter of the policy. In fact, as no one can recollect better than Mr. Cohen—at the time of the French War, twenty years ago—the common form of policy was a point which gave rise to the greatest interest on the part of the profession, and many lawyers were consulted about that particular form of policy and the liabilities it was supposed to create. But the truth is that in construing the whole of the obligations and protections to which the policy applies, you must first keep distinct in your mind what the voyage is, and what the definition of the risks. One arrives first at the definition of the voyage, and then applies the definition of the voyage to the enumeration of the risks.

Now, here the goods started from Bradford, and it has been contended that the moment they started from Bradford they were upon the insured voyage. If the goods had ever been upon the insured voyage, it seems to me that the risk during the time that they were between Bradford and Liverpool would have been covered as incidental to and supplementary to the insured voyage. But we have here a conclusive fact that the goods never were upon the insured voyage. Accordingly the risk between Bradford and Liverpool never could be incidental or supplementary to it. It is not necessary to decide what would have been the case supposing the goods, after having been specifically appropriated by a contract of carriage to the insured voyage, were injured or lost during the transit between Bradford and Liverpool. It is not necessary to decide that case. In this case the facts here show conclusively that the goods were never specifically appropriated to the insured voyage, because the person who had the control of the goods—the person who had the power of fixing the voyage on which the goods were ultimately to go—fixed the voyage outside the policy; and if that is so, the policy never attached, and it follows that the clause as to deviation and change of voyage cannot affect it.

Now it has been said that this is a technical point. The particular case certainly seems a hard case. But it is a most important one, from a business point of view. I cannot conceive a more important point, nor can I conceive one which might lead to more mischief if we were to loosely construe this contract in order to assist a particular owner of goods. We cannot do that when we are dealing with an insurance contract. Men of business depend upon a correct interpretation of the law, and we shall be adopting a course which in the long run is more conformable to justice and fair dealing if we keep it to its channel, than if we in any particular case stretch the law in order to protect a particular plaintiff.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an action brought under a Lloyd's policy to recover for a total loss of goods at sea. That is the claim. The defence is that the goods never were upon the voyage insured by the policy, and were never covered by the policy, and that the policy therefore never attached. That is the issue. Wright, J., has held that the defendants are right; and, although at first sight this does appear, considering the facts of the case, a somewhat technical defence, I quite agree with what has fallen from Bowen, L.J., that that does not make it any the less incumbent upon us to put the proper construction upon this policy. Now a good deal of this policy is in the old form, as far as I can gather, and the point to ascertain first of all is, What is the voyage covered by the policy, in order to ascertain whether the policy attaches to the goods in question.

Now this policy begins that the plaintiffs are insured at and from the Mersey to the west coast of Spain, and (or) at and from the west coast of Spain to places in the interior of Spain. Now, that is the voyage which is contemplated in this policy. Then how does the policy go on? When you get what the voyage is, then come the risks which are to be included in that voyage; and as I read this policy, when you once get the goods upon the voyage in question, then the risk which the underwriters undertake covers the risk from the warehouse to the ship in this country, and from the ship to the warehouse in the other country. But unless you get the goods started upon, or allocated by contract—as Bowen, L.J., says, and I adopt that phrase—to go upon the insured voyage, in my judgment this policy does not attach. Now it is said here that this policy attached, no matter what voyage the goods ultimately might go upon, immediately the goods left Bradford. I do not read the policy in that way at all; until you get the contemplated voyage, and the goods upon that contemplated voyage, in my judgment this policy does not attach; and it is a mistake to read in here that this policy is at and from Bradford to the east coast of Spain. It is at and from the Mersey to the west coast of Spain, and when you get that voyage, then it is that the risks attached to the goods between Bradford and the Mersey. It seems to me that until this policy attached—and this is conceded on both sides—the marginal clause about deviation and change of voyage does not apply at all. In my opinion Wright, J., was right in holding that the underwriters' defence was correct, and that these goods never were at risk upon the insured voyage, and that, therefore, the policy never attached.

Action.

This was an action by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to recover possession of land at Ealing.

In 1805 the then Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London, and parson of the parish church of Ealing granted a freehold lease for three lives of the glebe lands and hereditaments of which he was seised in fee simple. The last of the lives dropped in 1874.

In 1807 the lessees under that lease granted a sub-lease of part of the property for ninety-nine years, determinable on the dropping of the lives in the principal lease. This sub-lease therefore expired in 1874.

In 1832 the persons then entitled to the lease of 1805 surrendered the lease to the chancellor, and by an instrument dated the day after the surrender a new lease was granted to the same parties for other lives. This lease was by common law demise, and bore an indorsement of livery of seisin. The last of these lives dropped in 1891.

The plaintiffs, claiming through the chancellor, whose title accrued to them on his death in 1839, by virtue of the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, had ever since received the rent reserved by the lease of 1832.

In July, 1871, the persons then entitled to the premises comprised in the sub-lease of 1807 purported to sell the same as the owners thereof in fee simple, and the same were, in April, 1872, conveyed accordingly; the defendant Treemer and the persons through whom he derived his title had remained in possession ever since without paying any rent, and now claimed to be entitled in fee simple, on the ground that the plaintiffs' title accrued in 1874, and their right to recover was barred by virtue of the present Statute of Limitations.

The Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 2, enacts that no person shall bring an action to recover land but within twelve years after the time at which the right to do so first accrued to him, and, as to estates in reversion or remainder, that the right to bring such an action shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time when such estate became an estate in possession by the determination of the prior particular estate; but if the person last entitled to the particular estate was not in possession when his interest determined, no such action may be brought by any person becoming entitled in possession but within twelve years after the time at which the right to bring such action first accrued to the owner of the particular estate, or within six years after the time when the estate of the person becoming entitled in possession became vested in possession, whichever shall be the longer period.

Byrne, Q.C., and B. B. Swan, for the plaintiffs.—No right of entry accrued to us until the determination of the lease of 1832—i.e., until 1891, when the last of the three lives for which it was granted dropped.

Levett, Q.C., and H. Terrell, for the defendant.—

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs' right of entry accrued in 1874 on the dropping of the last life in the lease of 1805 and the sub-lease: See 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 3, 5, 8, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, ss. 1, 2. On the surrender in 1832 of the lease of 1805 the lessor had a reversion in the estate expectant on the determination of the sub-lease; the lease of 1832 passed a mere interesse termini, that is to say, only a right of entry; therefore, the plaintiffs had in 1874, in virtue of the reversion then vested in them, a right of entry on the determination of the sub-lease in 1874, when the interesse termini, created by the lease of 1832, ought to have been converted into a present term by delivery of possession. [CHITTY, J., referred to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9.] This surrender was prior to the Act of 1845, which does not affect it. [CHITTY, J., referred to Blackstone's Definition of an Estate in Reversion, vol. 2, marginal p. 175.] The lease of 1832, then, did not create a tenancy till entry: see Shepherd's Touchstone, 7th ed., by Preston, vol. 2, pp. 276, 303, 324; Co. Litt. 46*b*; Bac. Abr., vol. 4, p. 844 (M.). Until entry under the lease the lessor has power to bring ejectment: Doe d. Rawlings v. Walker, 5 B. & C. 111. The statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 6, simply removes the inconveniences of the common law: see the opinion of Lord Tenterden, C.J., in Doe d. Palk v. Marchetti, 1 B. & Ad., at p. 721, and does not operate to confer any estate. Corpus Christi College v. Rogers, 49 L. J. Ex. 4, 28 W. R. Dig. 133, and Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Rowe, 29 W. R. 159, 5 App. Cas. 736, see Lord Selborne's speech especially, are in our favour. Moreover, though there is an indorsement of livery of seisin on the lease of 1832, the lessor, being out of possession, could not give seisin: see Perkins' Profitable Book, s. 221, and Shepherd's Touchstone, vol. 1, p. 213. The livery is, therefore, not a good livery, and the lease is consequently invalid.

Swan, in reply.—If the sub-lease had been surrendered, there would have been no question as to the validity of the new lease, and, in virtue of the statute of 4 Geo. 2, the new lease is as valid as if the sub-lease had been surrendered; therefore the new lease granted the reversion expectant on the determination of the sub-lease, and the lessees were for all purposes landlords of the sub-lessees. The lease of 1832 operated to pass an estate, not a mere right. And, with regard to livery of seisin, there is a presumption now of the tenant having consented to seisin being given in 1832, and with the tenant's consent there could be a good livery by the lessor: see Shepherd's Touchstone, "Feoffments," vol. 1, p. 206. We have six years from the determination of the lease of 1832, or twelve years from 1874 for bringing our action: see Pedder v. Hunt, 35 W. R. 371, 18 Q. B. D. 565.

Reference was also made in the course of the argument to Coe v. Clay, 5 Bing. 440; Drury v. Macnamara, 4 W. R. 50, 5 Ell. & B. 612; Jinks v. Edwards, 4 W. R. 303, 11 Ex. 775; Co. Litt. 270*b*; and Platt on Leases, vol. 1, pp. 691, 788.

CHITTY, J.—This is an action by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners claiming possession of lands at Ealing, of which the Chancellor of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London, and parson of the parish church of Eling (now Ealing), in the county of Middlesex, was seised in fee simple in his corporate capacity. The defendants raised the Statute of Limitations as a defence to their claim. The plaintiffs said that their right to recover possession first accrued in 1891. The defendants, on the other hand, said that the plaintiffs' right first accrued in 1874, and, if that right first accrued in 1874, then the statute, which was a twelve years' statute, now constituted a bar to the action. If the defendants are right as to that, the statute is clearly a bar to the plaintiffs' action. No question was raised before me in argument on section 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27.

The facts are not in dispute. The chancellor in 1805 granted a freehold lease of (inter alia) the premises sought to be recovered for three lives, the last of which dropped in 1874, the date to which the defendants' argument relates. The tenants in 1807 sub-leased part of the property for a term of ninety-nine years, determinable on the dropping of the three lives, for which the lease of 1805 was granted. The sub-lease ran out in consequence in 1874. In 1832 there was a surrender by the persons entitled to the lease of 1805 to the chancellor. At the same time, but, as was usual, by an instrument dated the following day, the chancellor granted a new lease for three lives. This lease was consequently a freehold lease. The last of these lives dropped in 1891, and that is the date from which the plaintiffs say that their title accrued. The plaintiffs, who take the title of the chancellor under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, have received, since his reversionary title accrued to them in 1839, the rent reserved on the new lease of 1832 to its termination in 1891. The defendants have, however, since 1874, when the sub-lease expired, been in actual possession of the land comprised in the sub-lease without paying any rent, which is equivalent to saying without having any lawful title.

I shall first mention some points which were referred to in argument, but dropped. It was said that there passed by the lease of 1832 only an interesse termini. I challenged counsel to produce any authority, either from cases or text-books, to show that that phrase was applicable to the case of a freehold, and no authority could be produced. It is plain that the phrase extends only to the interest which a termor has before taking possession by force of the lease which has been made to him. I referred to Litt., s. 459, and Coke's commentary thereon, particularly 270*b*, where he points out the diversity of a lease for life and for years with reference to entry on land. I could, if necessary, multiply authorities on this point, but I am satisfied that the expression is never used with regard to a freehold lease. The object, of course, was to show that no estate passed under the new lease of 1832, but a mere right to take possession.

Then there was the argument about livery of seisin. There is the usual indorsement of livery on the lease of 1832. Livery of seisin was required at that time for the perfecting of a lease which was to take effect at common law and not in virtue of the Statute of Uses. But it was said that the indorsement was imperfect, and therefore void, because it was not shown that the terre tenant—that is, the person in possession under the sub-lease of 1807—had assented to the livery of seisin of the land, and Perkins' Profitable Book, s. 221, was cited for the purpose of supporting that proposition. But, the deed being more than thirty years old, I am of opinion that not only was there, as is shown by the indorsement on the lease, livery of seisin, but that the livery was valid. The principle omnia præsumuntur rite acta applies to such a matter, and I think that the tenant under the sub-lease must be taken to have assented to livery of seisin, if his assent was required (about which there may be a question, having regard to the statute of Geo. 2). This point was raised also for the purpose of showing that no estate passed by the new lease of 1832.

Now I refer to the 6th section, which is the important section of 4 Geo. 2, c. 28. In my opinion it will be seen from that enactment that entry on the land for the purpose of perfecting the new lease as against those who held under the sub-remuneration. The costs of the Treasury and the particular costs of the liquidator in reference to the proceedings for the application of the deposits must be paid out of the deposits, and the residue must be apportioned amongst the meritorious creditors of the company. The case of In re Lowestoft Tramways Co. does not touch the point which I have had to decide.

In re SOUTH HAMPSHIRE RAILWAY AND PIER ACT, 1891.

Ex parte CHAMBERS. (a.)

Railway company—Parliamentary deposit—Abandonment of undertaking—Release of deposit—Jurisdiction—Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1.

Summons by the persons who had made a parliamentary deposit on behalf of a railway company for a transfer of the deposit. The company had acquired no land and raised no capital. Their powers of compulsory purchase had expired. They had passed a resolution to abandon the undertaking. The time limited by their Acts for the completion of the undertaking had still three years to run.

Held, that, under the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, the court had no jurisdiction to order a transfer of the deposit fund until the time limited for the completion of the undertaking had arrived.

Adjourned summons.

The South Hampshire Railway and Pier Co., under certain Acts of Parliament, obtained powers to construct a railway, &c., in Hampshire. Under these Acts a sum of £7,488 was deposited with the Paymaster-General to secure the completion of the undertaking. This sum, after providing for the compensation of landowners, &c., was to be forfeited to her Majesty if the undertaking was not completed within a specified time.

The said undertaking not being carried out, the South Hampshire Railway and Pier Act, 1891, extended the time limited for the completion of the works to 1895, and also by section 8 made provisions for the release of the deposit fund. The public Act of 1892 entitled the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, sub-sections 1, 2, and 3, completely cover section 8 of the railway company's private Act, and provides as follows:—

Section 1, sub-section 1.—"Where in pursuance of any general or special Act of Parliament . . . moneys or securities have been deposited with . . . the Paymaster-General to secure the completion by any company of any undertaking authorized by Parliament . . . and the undertaking has not been completed within the time limited in that behalf, the High Court may, notwithstanding anything in any such general or special Act, order that the moneys or securities . . . or any part thereof, be applied towards compensating any landowners . . . whose property has been interfered with . . . by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the undertaking. . . ."

Sub-section 2.—"Subject to payment of any such compensation, and notwithstanding any provision as to forfeiture to the Crown, the High Court may, if a receiver has been appointed . . . or the undertaking has been abandoned, order that the deposit fund . . . be paid to the receiver. . . ."

Sub-section 3.—"Subject to such application as aforesaid, the High Court may, after such public notice as to the court seems reasonable, order that the deposit fund . . . be paid . . . to the depositors."

The company had acquired no land, had given no notice for that purpose, and had raised no capital. The time limited by their special Acts for the compulsory purchase of land had expired. The company had passed a resolution that the necessary steps be taken to abandon the undertaking and obtain the retransfer of the fund deposited.

This was an application by Messrs. C. & W. Chambers that the fund deposited now standing to the credit of ex parte C. & W. Chambers on behalf of the South Hampshire Railway and Pier Co. might be transferred to the said C. Chambers.

J. D. Fitzgerald, for the summons.—The undertaking has been abandoned. It is now out of the company's power to complete the works. The court can, therefore, order the return of the deposit fund.

Broomfield, for the company, supported the application.

NORTH, J.—I do not see that I have jurisdiction in this case. This company would, according to the old law, have forfeited the money deposited unless it avoided doing so by obtaining an Act of Parliament called an Act of Abandonment. Certain relaxations have been made in the law, and changes have been made in the company in this respect, but I need not go into them, for the public Act of 1892 goes quite as far as the company's private Act. [His lordship then read the Parliamentary Deposits and Bonds Act, 1892, s. 1, and continued:—] Now the time given to the company for completion of their works does not expire until 1895, that is to say, there are three years yet to run, and there is nothing to indicate that the undertaking could not be completed within that time, although it is probably correct that the company could not complete it under their existing powers. But, still, I do not consider that the court has jurisdiction where the time limited for the completion of the undertaking has not expired. It is said it is strange if the Legislature has said you must wait, and the deposit-money must be tied up. But the only question I have to decide is, Have I jurisdiction? And I am of opinion that the power given by the Act to the court cannot be exercised until the time limited has arrived.

PERKINS v. BAGOT. (a.)

Will—Construction—Power of appointment exercised subject to condition—Excess of power—Fraud on power—Hotchpot clause—Intention.

A testator devised real estate on trust for sale and conversion, and directed a third of the proceeds of the sale to be held on trust for each of his daughters for her life, and after her death in trust for such of her children or their issue born in her lifetime as she should by will or deed appoint, and, failing any such appointment, in trust for all her children in equal shares. A general hotchpot clause followed. The testator then directed two other funds to be held by his trustees on the same trusts. One of the testator's daughters by will appointed part of the trust moneys to her two sons on condition that they should resign a benefit accruing to them under their father's will (whereby the residuary estate of the testatrix, which was given to a stranger, would be enlarged), and, failing their compliance with this condition, the testatrix appointed the fund to one of her daughters.

Held, that the appointment was a fraud on the power, and that the share must go as if unappointed.

Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. sen. 640, discussed.

Held also, that the testator's intention was not to create three funds, but one fund, and that, therefore, there was one general hotchpot clause applying to the whole share of the issue of testator's daughter in the moneys accruing to them under his will.

By his will, dated the 6th of December, 1851, Henry Perkins devised his freehold hereditaments at Hanworth, Feltham, in the county of Middlesex, to the use of his son Algernon Perkins for life, with divers limitations over in favour of his issue, and in the event of the failure of such issue (which event occurred) to the use of his trustees on trust for sale and investment. And he directed his trustees to "stand possessed of and interested in one-third part of the said last-mentioned trust moneys upon trust" "that they shall and do pay the annual income thereof unto my daughter Sophia Paley, the wife of Thomas Paley, Esq., for her sole and separate use," and after the death of the said Sophia Paley testator declared that his trustees should "stand and be possessed of and interested in the said one-third part of the said trust moneys in trust for all and every or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or more remote issue of the said Sophia Paley (such issue to be born in her lifetime) as the said Sophia Paley shall by will or deed appoint, and in default of such appointment, and in so far as no such appointment shall extend, in trust for all and every the children and child of the said Sophia Paley who, whether in her lifetime or after her decease, being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters attain that age or marry under it, and if there be but one such child the whole to be in trust for such one child." Testator then declared that another equal one-third portion of the said trust moneys should be held on the same trusts for another daughter, Selina Scriven, and her issue, and continued: "And as to the remaining one-third part of the said trust money upon such or the like trusts, and with, under, or subject to such or the like powers and provisions, in all respects in favour of or relating to my daughter Matilda, the wife of Edward Bagot, her children or child or more remote issue, and with such restrictions or qualifications during the lifetime of the said Matilda Bagot as are hereinbefore declared in favour of, or for the benefit of, or relating to the said Sophia Paley, and her child or children or more remote issue, of or concerning the one equal third part, the trusts whereof are firstly hereinbefore declared of the said trust moneys, and the annual income thereof, in the same manner in all respects as if the same trusts, powers, and provisions had been here repeated, with the substitution of the name of the said Matilda Bagot for that of the said Sophia Paley." The usual hotchpot clause followed in reference to the shares of the said Sophia Paley, Selina Scriven, Matilda Bagot, and their respective issue in the said trust moneys. The testator then bequeathed a sum of money designated in his will as the "note account" "with, under, and subject to the same powers, provisions, and declarations" as he had declared concerning the clear proceeds to arise from the sale of his said hereditaments at Hanworth in the event of the failure of issue of his said son. The testator also appointed that a fund known as the Randall Fund, over which he had a power of appointment after the death of one Elizabeth Randall, should on the happening of that event be transferred to his trustees to be held by them on the same trusts.

The testator, H. Perkins, died on the 15th of April, 1855, and his will was proved on the 23rd of April, 1855. E. Randall died on the 19th of March, 1860. Matilda Bagot had four children—Ponsonby Bagot, Villiers Spencer Bagot, Evelyn Harriet, wife of A. W. Bernal, and Ethel Jane, the wife of G. Paton—all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years. Under or by virtue of certain deeds of appointment and other instruments executed by Matilda Bagot, E. H. Bernal, and E. J. Paton respectively, the whole of the share of Matilda Bagot and her issue in the trust moneys other than the Randall Fund stood limited, as to £21,300 in trust for E. H. Bernal for her life, with remainder to her issue, and as to £21,300 in trust for the trustees of the marriage settlement of Jane Paton. Portions of the Randall Fund had also been appointed by Mrs. Bagot to each of her four children. Under the will of her deceased husband E. Bagot, dated the 7th of September, 1870, and two codicils thereto dated the 8th of January, 1872, and the 24th of October, 1872, respectively, Mrs. Bagot was entitled to the possession of certain furniture, or if sold to the interest of the money arising from such sale, and her two sons above named were entitled to such furniture or the principal of such money at her decease. The furniture was sold in Mrs. Bagot's lifetime.

Mrs. Bagot, by her will, dated the 5th of March, 1881—after reciting the powers of appointment vested in her under the will of her father, the said H. Perkins, and after reciting that she had appointed the greater part of the trust moneys in favour of her two daughters, Evelyn Harriet Bernal (since deceased), the wife of Augustus W. Bernal, and Ethel Jane Paton, the wife of George Paton, respectively, and that the only part of the said one-third share in the stocks, funds, and securities then remaining unappointed consisted of a sum of £713 10s. 10d. Consolidated £3 per Cent. Annuities—in pursuance and in exercise of the power and authority to her limited and of all other powers and authorities enabling her in that behalf, appointed that the said sum of £713 10s. 10d. Consolidated £3 per Cent. Annuities, and all other the trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities over which she had a power of appointment under the will of her father, and which had not been appointed by her as aforesaid, should after her decease be held by the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said will upon trust for her sons, Ponsonby Bagot and Villiers Spencer Bagot, in equal shares on condition "that they give up all claim to the proceeds of the sale of the effects of the house in Dover, and sign a release to my executors to all claims of any portion of the produce of the sale within three calendar months of my decease." In the event of their refusing to comply with the condition, testatrix directed the share to be held in trust for E. J. Paton absolutely. The general scope of testatrix's will was to benefit Charles Edward Ormerod, a stranger to her family, whom she appointed one of her executors and residuary legatee.

The testatrix died on the 31st of July, 1889, and her will was proved on the 31st of December, 1889. At her death the interest of her family in the Randall Fund consisted of £713 10s. 2¾d. Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, and a sum of £913 10s. 2¾d., part of a sum of £10,000 advanced on mortgage by the trustees of the will of H. Perkins, deceased. The sons refused to sign any release to the defendant's executor of their claim for the value of the furniture against testatrix's estate. A summons was taken out by the trustees of the will of H. Perkins to determine the following points:—

(1) Whether the power of appointment exercised by the will of Mrs. Bagot was a valid exercise of the power, and whether or not it was subject to the condition aforesaid.

(2) Whether, in the event of the said appointment being invalid, the representatives of E. H. Bernal or E. J. Paton could participate in the fund without bringing into hotchpot all sums previously advanced or appointed to them under the will of H. Perkins.

Coltman, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

Clark, for the sons.—This is a case in which the exercise of the power is good, and only the condition void. The rule laid down in Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. sen. 644, applies.

We also rely on Sadler v. Pratt, 5 Sim. 632, and Watt v. Creyke, 3 Sm. & Giff. 362.

Bramley and Sebastian, for the representatives of the daughters.—The cases cited cannot apply here. In those cases it was possible to distinguish between the execution of the power and the excess. Here it is not. The sole object of the testatrix was to benefit Ormerod, and if possible to augment her residuary estate by depriving her sons of the proceeds of the sale of the furniture which her husband intended for them. She exercised her power of appointment solely to benefit a stranger to the power, and thus committed a fraud on the power. The appointment and the condition are alike bad, and the share must go as if unappointed: Hay v. Watkins, 3 D. & W. 339; Duke of Portland v. Sopham, 12 W. R. 697, 11 H. L. 32; In re Marsden, 7 W. R. 520, 4 Drew. 594; Whelan v. Palmer, 36 W. R. 587, 39 Ch. D. 648; Farwell on Powers, 342.

NORTH, J.—The first question arises under the will of Mrs. Bagot. [His lordship read the parts of the will bearing on the question, and continued:—] She directs that the sum of money shall be held on trust for her sons, Ponsonby Bagot and Villiers Spencer Bagot. Had the will stood here the appointment would have been good; but she continues, "on condition that they give up all claim to the proceeds of the sale of the effects of the house in Dover and sign a release to my executors of all claims to any portion of the produce of the sale within three calendar months of my decease." [His lordship then referred to the will of E. Bagot, deceased, and pointed out that it gave the testatrix's sons a right to be paid the amount of the value of the furniture from the residuary estate of the testatrix.] She has, by appointing to her sons this sum of £713, given them the sum on the terms that a claim against her estate should be given up by them. If her sons had accepted these terms her residuary estate would have been increased for the benefit of Ormerod. This is not a case in which the condition is bad and the appointment good. Her sole object is to relieve her own estate. On this express condition, and on no other, does she appoint to them. This is a case in which she was abusing her power and making an exercise of it for her own purposes—in short, committing a fraud on the power, although she may not knowingly have been doing anything fraudulent. The words of Lord Hardwicke in Alexander v. Alexander apply here. On p. 644 he lays down: "The execution of a power may be good in part and bad in part. The ground and principle of all this is that when there is a complete execution of a power, and something ex abundanti added which is improper, then the execution shall be good, and only the excess void; but when not a complete execution of the power, when the boundaries between the excess and execution are not distinguishable, it will be bad." If we apply these remarks to this case it will be apparent that the exercise of the power is bad. Here I cannot say that I see any boundaries that can possibly be drawn between the excess and the execution. The sole object for which the testatrix exercised her power was to benefit a stranger. The condition was not ex abundanti, but absolutely inseparable from the execution of the power.

The facts in Sadler v. Pratt were different. In that case a lady having four children by her first husband and three by her second, and having power to appoint a fund among the former only, appointed it amongst all her children equally, and declared that if her children by her first husband should refuse to share the fund with her other children, the whole fund should go to her youngest child by her first husband. It was held in that case that the appointment was not wholly void, but that the first class of children took each one-seventh of the fund under it, and that the other shares went to them as in default of appointment." In that case it was clear that four-sevenths had been well appointed, and the other three-sevenths not. But in the present case the lady whose will I am considering has appointed the fund simply to benefit her residuary legatee. I must hold, therefore, that the appointment fails as being a fraud on the power, and that the fund goes as if unappointed.

As to the second point [his lordship proceeded to read the clauses in H. Perkins' will]. We have here three separate funds: (1) The fund derived from the sale of the real estate; (2) the fund known as the note account; (3) the fund known as the Randall Fund.

I am asked to read the will as if the hotchpot clause was inserted separately after each fund. Now the will says nothing of the sort, although when the testator does intend trusts to be repeated he uses precise language. The absence of such language is very noticeable.

What I take it he does, is not to deal with these funds as three separate funds. He directs the two latter funds to be handed over to the trustees of his real estate to be held by them on the same and not on similar trusts as he had declared with reference to the proceeds of the sale of his real estate. He has not made separate settlements of the two last funds, but he has added the two last funds to the first and given them to its trustees, and applied the same trusts. In my opinion the trusts as to the funds in the hands of trustees are declared once for all, and not three times or by way of reference. I cannot imagine why, when he directed the three funds to be paid to his trustees for the same objects, he should yet have wished to keep them separate. There is, therefore, one general hotchpot clause applying to all the shares of Matilda Bagot's issue in the trust fund arising under the will of the testator.

BURCHELL v. HAWES. (a.)

Husband and wife — Separate property — Mortgage— Trustee—Same hand to pay and to receive—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 40.

Where a married woman was under a will entitled for life for her separate use to the income of a sum of money which the trustee of the will had lent to the husband on the security of a mortgage of two freehold houses, and the husband and wife had lived together in amity for a period of more than twenty years after the date of the mortgage, and during that time the husband had never paid any interest on the mortgage debt, or given any written acknowledgment of the mortgage to the mortgagee-trustee for the wife,

Held, that the husband retained the interest as a gift from the wife; that it was the same hand to pay and to receive; that, therefore, no payment over was requisite; and, consequently, that the Statute of Limitations did not run, and the mortgage was still subsisting.

Adjourned summons.

Letitia Hawes, by her will, dated the 25th of October, 1839, and by a codicil thereto dated the 10th of June, 1842, bequeathed a sum of £300 to trustees on trust to invest and to pay the interest to her daughter Sarah Burchell for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, with remainder to Sarah Burchell's children as therein mentioned. The testatrix died on the 6th of January, 1845, and her will was proved on the 4th of March following.

The only trustee of the will who ever acted was Thomas Hawes, and he advanced this sum of £300 to John Burchell (the husband of Sarah Burchell) upon the security of two freehold houses, which were conveyed by John Burchell to Thomas Hawes by indenture of mortgage dated the 28th of May, 1847.

On the 11th of April, 1869, John Burchell died, having by his will (which was executed two days before his decease and proved on the 7th of August following) devised the two freehold houses on trust for his wife Sarah Burchell for life, with remainders over.

During the life of John Burchell no interest was ever paid by him to Thomas Hawes as mortgagee and trustee for Sarah Burchell, nor was any acknowledgment of the mortgage or liability thereunder signed by him.

Sarah Burchell was aware that she was entitled to have such interest paid, but, according to the evidence, never asked for it, because, living with her husband, she said they "did not keep two pockets."

On the 12th of March, 1873, Mary Ann Hawes, a daughter of John Burchell, and one of the persons entitled in remainder under his will, mortgaged all her interest in the two freehold houses (consisting of one-fourth) to the Maldon Loan Co. (Limited), who eventually foreclosed, foreclosure being made absolute on the 15th of January, 1887.

In October, 1888, the Maldon Loan Co. (Limited) entered into a contract with James Fuller, a defendant in this summons, to sell to him their interest in the freehold houses, and on the 17th of December, 1888, the company and their liquidator conveyed the property to him.

The contract for sale to James Fuller contained a reference to the mortgage of the 28th of May, 1847, and a condition that the purchaser should assume that all claims in respect of the debt of £300, and all interest thereon, were barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the legal estate in the freehold houses was, at the time of his death, vested in John Burchell, and at the time of the purchase in Mrs. Sarah Burchell for her life, and subject thereto in the trustee of the will of John Burchell.

Sarah Burchell died on the 28th of December, 1890.

On the 28th of April, 1892, the two freehold houses were sold by the plaintiff in this summons, which was subsequently taken out to determine who was entitled to the proceeds of sale.

One of the main questions to be decided was as to whether or no the mortgage of the 28th of May, 1847, was still subsisting.

Yate Lee, for the plaintiff (a daughter of Sarah Burchell), and

J. K. Young, for defendant nephews and nieces (all of whom would take shares if the mortgage was not statute barred).—The mortgage is still subsisting. It is well settled that where it is the same person to pay and receive there is no need to pay over. The only question in this case is, Did the husband receive as agent for the wife?

They cited Burrell v. Lord Egremont, 7 Beav. 205; Topham v. Booth, 35 W. R. 715, 35 Ch. D. 607; Edward v. Cheyne, 13 App. Cas. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 172; In re Flamank, 37 W. R. 502, 40 Ch. D. 461.

A. Rotheram, for the defendant James Fuller.—The mortgage is statute barred. The wife might at any time during the life of her husband have enforced her right to have the interest paid to her personally, but she did not do so, and in consequence the statute ran and the mortgage is now barred.

KEKEWICH, J.—My thanks are due to Mr. Young and Mr. Rotheram for the clear and concise way in which they have argued this case without introducing any extraneous matter.

I hesitate to refer to Topham v. Booth, being my own decision, or to say whether its doctrines should be or should not be, extended, and I would rather deal with the matter before me independently of that case. The real question turns on the period of the first twenty years—that is sufficient for the statute if the statute is running—and during that time Mrs. Burchell was no doubt entitled to have the interest paid to herself, and had she chosen to do so she could have enforced her right.

That is a factor in the case, and Mr. Rotheram has argued that the fact that she did not do so strongly favoured his contention that the mortgage is extinct. But to my mind it turns the other way.

I rest my judgment on the doctrine laid down in Caton v. Rideout, 1 Mac. & G. 599, as stated by Kay, L.J., in In re Flamank, as the leading authority on the point: "It has always been held that while a husband and wife are living together in perfect amity, as these were, the receipt by the husband of the separate income of the wife may be treated as a gift of that separate income to him to be applied for the joint benefit of himself and his wife, as for the maintenance of their household and the like." That passage refers of course to actual receipt, and no doubt it is difficult to prove that here. The question is whether, the husband being both the hand to pay and the hand to receive on behalf of the wife, that doctrine applies. I cannot see any reason why it should not. The judge has to use his knowledge of what reasonable people do, and to apply that knowledge reasonably, preventing the strict technical doctrines of the court being too rigidly applied. If year by year a husband, living in amity with his wife, has to pay to his wife money for her separate use, and does not do so, both parties possibly keeping accurate accounts, with entries of receipts and payments, the law presumes that the husband retains the money with the wife's consent. Under these circumstances, I hold that the husband and wife were the same hand, the husband receiving on behalf of the wife, and that the mortgage is still subsisting.

JAMES (Appellant) v. MASTER (Respondent). (a.)

Public health—Sanitary authority—Bye-law—Plan of building—Deviation from plan.

A bye-law of a sanitary authority, made under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, required that a plan showing the dimensions of the several parts of any proposed building should be sent to, and approved by, the sanitary authority before the work of building was commenced.

The respondent sent in plans of a proposed building, which were approved by the sanitary authority. In the course of building he deviated from the plans sent in by altering the height of the floors of the building.

Held, that the respondent had committed a breach of the bye-law.

Special case stated by two justices of the peace for the county of Glamorgan.

The appellant was the clerk to the Merthyr Tydfil Local Board of Health, and in that capacity summoned the respondent before a court of summary jurisdiction to answer the following charge, viz.:—That he "did erect a building within the district of the Merthyr Tydfil Sanitary Authority, without sending to such authority complete plans and sections of every floor of such building as required by the bye-laws of the said authority."

The proceedings were taken under bye-law 93 of the board's bye-laws, which was, so far as is material, as follows:—93. Every person who shall intend to erect a building shall give to the sanitary authority notice in writing of such intention, and shall, at the same time, deliver or send complete plans and sections of every floor of such intended building, which shall be drawn to a scale of not less than one inch to every eight feet, and shall show the position, form, and dimensions of the several parts of such building.

Under another bye-law the sanitary authority had power to remove, alter, or pull down any work to which any of the bye-laws relating to new buildings might apply if such work were done in contravention of any such bye-laws. After hearing the evidence the justices found that the respondent had sent in plans, and that the plans had been accepted by the board; that the buildings as erected deviated from the plans sent in, in that in two instances the height of the floors had been reduced from 10 ft. 6 in. to 10 ft., and a portion of an attic had been made smaller; that the deviations did not infringe any of the bye-laws of the board. The justices were of opinion that there had been no breach of bye-law 93, and dismissed the summons, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Upjohn for the appellant, contended that there had been a breach of the bye-law, inasmuch as the building as erected deviated from the plans sent in and approved.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was wrong, and the case must be sent back to them in order that they may convict the respondent. By their bye-law the sanitary authority require a proper plan of proposed buildings to be sent to them. In this case a plan was sent, and approved by the sanitary authority. Then in the course of the execution of the works, the builder changed his mind and made certain alterations in the building. These alterations may have been made quite bonâ fide, and may not contravene any bye-law, but the plan of them has not been submitted to the sanitary authority, so there has been a breach of bye-law 93, and the magistrates were wrong in not convicting the respondent.

The case must go back.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

Case remitted to justices.

TATAM v. REEVE. (a.)

*Gaming—Bets—Money paid by plaintiff at defendant's request for lost bets—Plaintiff no party to the betting—Right of plaintiff to recover money so paid—*8 & 9 Vict. c. 109—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.

Section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, enacts that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, . . . shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

Held, that money paid by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, in settlement of sums which were in fact bets made and lost by the defendant, the plaintiff himself being no party to the betting, comes within this section as money paid "in respect of" contracts rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the money so paid by him.

Summons referred to the court by Charles, J., at chambers, on the undertaking by both parties that the decision of the court on the summons was to be taken as the decision of the action.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £148, money paid by the plaintiff to the use of the defendant at his request, particulars of which were indorsed upon the writ.

The plaintiff took out a summons for leave to sign judgment under order 14. This leave was refused by the master, who gave unconditional leave to defend, and on appeal by the plaintiff to the learned judge at chambers, the summons was referred to the court, both parties agreeing that the hearing on the summons should be treated as the hearing of the action.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

The facts as set out in the affidavits were these: On the 4th of July, 1892, the plaintiff received from the defendant the following letter: "Dear Mr. Tatam,—Kindly settle the enclosed account for me, as I don't know where to find all the men and I have to catch an early train to Henley.—Yours truly, H. REEVE." Enclosed in this letter was a slip of paper containing the names of four persons with a sum of money opposite the name of each, and these were the sums which the plaintiff was requested by the defendant to pay for him. These sums, amounting in all to £148, were paid on the same day by the plaintiff to the persons named on the list, and it was admitted that the sums so paid by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant were for bets on horse races, which had been made by the defendant and lost to the persons to whom the payments were made. In the affidavit filed by the plaintiff he said that the amounts paid by him were not in respect of any bets made by him on behalf of the defendant, and that he simply paid them on the defendant's request as contained in the letter of the 4th of July, and that he was not in any way liable to pay them. The defendant in his affidavit merely said that he relied on the Gaming Act, 1892. There was no statement in the affidavits as to whether the plaintiff knew or did not know that the payments made by him were in payment of lost bets.

Section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892 (55 Vict. c. 9), provides: "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Lynden Bell, for the plaintiff.—The payment here was a payment made by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, and that raises an implied contract by the defendant to repay the money. The payment was not made by the plaintiff, "under or in respect of" any agreement null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, so that there is no payment which comes within the Gaming Act, 1892. The words of the section in the recent Act are "paid by him." Now here there was no sum paid by the plaintiff "under or in respect of" any betting transaction, for the sum paid by him was so paid at the request of the defendant, the plaintiff himself not being a party to the betting. The Gaming Act, 1892, was meant to meet the case of Read v. Anderson, 32 W. R. 950, 13 Q. B. D. 779, and that being so, it does not touch the present case, as in Read v. Anderson the plaintiff was an actual party to the betting, whereas in this case the plaintiff was no party to the betting. That completely distinguishes Read v. Anderson from the present case. The money was paid here under a contract implied by the request to pay and therefore does not come within the statute.

Morton Daniel, for the defendant, was not heard.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I have no hesitation at all in deciding this case, and it seems to me that judgment must be given for the defendant. If a person, with full knowledge of what is called a debt of honour, chooses to trust another, then he must do so at his own risk, and with the knowledge that he must suffer if the other person repudiates the debt. The old Act was discussed in the well-known case of Read v. Anderson, in which Lord Esher, M.R., emphatically dissented from the other members of the court, and I entirely agree with the dissent of the Master of the Rolls in that case, for that decision really cut in upon the Gaming Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as it was a decision to the effect that a person might do by another what he was prohibited from doing himself. However, that was the decision of the Court of Appeal, and that was an end of it.

Then there was an Act of Parliament passed in the present year to amend the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and this Act enacts: [His lordship then read section 1 of the Act]. The facts here are that the plaintiff was requested by the defendant to pay certain sums of money mentioned in a slip, and the plaintiff paid these sums, and as a matter of fact these sums were for bets made and lost by the defendant. It was said that these sums were not paid in respect of bets. I cannot agree with that view. It is true they were not paid "under" an agreement rendered null and void by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, there being no betting between the plaintiff and the defendant, but they were paid "in respect of" betting contracts null and void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. In respect of what were these payments made by the plaintiff, if not in respect of these betting transactions? I decide this case with the less hesitation as I think the plaintiff knew the purpose of these payments. If he had been deceived into making payments in respect of a matter he knew nothing about, I should have hesitated and been sorry to come to the conclusion to which I have come. I think, however, the plaintiff knew very well the nature of the transaction, and therefore he must take the risk.

I am of opinion that there should be judgment for the defendant.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was argued for the plaintiff that the only object of the statute 55 Vict. c. 9 was to get rid of the decision in Read v. Anderson. If that were the only object of the Act then it would not touch the present case, as the plaintiff here did not make the bets, as in Read v. Anderson. I asked what meaning was to be given to the words "in respect of" as well as the word "under." It was said by both the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the words "in respect of" meant the same thing as "under." I do not think that is so, but the words "in respect of" must mean something different from the word "under." It seems to me it makes no difference whether the plaintiff knew or did not know what these payments were for, for in either case the payments were equally payments made "in respect of" contracts or agreements null and void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. If the plaintiff had been misled by the defendant, it may be that the defendant would be estopped from setting up the defence of the statute, but it is not necessary to decide the question, as, upon reading the affidavits, I have not the slightest doubt that the plaintiff knew what these transactions were for. I think, therefore, there must be judgment for the defendant.

Bill of sale—Building agreement—Assignment of building agreement, with plant and materials as security for loan—Whether such assignment is, as regards plant and materials, a bill of sale—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4, and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.

A document assigning to a stranger, as security for a oan, a building agreement made between the assignor (a builder) and a landowner, together with all plant and materials then on the premises, or which might be brought on the premises, but giving no express power of seizure or sale in case of default of payment, though the mortgagee had power in certain events to take possession of plant and materials, and complete, is a bill of sale as regards such plant and materials, and requires registration; otherwise such document, as regards the plant and materials, will be void.

Climpson v. Coles, 38 W. R. 110, 23 Q. B. D. 465, distinguished.

Interpleader summons heard by Wright, J., in court, raising the question whether a document assigning a building agreement, together with the plant and materials, is a bill of sale.

Sage, the debtor, who was a builder, being in want of money to complete certain buildings, assigned all his interest in certain building agreements made between himself and the owners of the land on which the buildings were being erected, together with all the plant and materials on the premises or which were to be brought on the premises during building, as security for money lent or to be lent.

There was no express power of seizure or sale in default of the money not being paid. In case default was made by the mortgagor in proceeding with all due diligence with the erection and completion of the buildings, or in case the mortgagor should become bankrupt or insolvent, or make or execute any deed of composition or arrangement with his creditors, then the mortgagee was to be entitled to take possession of the premises and all plant and materials and complete.

An interpleader summons was taken out between an execution creditor and the claimant, to whom the execution debtor had made the assignment, and on the hearing of this summons it was contended on behalf of the execution creditor that the assignment of the building agreements was in fact, as regards the plant and materials, a bill of sale, which required registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, and was, therefore, void for want of such registration. On behalf of the claimant it was contended that the document was not a bill of sale, and did not require registration as such, and that, therefore, the claimant had a good title under the assignment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—WRIGHT, J., delivered the following written judgment:—It has long been settled that an ordinary building agreement between a landowner and a builder is not brought within the Bills of Sale Acts as regards plant and materials merely by reason of a provision in it that the plant and materials, when brought upon the land, are to be considered as annexed to the land or are to become the property of the lessor: see Brown v. Bateman, 15 W. R. 350, L. R. 2 C. P. 272; Blake v. Izard, 16 W. R. 108; Ex parte Newitt, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D. 522; Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436. The ground of these decisions appears to be that such a provision is in effect a contract that the chattels are to vest absolutely in the lessor as part of the land, or in him as landowner, and that such a contract is not similar to the assignments or assurances specified in the Bills of Sale Acts. The same authorities show that such a provision in such an instrument is not a mere licence to take possession of the chattels as security for a debt, and is not, in such an instrument, an agreement giving a mere right in equity to the chattels. The document, however, which is now in question is not of that kind. It is not an agreement between landowner and builder, but is a mere mortgage by a builder of his interest in a building agreement to a stranger to secure money advanced by the stranger to enable the builder to carry out the building agreement, and is subject to all the ordinary incidents of a mortgage. It purports to assign the plant and materials now or hereafter to be brought on the ground, or adjoining thereto, to the lender absolutely, subject to redemption, and authorizes him, in case the builder impairs the security by delay in building, &c., "to enter on the land and complete the buildings, and for that purpose to take possession of the land and of all plant and materials thereon." In the absence of authority I should have thought that this was a legal assignment of the existing plant and materials; either an equitable assignment, according to the doctrine laid down in Reeve v. Whitmore, 12 W. R. 113, 33 L. J. Ch. 63, or an agreement whereby a right in equity to the chattels, or a charge or security upon them, was created. I think that the observations of the Court of Appeal in Reeves v. Barlow, 12 Q. B. D., at pp. 441-2, were intended to apply only to ordinary building agreements, and not to mortgages of the present kind. Apart from other authority, I should be of opinion that this mortgage requires registration as a bill of sale in respect of the plant and materials. But the case of Climpson v. Coles, 38 W. R. 110, 23 Q. B. D. 465, decided by Denman and Stephen, JJ., in 1889, after all the other cases cited, raises a difficulty. In that case the document in question was a mortgage, and the court, no doubt, appear to have expressed the opinion that the same considerations applied to that mortgage as in the case of an ordinary building agreement. But they did not decide the case on that ground, and there are two circumstances which appear to me to distinguish that case from this. In the first place, so far as can be gathered from the reports, the mortgagor appears to have been the owner of the land. In the second place, his covenant was that the plant and materials to be brought upon the premises should be considered as immediately attached to, and forming part of, the fee simple of the premises. This provision seems to bring the case directly within the principle of Brown v. Bateman, and the cases which followed it, and was probably the ground of the expressions to which I have referred in Climpson v. Coles. That case, therefore, is not an authority against the view I have taken. There must be judgment for the execution creditor, with costs, as regards the plant and materials, and the claimant must pay the expenses of the sheriff.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.) — Dec. 2.

In re BEDDOE.
DOWNES v. COTTAM. (a.)

Trustee — Costs — Practice — Appeal — Jurisdiction — Charges and expenses—Ord. 65, r. 1—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49.

A trustee of real estate unsuccessfully defended a common law action of detinue of title deeds brought by the legal tenant for life of the estate, and was ordered as defendant to pay the costs of the action. The trustee subsequently took out an originating summons in the Chancery Division for administration of the trust estate, in which he asked for, and obtained from the judge by whom the administration proceedings were heard, an order authorizing payment to him out of the trust estate of all the costs in the common law action.

Held, that the costs of the common law action were not, and could not be dealt with as, "costs" in the administration proceedings, but could only in the administration proceedings be dealt with as "charges and expenses"; that the order of the judge in the administration proceedings was therefore not an order as to "costs only," which, by ord. 65, r. 1, and section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, would be within his unappealable discretion; and, accordingly, that a right of appeal lay on the part of the beneficiaries from the above order.

In re Chennell, Jones v. Chennell, 26 W. R. 595, 8 Ch. D. 492, approved.

Held, also (varying the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the trustee was not entitled, and ought not, to be recouped out of the trust estate all the costs of the common law action, inasmuch as a trustee was only entitled to be indemnified out of his trust estate against all costs, charges, and expenses reasonably, as well as honestly, incurred.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

Sarah Beddoe, by her will, devised her real estate to the plaintiff, Downes, upon trust to suffer and permit a Mrs. Savage to receive the rents thereof for her life, and after her death upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst numerous beneficiaries, of whom the defendant, C. B. Cottam, was one.

The testatrix died in February, 1885, and shortly after her death the plaintiff Downes, being then the sole surviving executor and trustee of the will, obtained possession of the title deeds of the real estate, the rents of which were received by, or were paid to, Mrs. Savage for some years.

In February, 1889, Mrs. Savage was minded to sell the estate, as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and accordingly applied, through Cottam, who was acting as her solicitor, to the plaintiff for the title deeds. The plaintiff, acting on the advice of his solicitor, A. P. Trow, refused to give up the deeds, claiming to be entitled to their custody as trustee of the will.

After some correspondence on the subject had passed between Cottam and Trow, Mrs. Savage, on March 1, 1889, brought an action—Savage v. Downes—in the Queen's Bench Division, against Downes for detinue of the deeds. Trow, as solicitor for Downes, thereupon consulted counsel as to the course to be pursued. The opinion of counsel, as it appeared from documentary evidence extending from March 7 to March 25, was to the effect that he had with much hesitation come to the conclusion that Mrs. Savage was under the will legal tenant for life, and therefore entitled to the custody of the deeds. Counsel suggested that a summons might be taken out in the common law action (Savage v. Downes) to stay the action for the purpose of an originating summons being taken out in the Chancery Division to determine the point, and in the event of the summons to stay being unsuccessful, he recommended an allegation being added to the statement of defence in the action of detinue, that the defendant Downes had been advised that the point was doubtful but submitted to act as the court might direct. On the 30th of March accordingly Downes took out a summons in the common law action to stay the action; the summons was dismissed, and the costs of it were made costs in the action. On the 7th of April Downes delivered his statement of defence in the common law action, containing the allegation suggested by counsel. On the 24th of April, after some correspondence, in the course of which Cottam, as solicitor of Mrs. Savage, more than once urged Trow, as solicitor for Downes, to hand over the deeds and pay the costs of the action, the deeds were handed over to Cottam on an undertaking being given to return them if the property was not sold. The common law action for detinue came on for trial before a commissioner at assizes on the 13th of August, and judgment was given for the plaintiff, with costs to be paid by the defendant Downes; the learned commissioner in giving judgment, however, stated that, if he had to deal with the question whether Downes, as trustee, was entitled to retain or charge these costs against his trust estate, he saw on the materials before him nothing unreasonable in Downes' conduct which ought to deprive him of the costs on the ground that he had acted in an unfair or improper manner, or had done that which, as trustee, he was not warranted in doing. The total costs of the common law action were taxed at £139 1s. 2d.—viz., £82 13s. 6d. being the plaintiff's (Mrs. Savage's) costs, and £55 17s. 8d. being the defendant's (Downes) costs.

In August, 1891, the life tenant, Mrs. Savage, died. On the 9th of February, 1892, Downes, the trustee, took out as plaintiff an originating summons in the Chancery Division for the administration of the estate of the testatrix, Sarah Beddoe, by which he asked to have it declared that he was entitled to payment out of the trust estate of the above-mentioned sum of £139 1s. 2d., and to the costs of the originating summons. Cottam, as one of the residuary devisees, was made a defendant to the summons, and was appointed to represent the other cestui que trusts on the hearing of the summons. He opposed the application.

Kekewich, J., on the hearing of the originating summons, made an order authorizing the payment of the above-mentioned sum of costs in the common law action, to the trustee out of the trust estate, and also the costs of the originating summons.

From this order Cottam appealed.

Cottam appeared in person, and contended that the costs of the Queen's Bench action had been occasioned by the unreasonable conduct of the trustee in refusing to give up the title deeds, and that the trustee was not entitled to receive payment of those costs out of the trust estate.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Herbert Lake, for the trustee, the plaintiff Downes.—The trustee in refusing to give up the deeds only acted on the advice of his counsel and solicitor. Counsel advised that the point as to who was entitled to the custody of the deeds was doubtful. The trustee, therefore, did not act unreasonably in defending the common law action, and ought to be allowed the costs of that action out of the trust estate as charges and expenses properly incurred. Further, we take the point that no appeal lies on the part of a beneficiary from an order of a judge of the High Court allowing a trustee costs out of the trust estate. The costs of the Queen's Bench action were costs of "proceedings in the Supreme Court" within ord. 65, r. 1, and were, therefore, within the discretion of Kekewich, J.; and, having regard to section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, no appeal lies from the order of Kekewich, J. On this point they cited Charles v. Jones, 35 W. R. 88, 33 Ch. D. 80.

Cottam was called on to argue the point as to jurisdiction.—Charles v. Jones dealt only with "costs" in the proper sense of that term, not with "charges and expenses." [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to the passage in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Charles v. Jones, beginning "a small point has been raised," and ending "the appellant, therefore, is not injured by this part of the order": 35 W. R., at p. 89, 33 Ch. D., at p. 82-3]. The case of In re Chennell, Jones v. Chennell, 26 W. R. 595, 8 Ch. D. 492, shows that there is a distinction between "costs" and "charges and expenses" for the purpose of considering whether an appeal lies; and it was never intended in Charles v. Jones to act contrary to In re Chennell. The costs of the Queen's Bench action in the present case are not "costs," but "charges and expenses." [LINDLEY, L.J.—I have looked at the entries in the registrar's book of Charles v. Jones; the order made by Bacon, V.C., in that case says nothing about "charges and expenses"; it only relates to the defendant's "costs of this action, including his costs properly incurred as mortgagee"; nor is there anything about "charges and expenses" in the order of the Court of Appeal in that case.]

Renshaw, Q.C., and Lake, in reply on the question of jurisdiction.—The case of In re Chennell was decided on the construction of ord. 55, r. 1, of the Rules of 1875, the words of which are different to the words of ord. 65, r. 1, of the Rules of 1883. The word "costs" in ord. 65, r. 1, includes "charges and expenses"; there is nothing in ord. 65, r. 1, to limit the words "costs of, and incident to, the administration of trusts," to costs of administration incurred in the litigation; these words apply to and include an administration of a trust outside the court: Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., vol. 2, part 1, pp. 1040, 1063. No appeal lies from an order as to costs only: Harris v. Aaron, 25 W. R. 353, 4 Ch. D. 749. In Charles v. Jones the costs dealt with included some costs outside the mortgagee's costs of the action. [LINDLEY, L.J.—In Charles v. Jones the Court of Appeal did not say that the particular costs outside the action allowed by Bacon, V.C., were improperly incurred. They only said that under the order of Bacon, V.C., the mortgagee would be allowed those costs if properly incurred; they did not hold that the question whether those costs were or were not properly incurred was not appealable.] "Costs" as applied to trustees means something different to the word costs as applied to an ordinary plaintiff or litigant; as applied to a trustee it includes "charges and expenses."

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., allowing the plaintiff, a trustee, certain costs, charges, and expenses out of the trust estate. [The Lord Justice stated the facts above set out, and continued:—] The first question we have to deal with is whether an appeal lies from the order of Kekewich, J.? In my opinion an appeal does lie from that order. That question turns on the true effect of section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and ord. 65, r. 1, of the Rules of 1883, for by section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, every order is appealable unless we find some provision in the Act or rules that it is not to be subject to appeal. Section 49 runs thus: "No order made by the High Court of Justice or any judge thereof . . . as to costs only, which by law are left to the discretion of the court, shall be subject to any appeal, except by leave of the court or judge making the order." We have, therefore, to see what are "costs only, which by law are left to the discretion of the court." That is shown by ord. 65, r. 1, which runs thus: "Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the court or judge; provided that nothing herein contained shall deprive an executor, administrator, trustee, or mortgagee who has not unreasonably instituted, carried on, or resisted any proceedings of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would be entitled according to the rules hitherto acted upon in the Chancery Division." Neither the Act nor the rules say a word as to "charges and expenses" (as distinguished from costs) of either a mortgagee or a trustee. Both section 49 and ord. 65, r. 1, relate to "costs" only. The object and the history of the introduction into rule 1 of order 65 of the words "including the administratiion of estates and trusts" is really to emphasize the preceding words of the rule, "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court," and to check the old chancery practice of giving the costs of administration out of the estate. Apart from the exception mentioned in the provisoes to ord. 65, r. 1 (and some other statutory exceptions which are not material), "the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court shall be in the discretion of the court or judge." But in the discretion of what court or what judge? In my opinion the meaning is that the costs of proceedings are to be in the discretion of the judge before whom the proceedings are taken, not that the costs of one proceeding are to be in the discretion of a judge before whom these costs may come in another proceeding. They could only then be asked for as charges and expenses, and the moment one asks to have them treated as charges and expenses they cease to be costs and become charges and expenses. In the present instance the costs of the common law action of Savage v. Downes were in the discretion of the commissioner who tried that case; but they are not costs of and incident to the proceedings before Kekewich, J., and are no more costs of proceedings in his discretion than any other charges and expenses. The view which I take as to the distinction between "costs" and "charges and expenses" has also been taken in In re Chennell, and I should have thought it plain, were it not for the case of Charles v. Jones, which at first sight appears to raise a difficulty. Under the proviso to ord. 65, r. 1, an executor or mortgagee or trustee who has not unreasonably instituted, carried on, or resisted any proceedings is not to be deprived of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would have been entitled under the rules hitherto acted upon in chancery. The effect is that costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred are to be allowed to executors, mortgagees, and trustees. The case of Charles v. Jones is of the converse kind. In that case a mortgagee who had been guilty of some misconduct was allowed his costs as against the mortgagor by Bacon, V.C., and the Court of Appeal held that no appeal lay from the order of the Vice-Chancellor because the costs in that case did not come within the proviso in rule 1 of order 65, and were in the discretion of the judge, from which there was no appeal. It is true there is a passage in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., which looks as if some question had been raised in that case as to "charges and expenses" as distinguished from "costs," but that question was not, I think, really before the Court of Appeal in Charles v. Jones, nor was it dealt with by the court. The doubt created by that case when first looked at has been removed from my mind, by examining the entry in the registrar's book of the actual orders made by Bacon, V.C., and the Court of Appeal; and that case is not an authority against allowing the appeal in the present case.

We have, therefore, now to consider whether the order made by the judge in the court below was right or wrong. The present appeal is against that part of the order of Kekewich, J., which allows the trustee out of the trust estate the costs of the common law action unsuccessfully defended by him. Notwithstanding the terms of the devise, Mrs. Savage was legal tenant for life, and was entitled to the deeds, and no doubt ought to be thrown by the court on this point. It is perfectly clear when the authorities are looked into. But no trustee could be reasonably expected to know this; and no solicitor can be blamed for not seeing at a glance what the rights of the parties were. Mr. Trow himself thought Cottam was right; but Trow did not act unreasonably in taking time to consider, nor in consulting counsel, nor in being guided by him rather than by his opponent Cottam. But a trustee who, without the sanction of the court, commences an action, or defends an action, unsuccessfully, does so at his own risk as regards the costs, even if he acts on counsel's opinion; and when the trustee seeks to obtain such costs out of his trust estate he ought not to be allowed to charge them against his cestui que trusts unless under very exceptional circumstances. If, indeed, the judge comes to the conclusion that he would have authorized the action or defence had he been applied to, he might, in the exercise of his discretion, allow the costs incurred by the trustee, out of the estate; but I cannot imagine any other circumstances under which the costs of an unauthorized and unsuccessful action brought or defended by a trustee could be properly thrown on the estate. Now, if in this case the trustee had applied by an originating summons for leave to defend the action at the expense of the estate, I cannot suppose that any judge would have authorized him to do so. Consequently, I should not myself have allowed these costs out of the estate.

I entirely agree that a trustee is entitled as of right to full indemnity out of his trust estate against all his costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred; such an indemnity is the price paid by cestui que trusts for the gratuitous and onerous services of trustees, and in all cases of doubt costs incurred by a trustee ought to be borne by the trust estate, and not by him personally. The words "properly incurred" in the ordinary form of order are equivalent to "not improperly incurred." This view of the right of a trustee to indemnity, is in conformity with the settled practice in chancery, and with Turner v. Hancock, 30 W. R. 480, 20 Ch. D. 303, the latest decision on the subject. But considering the ease and comparatively small expense with which trustees can obtain the opinion of a judge of the Chancery Division on the question whether an action should be brought or defended at the expense of the trust estate, I am of opinion that if a trustee brings or defends an action unsuccessfully and without leave, it is for him to show that the costs so incurred were properly incurred. The fact that the trustee acted on counsel's opinion is in all cases a circumstance which ought to weigh with the court in favour of the trustee, but counsel's opinion is no indemnity to him, even on a question of costs. This was decided in Stott v. Milne, 25 Ch. D., at p. 714. In the present case I am compelled to say that counsel made a mistake in advising that there was any doubt about Mrs. Savage's right to the deeds; and Mr. Trow made a mistake in acting on a doubtful opinion, and in not applying by an originating summons for leave to defend the action, as he was advised that he had a doubtful case.

In my opinion that part of the order of Kekewich, J., which allowed the trustee these costs out of the estate ought to be discharged, and an order made as follows:—Vary the order of Kekewich, J. As to the costs of Savage v. Downes, Downes to be allowed out of the estate only such of the costs in that action as would have been incurred if he had applied to the court for leave to defend, and no more. [To avoid further expense the Lord Justice fixed these costs at a specific sum. And as to the costs of Cottam in respect of the originating summons both in the court below and on the appeal, the Lord Justice also fixed them at a specific sum, and directed that that sum, and no more, was to be allowed to the appellant Cottam out of the trust estate.]

BOWEN, L.J.—I also am of opinion that an appeal lies. The costs of the collateral action in the Queen's Bench Division become, in my opinion, charges and expenses when the trustee seeks to recoup himself for them in the administration of the trust. They are costs in their origin, but cease to be costs which are fairly within the unappealable discretion of a court when an attempt is made to fix them on to the trust fund.

Ord. 65, r. 1, directs that, subject to the provisions of the Acts and the rules, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the court. In order to understand the scope of this general rule, which deals with the general subject of costs, and in order to see whether there is or is not an appeal as regards the matter of the summons, we must look back to section 49 of the Act of 1873, which enacts that no order made by the High Court as "to costs only which by law are subject to the discretion of the court" is to be subject to an appeal except by leave. Unless an appeal in the present case is taken away by section 49 an appeal necessarily still lies. Are, then, these costs of the Queen's Bench action "costs only, within the discretion" of Kekewich, J.? They were costs as between the parties to the Queen's Bench action, and as between those parties were rightly dealt with by the Queen's Bench judge. But when one of the parties to the Queen's Bench action endeavours to recoup himself for them out of a trust fund, can they be said to be still "costs" within the meaning of section 49, and within the absolute discretion of the judge who hears the application? So to hold is to deprive cestui que trusts of an appeal upon the question whether the trustee was justified in defending a collateral action.

In Chennell's case the Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal pointed out that "charges and expenses" are not "costs" within section 49, and the present rule (ord. 65, r. 1), which is subsequent to Chennell's case, in still adhering, after that decision, to the former word "costs" cannot be taken to include "charges and expenses" under it. Is it reasonable to sweep within the scope of a section dealing with general costs of actions the costs of an independent and collateral proceeding between third persons tried before a different judge? If this were a question between principal and agent, can it be said that under this rule the costs incurred by an agent in an action brought or defended by him were, as between himself and his principal, to be within the absolute discretion of some other judge who had not heard the case? The liability of the principal would depend on questions of pure fact. Why should the discretion of a judge of the High Court conclude the matter? And why should the law be otherwise in the case of a trust fund? All matters in connection with trust funds are not made the subject of pure discretion of a judge. They depend on questions of gravity involving controversies as to facts, and possibly legal questions of right. The fallacy of the respondents' argument lies in supposing that because a trustee has to pay costs in a collateral suit, it is as "costs" that he inflicts them on his own trust fund. It is only as "charges and expenses" that he can recover them, and charges and expenses are not matters as to which an appeal is taken away, either under section 49 of the Act of 1873 or under ord. 65, r. 1.

But it is said that the case of Charles v. Jones decides that although in such a case the trustee may appeal, the cestui que trusts may not. That case (rightly decided, no doubt, on the rules) nevertheless is one that inflicts some hardship on trust funds. If a trustee may appeal against an order finding that he has been guilty of misconduct, justice would seem to indicate that an appeal ought conversely to lie in the interests of infants and cestui que trusts when the decision is the other way. However under ord. 65, r. 1, it is not so. But we ought not to stretch the words of the rule in order to apply such a hard doctrine to "charges and expenses" when the clear words seem, in their ordinary sense, to exclude them. But in truth, in Charles v. Jones, the point raised in the present case as to the lawfulness of an appeal did not really arise. The appeal presented there was as to the misconduct of a trustee in the suit, and Cotton, L.J., while holding that no appeal lay on behalf of the trust fund interested, pointed out that the part of the order of Bacon, V.C., which directed that costs (in the sense of charges and expenses) properly incurred were to come out of the fund, was regular, but he does not say that, as to the propriety of incurring such charges and expenses, no appeal could lie. The case, therefore, is not in point. In my opinion, an appeal here lies, and I proceed to consider the present case on the merits.

If the present appeal fails, what, we are told, amounts to nearly a quarter of a tiny trust fund, will have been wasted with impunity in an unsuccessful litigation of no profit whatever to the trust fund—and the legal profession will have devoured, without any corresponding advantage to anybody, a considerable portion of a very small oyster.

The respondent was trustee of an estate such as I have described, and entitled in that capacity to a remainder in fee with trust for sale, subject always to the previous life interest of a tenant for life. The tenant for life, who was herself meditating a sale of the property under the Settled Land Act, 1882, demanded—as she was entitled to do—possession of the title deeds. On the true construction of the will, the trustee had no answer in law to the demand. But his solicitor entertained at the outset some doubt as to the law on the case: doubts which the result showed to be unfounded. He did not take out any summons for directions from the court, as he might have done, and thereby avoided litigation; but, on his own responsibility, he defended the action down to the assizes, and was there defeated in the end. The vanquished trustee now seeks to impose the costs of this idle and fruitless litigation on the estate under circumstances which I shall presently examine.

The principle of law to be applied appears unmistakably clear. A trustee can only be indemnified out of the pockets of his cestui que trusts against costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred for the benefit of the trust—a proposition in which the word "properly" means reasonably, as well as honestly, incurred. While I agree that trustees ought not to be visited with personal loss on account of mere errors in judgment, which fell short of negligence or unreasonableness, it is, on the other hand, essential to recollect that mere bona fides is not the test, and that it is no answer in the mouth of a trustee who has embarked in idle litigation to say that he honestly believed what his solicitor told him, if his solicitor has been wrongheaded and perverse. Costs, charges, and expenses which, in fact, have been unreasonably incurred do not assume in the eye of the law the character of reasonableness simply because the solicitor was the person who was in fault. No more disastrous or delusive doctrine could be invented in a court of equity than the dangerous idea that a trustee himself might recover over from his own cestui que trusts costs which his own solicitor has unreasonably and perversely incurred, merely because he had acted as his solicitor told him. If there be one consideration, again, more than another which ought to be present to the mind of a trustee—especially the trustee of a small and easily-dissipated fund—it is that all litigation should be avoided unless there is such a chance of success as to render it desirable, in the interests of the estate, that the necessary risk should be incurred. If a trustee is doubtful as to the wisdom of prosecuting or defending a lawsuit, he is provided by the law with an inexpensive method of solving his doubts in the interests of the trust. He has only to take out an originating summons, state the point under discussion, and ask the court whether the point is one which should be fought out or abandoned. To embark in a lawsuit at the risk of the fund without this salutary precaution might often be to speculate in law, with money that belongs to other people. With these preliminary observations I proceed to narrate succinctly the story of this wasteful litigation. [The Lord Justice then stated the facts, and observed that any solicitor must, after consulting the authorities, have known that it was a dangerous thing and calculated gravely to imperil the small trust fund, for the respondent to defend the threatened action for detinue of the title deeds; that on the issue of the writ the respondent's solicitor himself became alarmed, and on the 5th of March, 1889, wrote a letter to obtain counsel's opinion; that counsel's opinion in reply stated that "on the whole, though with much hesitation, he thought that Mrs. Savage was legal tenant for life, and, therefore, entitled to the custody of the deeds"; that counsel added that as regards costs he recommended an allegation to be added in the statement of defence in the action of detinue, that the defendant had been advised that the point was doubtful; that counsel, however, had not advised the action to be defended, nor stated that it could be defended with any prospect of success; his lordship then proceeded:—]

Pausing here to review the situation the following facts are clear. The respondent through his solicitor knew (on the 7th of March) that his counsel feared (as he himself did) that he was in the wrong. His counsel had not even advised him that the action might be defended with any reasonable prospect of success. What was the duty of any trustee of a tiny fund?

What was the only reasonable course that could thereupon be pursued for the benefit of a fund of this description? Obviously either to abandon the defence if he could not compromise, or to take out an originating summons asking for the directions of the court. The smallness of the estate out of which costs if ordered would have to come, the character of the question at issue, the adverse impression of counsel, the sense that the authorities on the point were unfavourable—all these things, to my mind, made it absolutely and utterly unreasonable without further advice to risk the money of the cestui que trusts in a common law action about the custody of these deeds. The litigation pursued its course. A futile attempt was made to stay the common law action on the terms of taking out an originating summons in chancery to have the question decided there, where counsel believed the trustee would get his costs out of the fund. A useless profession was made in the statement of defence of a willingness, as soon as the Queen's Bench Division should pronounce judgment, to submit to it—a pious expression of resignation to the will of the court, borrowed from chancery, but wholly thrown away upon a common law action of detinue—and on the 13th of August, at the assizes, the learned commissioner who sat as a judge decided the action against the respondent, not expressing any doubt upon it. There was no appeal against his decision. Reliance has been placed by respondent's counsel on the fact that in delivering judgment the learned commissioner stated that, if he had to deal with the question whether the trustee was entitled to retain or charge these costs against the trust estate, he saw, on the materials before him, nothing unreasonable in the respondent's conduct which ought to deprive him of the costs on the ground that he had acted in an unfair or improper manner, or done that which as trustee he was not warranted in doing; but that that matter must be disposed of, when it arose, by the proper tribunal. The learned commissioner had not before him the materials now before this court, and the matter is at large for us. The view of Kekewich, J., in the respondent's favour is a matter which has much impressed me. The note furnished us of his judgment is imperfect; but I think that Kekewich, J., has been influenced by the view that the solicitor of the respondent had acted either under, or not contrary to, the opinion of counsel. He also expresses the opinion that the point of law as to the custody of the deeds was one of some difficulty. As I have above stated, I myself do not agree that this point of law was difficult. As soon as the authorities are examined the difficulty vanishes. Even if the point of law was difficult, this does not, to my mind, justify, in a small trust, defending an action of detinue, in which the respondent's solicitor and his counsel were both unable to bring themselves to believe that the respondent would succeed, without making some effort to obtain directions from the court, or to make terms with their adversary. Any other view appears to me to be fraught with the utmost danger, both to trust estates and to the practice of this court. I think that up to the 9th of March the trustee was not acting unreasonably, although he was acting under a mistaken impression of his rights. From and after the 9th of March he was acting, in my opinion, most rashly and very unreasonably. He ought, I think, to be allowed out of the trust fund the costs indicated by Lindley, L.J., and no more. This will relieve the trust fund of the burthen placed on it by the order of the court below, and I agree that the varied order which Lindley, L.J., has stated is correct.

DAVEY v. BENTINCK. (a.)

Practice—Pleadings—Order for particulars—Non-compliance—Order to dismiss action if particulars not delivered within certain time—Ord. 19, r. 7—Action shown by particulars to be frivolous or vexatious—"The pleadings"—Ord. 25, r. 4.

An order made on a plaintiff to deliver particulars of his claim under ord. 19, r. 7, may include the term that the action shall be dismissed unless the particulars are delivered within a certain time.

Semble, the words "the pleadings" in ord. 25, r. 4, include particulars.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of a divisional court that the action be dismissed unless the plaintiff deliver proper particulars of his claim within fifteen days.

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover a sum of money in respect of services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request.

On the 30th of May, 1892, the defendant obtained an order, under ord. 19, r. 7, that the plaintiff should deliver particulars of his claim.

On the 15th of June a further order was made that the plaintiff should deliver particulars within ten days.

On the 4th of July a further order was made that the action should be dismissed unless the plaintiff delivered particulars within a week.

The plaintiff then delivered certain particulars to the defendant, but the defendant considered them insufficient, and on the 20th of July he obtained an order that unless the plaintiff delivered proper particulars within ten days certain paragraphs of the statement of claim should be struck out.

The plaintiff delivered further particulars, but again the defendant considered them insufficient, and on the 4th of August the defendant took out a summons asking (1) that the statement of claim be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, as being frivolous and vexatious; and (2) that the action be dismissed unless the plaintiff delivered proper particulars within seven days. On the hearing of this summons the master made an order dismissing the action with costs. The plaintiff appealed to the judge at chambers, who affirmed the order of the master. The plaintiff again appealed to the Divisional Court (Mathew and Bruce, JJ.), who ordered the action to be dismissed unless the plaintiff should deliver proper particulars within fifteen days.

The plaintiff now appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Ord. 19, r. 7, is as follows: "A further and better statement of the nature of the claim or defence, or further and better particulars of any matter stated in any pleading, notice, or written proceeding requiring particulars, may in all cases be ordered, upon such terms, as to costs and otherwise, as may be just."

Ord. 25, r. 4, is as follows: "The court or a judge may order any pleading to be struck out, on the ground that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or answer, and in any such case or in case of the action or defence being shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, the court or a judge may order the action to be stayed or dismissed, or judgment to be entered accordingly, as may be just."

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the master made an order that the action should be dismissed. The summons was applied for on two grounds—the first being that the action was frivolous and vexatious, and the second ground being that an order had been made for proper particulars, and proper particulars had not been given. Now there are two ways in which an action may be dismissed for being frivolous and vexatious; it may be done under ord. 25, r. 4, or it may be done under the inherent power of the court. The question whether the present action could be dismissed under ord. 25, r. 4, depends on whether particulars are to be treated as part of "the pleadings" within that rule. I am strongly of opinion that they are. I think that where there are particulars, and they show that the action is frivolous and vexatious, an order may be made under this rule dismissing the action. But it is not necessary to determine that point. The court has inherent authority to stop proceedings which are frivolous or vexatious, or an abuse of the process of the court. And this may be done at any stage of the proceedings. Here the plaintiff was ordered again and again to deliver particulars of the services in respect of which he sued the defendant; and he has failed to deliver any proper particulars. The court might well draw the inference that the reason why he failed to do so was because he had never rendered any services at all. If he had not rendered any services, then there was no cause of action. And under such circumstances the court has an inherent authority to order the action to be dismissed. The order of the Divisional Court, however, was that the action should be dismissed unless the plaintiff delivered particulars within fifteen days. The result of the order being made in that form is to raise this question—viz., whether ord. 19, r. 7, which says that particulars may be ordered "upon such terms, as to costs and otherwise, as may be just," authorizes the making of an order for particulars, including the term that the action shall be dismissed unless the particulars are delivered within a certain time. I am of opinion that the rule authorizes the making of such an order, and that the order now appealed from was rightly made under that rule. The appeal must be dismissed.

Poor law—Settlement—Irremovability—Residence apart from parent while under sixteen—11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 —Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 34.

A pauper resided in domestic service from the age of fourteen to the age of eighteen in a parish in the appellant union. Her father was dead, and her mother never resided nor had a settlement in the appellant union.

Held, that the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 only applied to prevent the separation of families, and therefore did not apply where the pauper was residing apart from her parent; that the pauper acquired a status of irremovability by such residence while under sixteen; and that, accordingly, the period of residence under sixteen could be added to the period of residence over sixteen, so as to confer a settlement upon her under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a special case stated on appeal against an order of a metropolitan police magistrate, whereby he adjudged that the parish of Low Leyton, in the appellant union, was the place of the last legal settlement of the pauper, Caroline Batchelliar.

The pauper's father died when she was two years old, and her widowed mother resided and was settled in Shoreditch parish. The pauper, a few days before she attained the age of fourteen, went into domestic service in the parish of Low Leyton, and resided there without interruption until a few days before she became eighteen years of age, when she went to reside with her mother at places outside the appellant union until she became chargeable to the respondent parish. The court of quarter sessions dismissed the appeal from the magistrate, and this decision was affirmed by the Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Vaughan Williams, J.) The appellant union appealed.

August 9.—Jelf, Q.C., and R. D. Muir, for the appellants.—It must be shown that in each of the three years necessary to confer a settlement the pauper must have been irremovable. When the pauper was under sixteen she was part of her mother's family, and could have been removed with her to her place of settlement outside the appellant union. There were, therefore, not three years of irremovability while the pauper was in service in the appellant union. The proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 applied.

Beven, for the respondents.—At the end of the first year's residence in the appellant union the pauper became irremovable, and during the next three years she remained irremovable, and came within the provisions of section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. A child under sixteen can acquire a settlement by residence: Holborn v. Chertsey, 33 W. R. 344, 14 Q. B. D. 289; Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, 18 W. R. 787, L. R. 5 Q. Jelf, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 10.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The Divisional Court has decided that the pauper obtained a settlement in the union in which she had in fact lived for more than three years in domestic service. The question is whether by so living she had obtained a settlement. When she first went into service she was almost fourteen years of age, and she remained in service in the same parish for four years. Her mother did not live in that parish, and had no settlement there. Now the law of settlement was so obscure, and gave rise to so many lawsuits, that the efforts of the Legislature were directed towards simplifying the law. The first thing was to enact the law of irremovability, and to make that the important inquiry. The old law of settlement was not done away with. If a pauper was irremovable for a certain number of years, the pauper acquired a settlement. To ascertain whether a pauper has acquired a settlement in a certain parish, the inquiry must be directed to the question whether the pauper was irremovable in that parish for three years. The question of irremovability was simplified by enacting that residence for a year in a parish rendered the pauper irremovable. The result was that if a pauper resided for one year in a parish he would be irremovable; if he resided for three years he would acquire a settlement. Then comes a question which it is not necessary to determine, whether a pauper, who has resided for three years in a parish, and was irremovable in the last two years only, acquires a settlement? The case here stands thus: During the first year it is obvious that the pauper could have been removed from this parish. At the end of the first year the pauper, by her residence in the parish for one year, was irremovable, and therefore during each of the three years following she was irremovable. The pauper was therefore irremovable during each of those years, and acquired a settlement.

It is said that the proviso to section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 altered that. In my opinion the proviso was intended to be a humane enactment, whereby a family living together, which would otherwise be compelled to separate, would go to the place of settlement of the parent. That legislation was only wanted where that effect would be produced. That was the view taken by Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Leeds Union, and he had there to consider whether the child was in contemplation of law living with its mother, though not in fact living with its mother. If a child were living with its parents, its residence would be its parents' residence. If the child were away on a visit, or at school, still in contemplation of law its residence would be with its parents, as the parents would have the power to take back the child at any moment. In the present case the pauper was in domestic service, and was living with her master or mistress. In Reg. v. Leeds Union Cockburn, C.J., was considering the case of a child who was abandoned by its parent, but he did not lay down that, apart from abandonment, a child must be considered as residing with its mother. Here I think that the pauper was residing in the parish where she was in service. It has been held that if there is a residence for one year under sixteen so as to cause irremovablity, and similar residence for the remaining two years after sixteen, the two periods may be added together so as to confer a settlement, subject of course to the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 as to the separation of families. I think that the decision in Reg. v. Leeds Union is one that we cannot and ought not to overrule. It produces simplicity and carries out the object of the Legislature, and prevents the necessity of inquiring into the position of the parents. I agree with that decision, but even if I differed from it I do not think that we ought to overrule it. The judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that this point was decided in the case of Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union, and so far as the court below thought that it had, I must say I cannot follow them. This case turns upon another point—whether, at the end of the first year of the pauper's domestic service, she had not acquired a status of irremovability. If she had, that status of irremovability continued during the three following years, and she was irremovable in each of those years, and at the end of the three years acquired a settlement. We must first see whether the pauper resided in the parish, and, secondly, if so, whether the proviso to section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 prevented that residence from giving her a status of irremovability. As to whether she resided in the parish, I agree with what was said by the Master of the Rolls. The child, though unemancipated, had, with her parent's consent, gone into service and taken up her abode in the parish. That, in ordinary language, was residence there. The second question was whether that residence conferred a status of irremovability. That depends upon the proviso to the Act. A proviso must be taken as limiting the meaning of the section. That was the view taken by Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Leeds Union. It is a proviso framed in the interests of humanity, and must be construed as thus limiting the section. In that case the child had been severed from the nurture and custody of the mother, and while so severed it had completed the statutory period of residence. The court came to the conclusion that the child, being so abandoned by the mother, must be taken to have acquired sufficient independence of life to obtain a residence away from its mother. The question then arose whether such residence away from its mother gave the child a status of irremovability, and upon that question the proviso had to be considered. The Lord Chief Justice considered the object of the legislation, and said that it was to prevent the dispersal of families, and only applied where the family were living together, and accordingly that the proviso did not apply to that case, where no question of separating a child from its parent arose. The irremovability of part of a family living together was not to take effect where the head of the family was not irremovable. That is how I understand the decision in that case, and that view was also taken in Reg. v. St. Mary Arches, Exeter, 10 W. R. 268, 31 L. J. M. C. 77, and, I think, accepted by this court in Mitford Union v. Wayland Union, where the Master of the Rolls and Fry, L.J., both point out that this limitation must be read into the proviso—namely, that it was enacted to prevent the dispersal of families. Whether that is the true meaning of the proviso I cannot say. But why should we disturb the law laid down for so many years? In my opinion we must follow it.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—A young girl, the child of a widowed mother, was in domestic service in West Ham from July, 1879, to July, 1883. Her mother never resided in West Ham. In 1883 the girl went to live with her mother, and eventually became chargeable to the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green. During only the last two years of her service in the parish of West Ham was the girl over sixteen, being just about fourteen when she first went there. It has been held that the girl acquired a settlement in West Ham. Against this decision the guardians of West Ham appeal.

It is contended that while the girl was under sixteen she could only have the settlement and the status of irremovability of her mother, who never had either in West Ham, and that consequently the girl did not acquire a settlement in West Ham. Such a settlement, it is argued, could only be acquired by three years of residence, each of which years must be a year during, or at least at the end of which she would have been or become irremovable.

The question depends upon section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. That section requires, for the purpose of a settlement being obtained, (1) three years' residence; (2) peculiar manner and circumstances of residence. The manner and circumstances are thus mentioned: "In such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf render" her "irremovable." The statutes in that behalf are 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8.

By the first of those Acts five years' residence was necessary to give irremovability; by the third this was reduced to three years; and by the last to one year. But the first of these statutes contained a proviso which was made more explicit by the second, and as so altered provided, so far as applicable to the present case, that whenever a widow should have a child having no other settlement than her own, such child should be removable from any parish from which the mother would be removable. The mother would undoubtedly have been removable from the parish of West Ham, if she had gone there and become chargeable before the girl attained sixteen. Therefore it is said that the girl did not become irremovable before that age, because by section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, passed in 1876, a child under sixteen must take the settlement of its widowed mother up to that age, and must retain that settlement until it acquires another. Having the mother's settlement up to sixteen, the proviso, it is argued, prevented the girl becoming irremovable in another parish by a year's residence under that age. Consequently there were not three years of residence in West Ham in each of which this girl was irremovable, but only two, and it must follow that by her residence there she did not acquire a settlement.

I confess I am considerably impressed by this reasoning, and it is necessary to see whether I am compelled by authority to arrive at some other conclusion. There are two cases which, it is said, have decided otherwise. The first is Reg. v. Leeds Union. In that case an illegitimate child a fortnight old was placed by its mother in the care of strangers who resided in a parish in which the mother did not reside, and the child lived with them for more than three years. Then they removed to another parish, and a few months afterwards the child became chargeable, and was removed to the parish where it had resided more than three years. Although the child for those three years was under the age of seven years, its residence was held sufficient to give it a settlement, and the proviso was held not to apply, Cockburn, C.J., saying that the proviso in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 was enacted "to prevent the dispersing of different members of a family," and that this mother had "entirely given up" the child. "It was not," he said, "a suspension, but a virtual abandonment of the maternal rights," without any intention to resume them, and that in such circumstances simple residence for the three years was sufficient. The other case is Mitford Union v. Wayland Union. There a child lived with her father till she attained sixteen, and shortly after attaining that age became chargeable. The father was then residing in, and had become irremovable from, a parish in which he had no settlement. It was held that the girl had the same settlement as her father, but that the proviso in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 applied, and that as he could not be removed from the parish in which he was residing neither could she.

In Highworth Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union the House of Lords held that, where a girl had resided with her widowed mother in the parish in which that mother had a settlement, and from which she was irremovable, for three years partly before and partly after she attained sixteen, the period before she attained sixteen could be reckoned in making up the three years. The point we have to decide did not arise. The pauper was irremovable in each of the three years. The Lord Chancellor says:—"It is clear, therefore, that in this case there was for more than three years a status of irremovability in each of the three years." The decision, therefore, is of no authority in a case in which during one of those three years the pauper had not acquired that status. None of these cases decides the exact point raised before us. The question is a new one. It must be determined upon the meaning and intention of the proviso in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111. If it was meant to prevent division of families where the members of the family were actually or virtually living together, no case comes within the mischief which was to be provided against where that circumstance does not exist. Does it exist where a girl of thirteen or fourteen has gone into domestic service in another parish different from that in which her parents are settled or are irremovable? The question seems to me doubtful. However, I am not prepared to differ from the view taken by the other members of the court, which I understand to be that such a case is not within the mischief aimed at by the proviso, and that such residence for a year will make the girl irremovable. If so, she was irremovable at the end of the first year of her service as well as in each of the succeeding years, and the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Settled Land Acts by the tenant for life in possession of the estate settled by the will of Baron de Teissier, deceased, asking that the trustees of the will, as the trustees for the purposes of the Acts of the settlement created by the will, might be authorized, out of the moneys representing the testator's residuary personal estate, to pay for the rebuilding and improvement of the mansion-house called Bourne House and cottages and outbuildings on the settled land.

It appeared that the testator, who at the date of his death in 1891 was himself residing in Bourne House, by words of legal limitation devised the house and cottages and land belonging to the house, being his only real estate, to his brother for life, with remainder to his brother's eldest son for life, with remainder to his eldest son for life, and with remainders over, and that such last tenant for life in remainder was an infant. The life tenancies were without impeachment of waste. The trustees had a power of sale, exercisable only upon the request in writing of an adult tenant for life entitled to possession or during the minority of anyone for the time being entitled as tenant for life or in tail. The testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees upon trusts corresponding to the devolutions declared with respect to his real estate. In May, 1892, a declaration was made by Chitty, J., that the testator's residuary personalty, amounting to some £50,000, was to be treated as held upon the same trusts as if it were capital money arising on a sale under the Settled Land Act.

The first tenant for life, having entered into possession of Bourne House, had, after conferring with the trustees, expended £930 on repairs and improvements, and it was also proposed to expend a further sum of £900 or thereabouts. There was evidence that the house was in a dilapidated condition, and the requisite repairs and improvements consisted of alterations of a structural nature necessitated by dry rot, by deficient and unsanitary drainage, and by the insecurity of the foundations. Repairs and improvements of a minor nature were also enumerated. There was no scheme submitted to the trustees, but they approved of what had been, and what was proposed to be, done.

By section 13 of the Act of 1890, "improvements authorized by the Act of 1882" include, inter alia, (ii.) "Making any additions to or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let"; (iv.) "The rebuilding of the principal mansion-house on the settled land, provided that the sum to be applied under this sub-section shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land," and by section 15 of the same Act, "The court may . . . make an order . . . authorizing capital money to be applied in or towards payment for any improvements" authorized by the Acts "notwithstanding that a scheme was not, before the execution of the improvement, submitted for approval, as required by the Act of 1882, to the trustees . . . or to the court."

By section 22 (5) of the Act of 1882 "capital money" arising under the Act "while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and securities on which an investment of any such capital money is made, shall, for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution, be considered as land . . . ," and by sub-section (6) "The income of those securities shall be paid or applied as the income of that land, if not disposed of, would have been payable or applicable under the settlement."

Upjohn, for the tenant for life, contended (1) that, though there was no scheme submitted for approval, this was a proper case for an order under section 15 of the Settled Land Act of 1890; (2) that the house could not be let until it was repaired, and the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13 (ii.), was, therefore, applicable to the case, whether there was an intention to let at the time the repairs were carried out or not; (3) that the structural repairs contemplated amounted to a "rebuilding" within sub-section (iv.) of the same section; and (4) that "annual rental" in the same sub-section included the income of capital money arising under the Act of 1882, as was shown by the terms of section 25 (5) of that Act.

Bramwell Davis, for the next tenants for life and the trustees, raised no objection to the proposed expenditure.

CHITTY, J.—[After stating that he was willing to authorize an expenditure strictly within the terms of the Settled Land Acts, his lordship proceeded:—] The first question which I have to decide is whether the income of a fund, representing residuary personal estate of the testator, which this court has already declared ought to be treated as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882, is or is not to be included in calculating the "annual rental of the settled land" within the meaning of section 13 (iv.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890. In my opinion this income ought to be included. I must read the Settled Land Acts of 1882 and 1890 as one enactment. Turning to the Act of 1882 I find section 22. [His lordship read section 22 (5) and (6) and proceeded:—] The result in the present case is that the present tenant for life is entitled to the income of this capital money. Now section 13 (iv.) of the Act of 1890 places a limit on the amount that may be spent on the rebuilding of the principal mansion-house on the settled land. Now it would be a strange result if the amount that might be so spent were to depend on the accident whether the "settled land" were at the moment land or money. That would, to my mind, be a narrow and erroneous construction of the statute. And, bearing in mind the scope and intention and general provisions of these Acts, I think that the reasonable construction is to treat "annual rental" in this section as intended to apply to the total income of the settled property, land as well as capital money invested, and I so hold.

Another point under section 13 (iv.) related to what had already been done or was proposed to be done by the tenant for life to the mansion-house. Improvements, to be within the meaning of this sub-section, must be something more than structural alterations, however extensive; they must, in my opinion, amount to actual rebuilding. It was not intended that improvements or alterations, much less repairs, should be paid for out of capital money. See section 13 (ii.). I think that the section means only what it says, and must be construed strictly, and therefore section 13 (iv.) has no application to this case, at any rate on the facts before me, which are not sufficient for me to say whether what is proposed to be done amounts to a "rebuilding" or not, and I leave that open for reconsideration in chambers on additional evidence, if there be any.

The third point is as to the construction of section 13 (ii.). On this I think it clear that if the tenant for life is residing in the mansion-house or is contemplating residence there, he cannot ask for capital-money to be spent in making alterations and repairs. The additions or alterations contemplated must be reasonably necessary to enable the mansion-house to be let. I think that there must be a present intention at least of, if not an actual contract for, letting, before any application under this sub-section can be made.

Otherwise a long-lived tenant for life, coming forward from time to time and making such applications, might in that way eat up all the capital-money with his continual repairs.

The point as to the cottages is whether they are within section 25 (x.) of the Act of 1882, but on this point I express no opinion.

You can go back to chambers with these directions for the guidance of my chief clerk, to have the details of these repairs more fully considered, if the matter is persisted in by the tenant for life.

Adjourned to chambers.

Settled estate—Repairs—Expenditure of trust money—Tenant for life in possession—Infants—Jurisdiction.

T. by his will made a legal devise of real estate, including a mansion-house, to several tenants for life in succession, the last of whom was an infant, without impeachment for waste, with remainders over.

T. lived in the house till his death, when it was found to be in a very dilapidated condition. Divers repairs and improvements were considered necessary to make the house habitable, including the repair of damage caused by dry rot. On an application by the trustees of the will,

Held, that there was no jurisdiction to allow the necessary expenditure out of a fund representing capital moneys under the Settled Land Act; for, assuming that disposition of such moneys otherwise than as the Settled Land Acts provided was not excluded by the Acts, there was no settled doctrine of the court under which the expenditure could be sanctioned. The circumstances did not amount to a case of salvage or preservation of the inheritance, and the court had no inherent jurisdiction to charge or sell an infant's estate upon the notion that such a proceeding would be beneficial to the infant.

Summons.

This was a summons by the trustees of the will of the late Baron de Teissier for liberty to them, as such trustees, to apply, out of the moneys in their hands representing the residuary personal estate of the said testator, a sum not exceeding £1,900 in payment for the rebuilding and improvement of a mansion-house called Bourne House, and cottages and outbuildings forming part of the settled estate of the testator. The facts and evidence were the same as in In re De Tessier's Settled Estates (ante, p. 184).

Upjohn, for the trustees of the will.—We ask the court to allow this expenditure in exercise of its general jurisdiction. [CHITTY, J., referred to Dent v. Dent, 10 W. R. 375, 30 Beav. 363.] The trustees have advanced part of the money, and are in effect asking the court for an indemnity: see the observations of Kekewich, J., in Conway v. Fenton, 37 W. R. 156, 40 Ch. D. 512. Where there is a fund vested in trustees on trusts corresponding to the uses declared of settled real estate the court has jurisdiction to authorize the expenditure out of the fund of so much as may be required to make the real estate saleable, and also to indemnify the trustees where they make such expenditure without the sanction of the court. [CHITTY, J., referred to Drake v. Trefusis, 23 W. R. 762, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 364.] See In re Ormrod's Settled Estate, 40 W. R. 490, [1892] 2 Ch. 318. The preservation and salvage of the property are what I ground my application on: see Jesse v. Lloyd, 48 L. T. N. S. 656, 31 W. R. Dig. 205. The Settled Land Acts do not exclude the jurisdiction to sanction an expenditure of capital money on salvage: Conway v. Fenton. [CHITTY, J.—There was a trust for sale there.] The powers of the Acts are cumulative, not exclusive, and the court will exercise its jurisdiction in a case of salvage. [CHITTY, J., referred to an unreported case before him, where a tenant for life would not repair certain houses in London which were so dilapidated that they were tumbling down, in which case his lordship had made an order under the jurisdiction which was now invoked, and the order was confirmed on appeal.] With regard to applicants' position in the matter, as trustees of this will, see In re Hotchkys, 34 W. R. 569, 32 Ch. D. 408, and In re Houghton Estate, 33 W. R. 869, 30 Ch. D. 102.

He also referred to In re Leigh's Estate, 19 W. R. 1105, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 887; and In re Household, 27 Ch. D. 553, 33 W. R. Dig. 105.

Bramwell Davis, for the next tenant for life and the infant.—I support the application on the ground that the expenditure is necessary for the preservation of the estate. [CHITTY, J.—You admit that you want something done which cannot be done under the Acts. Can you produce a case where, in similar circumstances, a court of equity has laid hold of a trust fund and repaired the property out of it?] Yes, In re Hurst, 29 L. R. Ir. Ch. 219. [CHITTY, J.—The court would not allow an expenditure of money or a charge on the real estate, which amounted to the same thing, to compensate the tenant for life for expenses occasioned by dry rot in the mansion-house: Hibbert v. Cooke, 1 Sim. & St. 552.] This house was absolutely uninhabitable. The court has jurisdiction to sanction an expenditure to preserve the property in tenantable condition, the testator having left it untenantable: Conway v. Fenton; In re Hurst. Moreover, it is for the benefit of all concerned that the expenditure should be authorized. [CHITTY, J., referred to In re Swanston, 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 427, and Calvert v. Godfrey, 6 Beav. 97.] In re Jackson, 21 Ch. D. 786, 31 W. R. Dig. 204, supports my contention. [CHITTY, J.—Do you say that the court has jurisdiction to charge the real estate, supposing that there was no fund here?] Yes, but, there being a fund, I need not go that length.

CHITTY, J.—The main object of the present summons is the same as that of the summons in In re Teissier's Settled Estates, which was before me yesterday. That was under the Settled Land Acts, and related to works done and proposed to be done to the mansion-house settled by a will, and to certain cottages on the estate settled by the same will. I referred the matter to chambers that the present tenant for life under the will might have the opportunity of producing further evidence, and get the most beneficial order to himself that could properly be made under the Settled Land Acts.

This is an application by the trustees, who hold a fund of personalty which, according to the testator's true meaning as ascertained by the court, is deemed to be capital money under the Settled Land Acts; and the trustees desire that I should now make some order giving them liberty to execute certain works on the mansion-house and cottages which confessedly are not within the scope of the Settled Land Acts. The proposition is addressed to what is termed the general jurisdiction of the court, and, as counsel has stated it, the proposition is one of salvage, or preserving the inheritance. I quite agree with what has been said by other judges with regard to salvage. The propositions which are put forward at the bar under that head are often of a very loose character indeed, and the court has to examine with care to see whether the case is one of salvage. But the case starts here with this, that what is proposed to be done will not be done under the Settled Land Acts. Those Acts, as is well known, have provided by means of most beneficial provisions for the improvement of the real estate as a whole, and among the improvements authorized are many which the old courts of equity had no power to allow to be done at the expense of the inheritance. Under the Settled Land Acts many things can be done by the present possessor of the property, the tenant for life, at the expense of the inheritance, and for the benefit of the estate, and a liberal view has been taken of things which are done, which are often more beneficial for those who are in possession than for those who come after. But the broad principle has been established, and, if I may say so, it is one which has operated greatly to the advantage of landowners in general.

I will shortly state the facts of the case. The testator has devised his real estate in strict settlement, including a mansion-house known as Bourne House, which he declared should be deemed the principal mansion-house within the meaning of section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, in words which, if not absolutely clear, are sufficient for their purpose. The limitations are—first to the present tenant for life; secondly, to a tenant for life in remainder in being, each of these two being of age and sui juris; and, thirdly, to another tenant for life in remainder, who is an infant. It has been suggested that the last may be tenant in tail, but as to that I express no opinion, only saying that, as far as I have heard anything about the will, the third person in succession now in being, is tenant for life. Now the mansion-house and cottages were left in bad repair by the testator. All the tenants for life are unimpeachable for waste, and there is no obligation to repair on any of them. They may exercise all legal rights over the mansion and property, subject to the doctrine of equitable waste. The testator lived in the house till his death. He has made no provision whatever by his will for putting the house into that state of repair which, according to modern notions—as I understand the evidence—would be suitable for such a house. The house is said to be uninhabitable. But the testator lived there till his death; therefore this means no more than not in a fit and proper condition for the habitation, according to their reasonable notions of what a house should be, of the present and next tenants for life. Now in accordance with the affidavits, which I must take as they stand, without accepting loose statements made at the bar with a view of supplementing the evidence, the plaintiff's counsel mentioned four points as to the mansion-house, viz., the state of the foundation of the outside wall, the state of the drainage, dry rot in the house, and some insignificant structural defects. [His lordship, in order to show the nature and extent of the reparation required, proceeded to read portions of the affidavit of Mr. Money, architect and surveyor, from which it appeared that owing to bad and imperfect drainage the soil under the house was sodden and dangerous to health, the foundations of the outside walls were thereby rendered insecure, the floors of certain rooms were completely decayed by dry rot, there being no ventilation and a waterlogged subsoil, and certain sanitary work was urgently necessary, the soil and other pipes being improperly laid and the soil pipes loose and leaking at the joints. His lordship then continued:—] That is the house which the testator has given in succession by way of legal estates to various tenants for life.

What has been done? I mention this, because some reliance seems to be placed upon the proceedings of the first tenant for life and the trustees, before the applications to the court. The tenant for life is one of the trustees. The trustees have no relation to or concern with the realty, with this exception, that they are the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and have a power of sale which they do not propose at present to exercise. The trustees themselves are under no liability with regard to the house, and they have no concern with the devised estates, except that relation which I have stated, which depends solely on the Settled Land Acts, and this application severs those Acts altogether and puts them out of consideration. Now it is plain that the tenant for life has given some order for work to be done, and that a sum of £930 has already been spent, and a sum of about that amount, it is contemplated, will be required to do the work, of which, however, there is no specification and no schedule; but the work is proposed to be done on the house. Upon the evidence as it stands the first tenant for life is alone responsible for the £930 expended. I am told at the bar (and I give way to counsel to this extent, that I merely mention the fact) that the trustees without any authority have already applied £930 out of the moneys which they hold representing capital money under the Settled Land Acts. Now it is clear from his evidence that the tenant for life desired and had the intention to reside upon the property with his family. There is a tenant for life, then, in possession who is minded to do this work. I am told that the result of the evidence is that he intends to do it, but to get the money for it, if he can (for this is the proposition, as I understand it), out of the capital moneys belonging to the estate.

Now I go back rather to review the case as it stands after this statement of facts. Whatever may be done to the mansion-house under the Settled Land Acts at the expense of the capital moneys will be done. Is this a case where, assuming that disposition of the settled moneys otherwise than as the Acts provide is not excluded by the Acts, a court of equity can, under any settled doctrine, order such payments as are now asked for? Salvage is pressed upon me. Is this a case of salvage? I could understand that where the court finds that the property has been condemned, and there are trustees who hold it in trust for different persons in succession, they can come to the court and say, This has been condemned; the trust estate will be put to expense; the sanitary authority will enter and do the work and will charge us; allow us as trustees, for the benefit of all concerned, to anticipate them and do the work and save the property. The court in such a case would, in my opinion, protect the property in that way, because there would be a legal demand made by some external authority which amounts to a vis major acting on the property. But here I cannot see any case of salvage.

In Hibbert v. Cooke, where the tenant for life had expended money in repairing the mansion-house, which had been damaged by dry rot, Leach, V.C., refused an inquiry, considering that the expense occasioned by the dry rot was an expense to which a tenant for life choosing to occupy a mansion-house must submit. That is to say, the tenant for life, choosing to reside there, is at liberty, out of his own pocket and at his own expense, to put the house into the condition that is required in order to remove that which was a fatal defect in the house. That principle, as far as I know, has never been questioned. Leach, V.C., evidently did not consider the case one of salving or preserving the inheritance, and his decision shows how any such argument, if it had been addressed to him, would have been dealt with. No authority has been produced for the proposition that is contended for on the part of the trustees under the general jurisdiction of the court.

I now come to the argument that it is for the benefit of all concerned that the expenditure should be authorized. The error on which it proceeds was well pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in In re Hurst, where he said, "It is a common popular idea that the court, in dealing with the property of infants, is somehow possessed of plenary powers, enabling it to do whatever seems advisable. But this is, of course, an error. It is only for the protection, and not for the alienation, of the property of infants that any jurisdiction is vested in the court, apart from express statutory authority" (29 L. R. Ir. Ch. D. 219, at p. 228). It was once thought that the court could order a sale of an infant's realty upon the ground that it would be beneficial to the infant, but that idea was exploded so long since as 1843 by the case of Calvert v. Godfrey. Then the Court of Appeal has laid it down that in the case of an infant absolutely entitled to real estate in possession the court has no jurisdiction to charge the real estate for the purpose of advancing the infant. That was a decision in a case where it was eminently desirable that such an advance should be made, if it could be made. That was the case of In re Swanston. I mention that, not by way of exhausting the matter, but for the purpose of showing that the jurisdiction which the court exercises over the real estate of infants is not to dispose of it at its will and pleasure, but practically it is to administer the estate.

There is one other case which I ought to mention. The present Lord Justice Kay had before him in In re Jackson the case of an infant entitled to real estate in possession, and the property was very dilapidated, and he considered that that was a case where the benefit of the infant was concerned, and I think that he also treated it as a case of salvage; but he decreed a very limited inquiry, and did not consider that there was jurisdiction allowing him to go beyond the very limited order which he made. But that was a jurisdiction which was exercised in the interests of an infant entitled to the inheritance. I have here an infant tenant for life in remainder only, which seems to me to distinguish the case at once. How can it be for the benefit of an infant tenant for life in remainder, there being two previous life estates before him, to have the expenditure made at the expense of capital in which he is interested? It is said that it is better to do these repairs now than to allow the house to get into a worse state of repair, such as it may be in when that infant comes into possession. It appears to me that this is a proposition which goes beyond the considerations which I am entitled to entertain. There is no evidence that the present tenant for life is impecunious. I see that the annual income which he derives from these capital moneys is more than the sum proposed to be expended. In re Hurst would not justify an inquiry here. Counsel found a difficulty in saying what the proper terms would be. An inquiry what repairs would be necessary to put the property in tenantable and habitable condition was suggested, but there would be no precedent under the general jurisdiction of the court for ordering such an inquiry; and In re Hurst is no authority, because the three infants entitled under the will in succession were in that case entitled to reside in the house under the trusts of the will. Conway v. Fenton is distinguishable on the grounds that the legal estate—i.e., the property—was there vested in the trustees for the husband and wife for their lives, and afterward for their children, who were infants and residing with them. The court there did direct an inquiry in a form which is stated at the end of the report. There was a trust for sale, and, therefore, though there was no immediate intention of selling, there were the combined elements of all the persons interested then being before the court, all persons interested living in the house or upon the estate, and a trust for sale, through the medium of which Kekewich, J., thought that he could apply the well-recognized doctrine of Vyse v. Foster, 21 W. R. 207, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 309.

I wish to add one practical observation. If I were to accede to this application I foresee similar applications in all cases of dilapidated mansion-houses similarly settled. The tenant for life would first apply, under the Settled Land Acts, to see what he could get under the Acts; and if he did not get all that he wanted, he would then try in this ingenious way and see what he could get under the general jurisdiction of the court. The Settled Land Acts, even if they are not exclusive of any of the doctrines of general jurisdiction which I have been considering, at any rate afford a guide to the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction in the matters to which they relate. And confessedly on this summons none of these things can be done under the Acts. Unless the court is firm in matters of this kind it will be flooded with applications.

In my opinion, although I am by no means adverse to the tenant for life and the trustees in such a case as this, this summons fails, and must be dismissed. I will allow the costs of all parties out of the testator's residuary personalty, though this is perhaps rather a strong thing to do.

Summons dismissed.

BERNERS v. CALVERT. (a.)

Power—Jointure and portions—Exercise of power—Devise of real estate and bequest of personal estate for purchase of land subject to same powers—Liability of devised estate to charges.

Real estate was settled with powers to the tenant for life to charge jointure and portions. On his marriage he in part exercised these powers and charged the settled estate, but not to the full extent authorized. At a subsequent period a testator devised real estate and bequeathed his residuary personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, to such of the uses and subject to such of the powers declared of the settled estate as should be subsisting at his death, but not so as to increase or multiply any charges or powers of charging. The tenant for life and the tenant in tail of the settled estate executed, after the testator's death, a disentailing assurance of all the properties subject to the settlement.

Held, that the devised estate and the residuary personal estate were not subject to the charges existing at the date of the testator's death; that a release of his still existing powers of charging ought to be executed by the tenant for life; and that the trustees of testator's will were thereupon bound to pay the residuary personalty to the tenant for life and the tenant in tail on their joint receipt.

Adjourned summons.

Under an indenture of settlement, dated the 23rd of April, 1864, certain real estate was settled to the use of John Berners for life, with remainder to his issue, remainder to the use of Hugh Berners for life, remainder to Charles Hugh Berners for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and various remainders over.

The settlement gave powers to Charles Hugh Berners to charge the settled estates by deed or will with a jointure for any woman he might marry, not exceeding £3,000 per annum, and with portions for his younger children, not exceeding £10,000 for each child.

In June, 1867, Charles Hugh Berners married, and by his marriage settlement, dated the 18th of June, charged the settled estates with a jointure of £1,000 per annum for his then intended wife if she should survive him, and with portions of £1,000 for each of the younger children of the intended marriage. There were issue of this marriage three sons and two daughters.

By his will, dated the 3rd of June, 1877, John Berners, who died without issue on the 31st of August, 1886, devised certain real estate to which he was entitled in fee simple to trustees, to such of the uses, and upon and for such of the trusts, and with, under, and subject to such of the powers and provisoes in and by the settlement of 1864 limited and declared, of or concerning the settled estates as at the time of his decease should be subsisting and undetermined or capable of taking effect or being performed, but not so as to increase or multiply any charges or powers of charging, to the intent that the devised estate might go and be held along with, and as part of, the settled estate, or as near thereto as circumstances would permit. And the testator bequeathed all his residuary personal estate to the same trustees, upon trust to pay off incumbrances on the settled estate or the devised estate existing at the time of the testator's death, or to lay out and invest the same in the purchase of real estate or in the purchase of the reversion to any leasehold premises, subject at the time to the uses of the settlement of 1864; and the hereditaments and premises so to be purchased were to be settled to the uses and upon the trusts, and with and subject to the powers and provisoes thereinbefore expressed and declared or referred to, of or concerning the hereditaments and premises thereinbefore devised, but not so as to increase or multiply any charges or powers of charging. Hugh Berners died on the 20th of September, 1886.

On the 27th of June, 1892, Charles Hugh Berners and his eldest son, John Anstruther Berners, who had attained twenty-one, executed a disentailing deed, whereby all the hereditaments which were subject at law or in equity to the subsisting uses of the settlement of 1864 were conveyed, and all the residuary personal estate of John Berners which was subject to be laid out in the purchase of land to be settled, was assigned, to a trustee to such uses and upon such trusts as Charles Hugh Berners and John Anstruther Berners should by deed jointly appoint.

This was an originating summons, taken out by Charles Hugh Berners and John Anstruther Berners, plaintiffs, to which the trustees of John Berners' will, the wife of Charles Hugh Berners, and the trustees of C. H. Berners' marriage settlement were made defendants, asking for a declaration that the trustees of the will might transfer or pay the residuary personal estate of the testator to the plaintiffs on their joint receipt or as they might jointly appoint.

The question at issue was whether the devised estate and the residuary personalty of the testator were subject to the charges for jointure and portions existing on the settled estate.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and L. S. Bristowe, for the plaintiffs.

Sebastian, for the trustees of the will.

Vernon Smith, for the wife of Charles Hugh Berners.

The cases of Smyth-Pigott v. Smyth-Pigott, W. N., 1884, p. 149, and Leigh v. Leigh, 18 W. R. 991, were referred to.

NORTH, J.—I do not think there is much difficulty about this question of construction. On looking at the will I think I can give effect to Mr. Hardy's contention that the language is to be construed fairly, but strictly, and is not to be extended to anything beyond what is contemplated by the settlement itself. The devised estate and the land to be purchased with the residuary personalty must be subject to the uses, trusts, and powers created by the settlement so far as they actually were subsisting at the time of the testator's death, but not further. The powers of jointuring and charging had at the time to some extent been exercised, and to that extent could not be exercised again, and to that extent, therefore, nothing further remained to be done under the settlement. There might be further portions charged and further jointures charged, as the power of charging is expressly kept open, so as to apply to the newly-devised and bequeathed property as well as to that originally subject to the settlement. The greatest difficulty I felt was in the phrase to which I have called attention, "so as not to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging"; but Mr. Vernon Smith points out that there is something to which "charges" can refer other than charges created by the exercise of the power to jointure or portion; and, that being so, I am not driven to say that charges here refers to charges already made under those powers, which, so far as they have been exercised, are dead. I think, therefore, that the direction that the testator's estate is to be subject to the subsisting powers of the settlement do subject the estate to any new charge by way of jointure or portions that may be created, but not to the charges already made under the powers of the settlement and existing at the date of the testator's death. I think there ought to be a release by the plaintiff Charles Hugh Berners of his power of charging and jointuring before the order is drawn up, whereupon there must be a declaration that the executors may be ordered, or be at liberty, to transfer and pay the residuary personal estate to the plaintiffs on their joint receipt.

Vendor and purchaser—Building scheme—Sale by auction in lots—Restrictive conditions—Subsequent sale of unsold lots—Retainer of adjoining land by vendor—Liability of vendor in respect of restrictive conditions.

A land company put up for sale by auction in lots property which was described as "a small freehold estate divided into twenty-two convenient lots of sound building sites." The particulars specified the dimensions of the lots, and had a plan annexed which showed the position and boundaries of such lots, and also the existence of houses on adjoining land of the company. The conditions of sale provided that each purchaser was to covenant that no buildings other than dwelling-houses should be erected upon the land purchased by him; that every such dwelling-house should cost not less than £250, and that the building line as shown upon the said plan in respect of the other lands of the vendors should be observed. The property put up for sale in lots formed only a portion of the estate of the vendors, which was of considerable extent. At the auction some only of the lots were sold. A. purchased one lot and accepted the title. Before the completion of the purchase, however, the vendors claimed the right to sell the remainder of the lots free from the restrictive conditions, and A. then took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, in substance to determine the question of right raised by the vendors, but in form to settle the terms of the covenants to be contained in the conveyance to him.

Held, that A. was entitled to the benefit of the contract by the vendors implied in the conditions of sale, that they would, as to lots unsold at the auction, observe stipulations similar to those which the purchasers of those lots, had they been sold, would have been bound to covenant to observe; and that the conveyance to him ought to contain an expression of such an obligation on the vendors.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, taken out by the purchaser of a plot of land (lot 15) at a sale by auction of several building sites, put up for sale in lots according to printed particulars and conditions of sale, asking for a declaration (1) that he was entitled to the benefit of a contract by the vendors, implied in the conditions of sale, that the vendors would, as to lots unsold at the auction, and including lots 8 to 14 both inclusive, and 16, 17, 20, 21, and 22, observe and abide by stipulations similar to those which the purchasers of those lots respectively, had they been sold at the auction, would have been bound to covenant that they would observe and abide by; (2) that the purchaser was entitled to have the obligations of the vendors in respect of the said unsold lots expressed in and made binding on them by the deed of conveyance of lot 15.

On the 5th of November, 1891, the company put up for sale a piece of freehold land at Moseley, near Birmingham, in lots according to certain particulars and conditions of sale. The particulars were stated to be "Particulars and plans of valuable freehold building sites in suitable lots for the erection of small villas situate in Cadbury-road, and a few plots in Stoney-lane and Anderton Park-road." The property for sale was described as "a small freehold estate divided into twenty-two convenient lots of sound building sites having frontages of 13 yards and upwards, and mean depths of about 40 yards, the lots varying in quantities from 289 square yards to 2,182 square yards, the building restriction being £250 per house." And there was this statement: "These eligible plots of land situated in a most desirable neighbourhood, for the greater part fronting on a newly-made road (which is properly curbed, channelled, and sewered in accordance with the requirements of the sanitary authority), and the whole are admirably adapted for the erection of a class of houses to be let at moderate rentals, for which there is considerable demand in this salubrious locality."

The plan showed that the property, which was marked out in lots, was a triangular piece of land, bounded on one side by Anderton Park-road, on another by Stoney-lane, and on the third by adjoining property, which apparently belonged to the vendors. Cadbury-road ran across the property separating some of the lots from the others. All the lots fronted on one or other of the three roads mentioned. The plan also showed that houses had been built on parts of the adjoining land and also on parts of the land on which the lots were marked, such last-mentioned houses having been built on pieces of land interpersed between the lots. There were names affixed to the houses so that any person looking at the plan would suppose that they were of the same character as the houses for the erection of which the lots to be sold were stated to be suitable.

The eleventh condition of sale was as follows:—"Each purchaser, in the assurance to him of the property purchased by him, shall covenant with the vendors, their successors and assigns, and also by way of separate covenant with the other conveying parties (if any), their heirs and assigns as follows: That no buildings other than dwelling-houses, with necessary outbuildings, shall be erected or built upon the land purchased by him. And that every such dwelling-house and outbuildings shall, in the erection and completion thereof, cost not less than the sum of £250, and that no house shall be used for any other purpose than as a private dwelling-house. That no building shall be erected upon any of the lots fronting to Anderton Park-road and Stoney-lane respectively within the building line as shown upon the plan annexed to the particulars, so that the line of buildings now standing upon the other land of the vendors, fronting Anderton Park-road and Stoney-lane respectively, shall be observed. And that no building shall be erected upon any of the lots fronting to Cadbury-road within the building line as shown upon the said plan, being a distance of three yards back from Cadbury-road."

At the auction some only of the lots were sold. Allday was the purchaser at the sale of lot 15. He accepted the vendor's title, and upon settling the draft conveyance contended that he was entitled to have an assignment of such benefit and right of enforcing any covenants entered into by any past or future purchasers of any of the other plots, restrictive of the right of building on or user of such plots, as the vendors might be able to convey. The vendors declined to give him the right which he asked for, and maintained their right to sell the remainder of the lots free from the restrictive conditions. Allday declined to complete, and took out this summons in substance to determine the question of right raised by the vendors, but in form to settle the terms of the covenants to be contained in the conveyance to him of lot 15.

T. C. Wright, for the purchaser.—The particulars and conditions of sale constituted a building scheme upon certain terms and subject to certain restrictive conditions, and the applicant is entitled to have those terms and conditions expressed in the conveyance to him: Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 28 Ibid. 9, 9 Ch. D. 125, 11 Ibid. 866. The property was put up for sale as one estate. There is consequently an implied contract that the whole of the property should remain subject to restrictive conditions: Martin v. Spicer, 37 W. R. 689, 34 Ch. D. 1, 14 App. Cas. 12; Mackenzie v. Childers, 38 W. R. 243, 43 Ch. D. 265. The vendors, if they had desired to subsequently sell the lots remaining unsold at the auction free from the restrictive conditions, should have expressly reserved to themselves, by the conditions of sale, the right to do so: Sidney v. Clarkson, 14 W. R. 157, 35 Beav. 118.

Hastings, Q.C., and H. Fellows, for the vendors.—If all the lots had been sold, the purchaser could, no doubt, have enforced these restrictive conditions against the purchasers of the other lots, but the case is different where, as here, the vendor retains part of the property in his own hands. The law as stated in Martin v. Spicer is not applicable, inasmuch as the plan annexed to the particulars and conditions of sale and the conditions themselves show that the vendors retained adjoining property, and it must therefore be assumed that they introduced these restrictions for the protection of the property retained by them. The judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in the Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 33 W. R. Dig. 231, 34 W. R. 405, 15 Q. B. D. 261, 16 Q. B. D. 778, supports that view.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued:—The question is one of principle, not conveyancing, and I have to decide whether the purchaser has a right to the declaration which he claims. On behalf of the purchaser, reliance was placed on the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in advising the House of Lords in Martin v. Spicer, 37 W. R. 689, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 12, at pp. 24-25. The passage relied on is somewhat long, but I will quote two extracts from it.—"If the site of the houses now known as Cromwell-gardens had been put up for sale by auction in building lots, according to a plan corresponding with that on Mr. Martin's lease, and if the conditions of sale had prescribed that houses should be built such as those which have actually been erected, and that every purchaser should bind himself by a covenant in the terms of the restrictive covenant now in question, no one, I think, could have doubted that each purchaser would, as against the vendor, and as against every co-purchaser, have had a right to the benefit of the covenant, although there might have been no direct covenants by the purchasers inter se." And further on he says: "It seems to me that when Mr. Spicer put his houses in Cromwell-gardens on the market he invited the public to come in and take a portion of an estate which was bound by one general law—a law perfectly well understood, and one calculated and intended to add to the security of the lessees, and consequently to increase the price of the houses. The benefit of that increase, whatever it was, Mr. Spicer got. Can he or his representative be permitted to destroy the value of the thing he sold by authorizing the use of part of the estate for a purpose inconsistent with the law by which he professed to bind the whole?"

On behalf of the vendors it is said that the law as thus stated is inapplicable, on the ground that it appears from the plan which is annexed to the particulars and conditions of sale and from the conditions themselves, that the vendors retained in their own hands the adjoining property, and that these restrictive stipulations must therefore be taken to have been introduced for the protection of the property retained by them. In support of that view they rely on the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in The Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler. I will first of all refer to the judgment in that case given in the court below by Wills, J., 15 Q. B. D., at p. 268, which was approved of by Lindley, L.J., as being a correct statement of law: "The principle which appears to me to be deducible from the cases is that where the same vendor, selling to several persons plots of land, parts of a larger property, exacts from each of them covenants imposing restrictions on the use of the plots sold without putting himself under any corresponding obligation, it is a question of fact whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees, imposed for his own benefit and protection, or are meant by him, and understood by the buyers, to be for the common advantage of the several purchasers. If the restrictive covenants are simply for the benefit of the vendor, purchasers of other plots of land from the vendor cannot claim to take advantage of them. If they are meant for the common advantage of a set of purchasers, such purchasers and their assigns may enforce them inter se for their own benefit." Then he says: "It appears to me that where land is put up to auction in lots, and two or more persons purchase according to conditions of sale containing restrictions of the character of those under consideration in the present case, it is very difficult to resist the inference that they were intended for the common benefit of such purchasers, especially where the vendor purposes (as in the present case) to sell the whole of his property. Where he retains none, how can the covenants be for his benefit; and for what purpose can they be proposed except that each purchaser, expecting the benefit of them as against his neighbours, may be willing on that account to pay a higher price for his land than if he bought at the risk of whatever use his neighbour might choose to put his property to? Where, therefore, the vendor desires to sell at the auction the whole of his property, the inference is strong that such covenants are for the common benefit of the purchasers; and it seems to me that the strength of this evidence is not diminished by the fact that at the sale a considerable number of the lots may fail to find purchasers." When the case was heard on appeal, the Master of the Rolls says this (16 Q. B. D., at p. 784): "I think that Wills, J.'s view of the law on this subject is perfectly correct. In my view he is right in saying that, when an estate is put up for sale in lots, subject to a condition that restrictive covenants are to be entered into by each of the purchasers with the vendor, and the vendor is intending at that sale to sell the whole of the property, the question whether it is intended that each of the purchasers shall be liable in respect of those restrictive covenants to each of the other purchasers is a question of fact to be determined by the intention of the vendor and of the purchasers, and that question must be determined upon the same rules of evidence as every other question of intention. And if it is found that it was the intention that the purchasers should be bound by the covenants inter se, a court of equity will, in favour of any one of the purchasers, insist upon the performance of the covenants by any other of them, and will do so under such circumstances without introducing the vendor into the matter." Then he says: "There are two lines of cases to be found in the books. The first is where there has been a sale of part of a property, with no existing intention of selling the rest, and subsequently there is a sale of another part; then, as regards the later sale, you connot look at the conditions of the former sale, you must look only at the conditions relating to the later sale. The other line of cases is where the whole of a property is put up for sale (not necessarily under a building scheme), but is put up for sale in lots, subject to certain restrictive covenants; then it is a question of fact whether it was or was not the intention that the restrictive covenants should be entered into for the benefit of each of the purchasers as against all the others, and it is a most material circumstance whether the vendor reserves any part of the property for himself. If he does not reserve any part, that is almost, if not quite, conclusive (unless there is something contradictory) that the covenants which he takes from the purchasers are intended for the benefit of each purchaser as against the others."

The judgments of the other Lords Justices do not go any further, but Lindley, L.J., approves of the statement of the law as given by Wills, J.

That case is cited as an authority for the contention that the restrictive conditions are only enforceable against a vendor by a purchaser when the vendor has disposed of the whole of the property. I confess I cannot come to that conclusion. I take the same view as Wills, J., that "it is a question of fact whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees, imposed for his own benefit and protection, or are meant by him, and understood by the buyers to be, for the common advantage of the several purchasers," and that is a question of fact to be determined, not by looking at one circumstance, but at all the circumstances of the case; and, indeed, the language of the Master of the Rolls seems to me to point strongly to that conclusion, though in the judgment referred to he was speaking of a case in which the vendor was disposing of the whole estate. He says: "If the vendor does not reserve any part, that is almost, if not quite, conclusive (unless there is something contradictory)"; but that language appears to concede that the conclusion may be rebutted by something else. The retainer by the vendor of some part of the property is an element, and a very important element; but, after all, it is only one element to be taken into consideration along with other circumstances in ascertaining the intention. It appears to me that, although the vendor may not part with his whole estate, there may be circumstances which show that the intention was that each purchaser should be entitled to enforce the whole of the building restrictions against the vendor and every other purchaser.

That being so, let us turn to the particulars and conditions in the present case. [His lordship read the statements in the particulars above set out, and continued:—] What would a purchaser infer from reading the particulars and looking at the plan? Admitting that it appears (as it certainly does appear) from the plan and conditions that the vendors were owners of other property in the immediate neighbourhood, it is still to be borne in mind that the owners of building estates in the neighbourhood of large towns such as Birmingham do not throw the whole of their estates on the market at once; and, further, that they do not devote the whole estate to the erection of the same class of houses, but very often appropriate one portion to one class and another portion to another class, and that these various plots do not, in the language of the particulars, become "ripe for building operations" at the same time, and that considerations of this kind apply with not less force when the vendor is a land company presumably dealing with land for the purposes of sale, and not for the purpose of retention as a permanent investment. It would seem to me, then, that, looking at the particulars of sale, a purchaser would naturally infer that this property, described as "a small freehold estate," had been selected by the vendors from the larger property belonging to them as a portion of land to be devoted to the erection of houses of a particular value and to be occupied as residences. What do the conditions of sale say? The restrictive conditions prescribe this:—[His lordship read the 11th condition, and continued:—] These conditions provide in substance for three things—(1) for the erection of private dwelling-houses only; (2) for a minimum value as regards each house erected; and (3) for adherence to a building-line stated to be already existing as regards buildings on other land of the vendors. Now the plan annexed to the particulars shows each lot on the adjoining land of the vendors as having a house already erected on it, and in most cases as bearing a name such as indicates an ordinary villa residence of the class usually found in the neighbourhood of large towns, but there is no evidence before me of their value. It may fairly be assumed, as against the vendors, that those houses were not under the value fixed as a minimum. As regards the land thus retained by the vendors, the intending purchaser would see that the building conditions had already been complied with, and the inference which I have already suggested as that likely to occur to his mind would be confirmed.

It seems to me, therefore, that these particulars and conditions constituted (in the language of Lord Macnaghten in Spicer v. Martin) an invitation to the public to come in and purchase on the footing that the whole of the property offered for sale was to be bound by one general law affecting the character of the buildings to be erected thereon; and that the vendors ought not to be considered to be at liberty to destroy the value of that which was sold, by authorizing the use of a part of the property for a purpose inconsistent with the law by which they purported to bind the whole. It is said, and, indeed, the secretary of the company has sworn, that the company never intended to give the purchaser the benefit claimed by him. Upon that it is to be remarked that whereas a purchaser cannot dive into the recesses of a vendor's mind, a vendor offering property always has it in his power to make his intentions clear, and it is his duty so to do. It has long been the practice for vendors whose intentions are such as stated by the secretary of the company to reserve by express conditions power to make future sales discharged from restrictive conditions. An example is to be found in the case cited in argument of Sidney v. Clarkson, which was decided so far back as the year 1865. I do not, of course, mean that the vendor cannot indicate his intention in other ways; but this consideration appears to me to relieve such a case as the present from any element of hardship to which weight might otherwise attach. I may add that the remarks of Lord Langdale in Peacock v. Penson, 11 Beav. 355, see p. 359, and the case of Collins v. Castle, 36 W. R. 300, 36 Ch. D. 243, appear to me to support the view which I have taken. I think, therefore, that the purchaser is entitled to the declaration which he asks.

His lordship then made a declaration that the applicant Allday was entitled to the benefit of a contract by the vendors, implied by the conditions of sale, that the vendors would, as to lots unsold at the auction at which Allday bought, observe and abide by stipulations similar to those which the purchasers of those lots, had they been sold at the auctions, would have been bound to covenant that they would observe and abide by, and that the applicant was entitled to have such obligations of the vendors expressed in the conveyance to him of his lot.

BARNARD v. FABER. (a.)

Insurance—Fire—Lloyd's policy—"To be on same rate, terms, and identical interest" as specified assurance companies, "and to follow their settlements"—Construction.

The plaintiff effected with the defendant, a Lloyd's underwriter, a policy of fire insurance, containing the following clause:—"Warranted to be on same rate, terms, and identical interest as the U. Assurance Co. £800, and the G. Assurance Co. £700, and to follow their settlements." The rate at which the plaintiff had insured with the U. Co. was not, in fact, the same as the rate specified in the Lloyd's policy.

Held (reversing Wright, J.) that the clause, on its true construction, constituted a stipulation by the plaintiff with the defendant that the plaintiff had insured in the two other companies on the same terms as to risk, the same rate, and identical interest, as was thereby undertaken by Lloyd's underwriters; that such stipulation was one going to the root of the transaction, and therefore a condition precedent to any liability under the Lloyds policy on the part of the defendant; and, as the condition had not been fulfilled, that the defendant was not liable.

Semble, that the construction of the clause would have been the same, even if the word "warranted" had not been used.

Appeal from the decision of Wright, J.

The action was in respect of a policy of fire insurance for £1,000 upon furniture and other things in a music hall and tavern belonging to the plaintiff, effected by the plaintiff with, and subscribed by, certain Lloyd's underwriters.

The policy was in the form known as a Lloyd's fire policy, and it stated that the plaintiff had paid 25s. per cent. premium or consideration to the underwriters, whose names were subscribed at foot, to insure from all loss or damage by fire the furniture, &c., specified; and the policy contained the following clause, upon which the question in the present case turned: "Warranted to be on same rate, terms, and identical interest as Union Assurance Co., £800, and Glasgow and London, £700, and to follow their settlements." Each of the underwriters thereby bound himself to pay to the plaintiff all such damage and loss by fire, not exceeding the sum of £1,000, within thirty days after such loss was proved, and in proportion to the several sums by each of the underwriters subscribed against their respective names, &c.

Whilst the said policy was running, the particular part of the property insured, was destroyed by fire. The defendant was one of the underwriters of the Lloyd's policy. The plaintiff had insured the property in the Union Assurance Co. for £800, and in the Glasgow and London Co. for £700, but it appeared from the evidence and admissions that the time of the policy differed in the Union Insurance Co. and the Glasgow and London Co., and that although the premium rate was the same in the Glasgow and London as in the Lloyd's policy—viz., 25s. per cent.—yet the premium rate in the Union Assurance policy was 31s. 6d. per cent. Certain fire assessors employed by the Union Assurance Co. and by the Glasgow and London Co. made a settlement of the plaintiff's loss in the following proportions: The Union Co., £202 18s.; the Glasgow and London Co., £534 2s.; Lloyd's underwriters, £763; total, £1,500.

The plaintiff by his claim asked to have it declared that the defendant was bound by this settlement and should pay his proportion of the loss upon the basis of such settlement; or, in the alternative, for a declaration of the principle upon which the defendant's proportion of the loss was to be ascertained, and payment of his proportion as so ascertained.

The defendant by his defence alleged that the Union Assurance Co. had not insured on the same rate and terms, or on the same identical interest, as was thereby insured by Lloyd's; that the warranty to that effect in the Lloyd's policy had not been fulfilled; that the policy was in consequence rendered void, and that the defendant was under no liability to the plaintiff.

Wright, J., held that, on the true construction of the clause in question of the policy, it merely amounted to a collateral stipulation by the plaintiff, the non-performance of which did not avoid the defendant's obligation altogether, but only added something, not necessarily involved in the contract itself, which might give rise to a right of action, counter-claim, set-off, or reduction, on the part of the defendant. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and T. Willes Chitty, for the appellant.—The clause "warranted to be on the same rate, terms, and identical interest," &c., was the basis of the contract entered into by Lloyd's underwriters. It was a condition precedent to any liability on the part of Lloyd's underwriters that the assured should have been insured in the other offices mentioned on the same terms, rate, and interest as Lloyd's underwriters undertook. This condition has not been fulfilled, and the policy is, therefore, ineffectual, and the defendant is under no liability to the plaintiff.

They referred to Behn v. Burness, 11 W. R. 496, 3 B. & S. 751, and a transcript of the shorthand notes of the judgment of Mathew, J., in Harvey v. Uzielli (unreported), a case which turned on the construction of a Lloyd's fire policy containing a similar clause, in which, however, the word "warranted" was not used. [They were stopped.]

Geo. Wood Hill (Cohen, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The clause is not a condition on which the liability of the underwriters depends. It is a mere collateral representation of fact by the assured. All stipulations in a charter-party are not conditions. It is a matter of common knowledge as regards fire policies that no two fire insurance companies have exactly the same terms in their policies. There is a valid contract effected under this policy with the defendant, although the plaintiff may possibly be liable in damages for misrepresentation. The clause as it stands cannot be construed as a condition precedent to the existence of any obligation on the part of the defendant, because the words of the clause, "and to follow their settlements," necessarily imply and recognize the existence of the obligation itself, and merely point to the mode in which the performance of the obligation is to be carried out.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I cannot agree with the view taken by the learned judge below, of the true construction of this document. The document certainly is not as plain as it might be; and if clauses are put in by unskilful people, and fire policies are built up as marine policies have been, I suppose there will be as much litigation before we understand a fire policy, as there has been to enable us to understand a marine policy.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The real point in this case is to get at what is the object of the insertion of the clause which has been so much commented upon in argument, and which I will read. This is a fire policy effected by Barnard with Faber on certain property at 25s. per cent.; and the clause is as follows: "Warranted to be on the same rate, terms, and identical interest as Union Assurance Co. £800, and Glasgow and London £700, and to follow their settlements." Now what is the object of the insertion of that clause? It appears to me it can really have only one object — viz., that "We (the underwriters) will insure, provided we are satisfied that the Union Co. and the Glasgow and London Co. have insured at the same rate, the same terms, and the same interest." I do not profess to understand exactly what the word "terms" means. I can get at it approximately, as being "terms as to risk," and I suppose that is what is meant. It cannot mean terms which are immaterial for the purposes of the contract which the parties are making; it does not matter, for example, whether these companies pay thirty days after loss, or forty or fifty days after loss—at least I should think not. That is not what the parties were aiming at. They were aiming in this clause at the risk; that is what they wanted to get at. The clause is equivalent to this, "Satisfy us that these two offices have insured the same risk, the same interest at the same rate, and we will effect the policy." I cannot myself think that the term "warranted" is important in itself, for I should construe the policy in exactly the same way whether the word "warranted" was in or out. The word "warranted" was not in the policy in the case before Mathew, J. (Harvey v. Uzielli), and I do not think that the policy is made plainer by the introduction of that word. I look on the policy as being made on a condition—but not wholly as a condition precedent, for that would make nonsense of it—but I regard the words "to be on the same rate, terms, and interest as" (the two named offices) as a condition precedent to the incurring of any liability at all, and the other words as a condition subsequent.

Unless you read it in that way, what is the position in which you will find yourself landed? You would find then that the underwriters have come under an obligation with only a right of cross-action against the insured. Can that have been the meaning of anybody? Did Barnard mean that? Did they mean that? Was that the object of inserting such a clause? It is so entirely novel that it strikes one as being strange, to say the least of it. And when you find a clause which is consistent with the ordinary habits of men if you interpret it one way, and utterly inconsistent with their ordinary habits if you interpret it the other way, I prefer the first, supposing the language admits of a double interpretation.

The more one looks at the document the more plainly it appears that the bargain was, "We will not insure except upon the terms as to risk that these two offices have insured—upon the same rate, upon the same terms (whatever they may be), and upon the same interest."

I think, therefore, that the learned judge below has gone wrong, and that the defendant is in the right, and judgment must be entered for the defendant, with costs here and below.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I confess that I consider the matter to be quite clear. I do not mean to say that the words are happily chosen in this policy, but I think the true meaning of it is really transparent.

The object of the clause in question is to have other companies or underwriters in the same boat as regards the particular interest and the risk to be covered. The clause is unquestionably one intended for the protection of the underwriter. When you have arrived at that, it seems to me you have arrived at half the journey's end, because it can be no adequate protection of the underwriters to relegate them to a cross-action. It is intended to protect them against having to pay, not merely to give them a right to bring an action against the man insuring with them. But the way in which the clause is inserted seems to me to lead to precisely the same conclusion, and beyond all shadow of doubt to guide one to that same end. The policy is signed by the underwriters, it is not signed by the insurer, and it is expressed in this way: [The Lord Justice read the clause and proceeded:—] "Warranted to be" must mean "guaranteed to be or promised to be"; and as soon as you observe that this document is one which the underwriters sign, it must mean, "It is a term of our promise that there shall be a guarantee or promise of the other side," and that guarantee or promise of the other side is then expressed. There is to be the same rate, the same terms, the identical interest as in the case of the other two companies. It is therefore a term of this policy that there should be this promise, and if this promise is one which goes to the root of the whole engagement and transaction, then it becomes, according to the ordinary principles of law, a condition—either a condition precedent, or, if this particular matter is one which cannot be construed as a condition precedent, and must be a condition subsequent, then it becomes a condition subsequent. That depends upon the materiality of the promise which is assumed to be made, and the making of which is to be a term of the engagement into which the underwriter has entered. It arises from the materiality of that promise as regards the entire transaction. When you have got as far as that, it is clear that it is to be as regards the risk—that the terms (as to risk) must be material. The words "same rate and identical interest" obviously are words so material to the transaction that we can only construe the language which applies to it as creating a condition precedent. With regard to the word "terms," it is not necessary for us to decide or explain exactly what that word means. I do not myself doubt that there is a limitation which can be put on it, a limitation to be derived from the character of the document, and from the nature of the transaction and the nature of the stipulation itself, which reduces within defined and reasonable limits that which otherwise might be vague, illimitable, and impracticable. But when you regard the words which alone we have to look at for the purposes of this appeal, "the same rate and identical interest" as the other two insurance companies, I do not doubt for a moment that it is a condition without which the contract cannot arise. With regard to the words "to follow their settlement," that is a condition subsequent, as Lindley, L.J., has said.

That is the true construction of the document. The opposite view is one, to my mind, which never could be adopted in business, for this reason, that I do not believe there is an underwriter in the world of any position or eminence who would put his hand to a policy in which a term affecting the risk directly, was to be enforced only by a cross-action on the part of the underwriter brought against the man after the loss. The point has been put in a nutshell in the judgment of Mathew, J., in Harvey v. Uzielli. He says it turns on the materiality of this promise. So it does. It is because the promise is so material to the construction of the risk that it seems to me to become a condition precedent.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Wright, J., had considerable doubt and difficulty about the judgment he arrived at in the end, and I think he got down at last on the wrong side of the rail. Looking at this clause, the question which one has to ask oneself is this, Does this clause contain a promise which goes to the root of the transaction, or is it merely a collateral stipulation the non-performance of which did not avoid the defendant's obligation, but only gave him a right to a cause of action? We must look to the business of the matter in construing this clause, and I quite agree with Lindley, L.J., that it is immaterial whether the word "warranted" is in this clause or not. I strike that out. The question is, What is the promise? Is it a promise which goes to the root of the whole transaction? Now, to state it as shortly as I can, in my judgment there is a stipulation in this contract between the underwriter and the assured that the underwriter undertakes to insure, provided that he undertakes the same risks which the two other offices have undertaken, which offices he knows and which he is content to abide by. If the other two offices have not undertaken the same risk, then, in my opinion, it being a condition of this policy that those two offices should have undertaken the same risk, then the policy is ineffectual. On these grounds I am of opinion that the clause is a condition, and not a collateral agreement, and that the defence is a good one.

Sale of goods—Sale by sample—Place for delivery—Place for inspection — Contract — When property in goods sold passed.

The plaintiff, a farmer, sold by sample to the defendant, a corn dealer, a quantity of barley. In accordance with the terms of the contract the plaintiff, at his own expense, delivered the barley in sacks at T., a small roadside railway station. The plaintiff, at the time of the sale to the defendant, was aware that the defendant would resell the barley to brewers or maltsters, but had no knowledge when or to whom such resale would take place, or to whom the defendant would consign the barley. The defendant, in fact, on the same day resold the barley to a firm of brewers carrying on business at S. The defendant, on hearing of the arrival of the barley at T. station, directed the stationmaster to take and forward him a sample, and this the stationmaster did. The defendant, after inspection of the sample, ordered the stationmaster to send on the barley to the defendant's sub-vendees, the brewers at S. The defendant subsequently rejected the barley as inferior to sample. There was evidence to show that the bulk of the barley could be inspected in the sacks in the trucks at T. station.

Held, on these facts, that there was nothing to displace the primâ facie presumption that T. station, the place of delivery by the plaintiff (vendor), was also the place for inspection, and that the property in the barley passed when the defendant took possession of the barley at T. station, and ordered it to be sent on to his sub-vendees at S.; and, consequently, that the defendant was not entitled afterwards to reject the barley.

(a) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Lawrance, J.

The action was for goods sold and delivered, and the point raised was whether, under the contract and the circumstances of the case, the defendant was entitled to reject the goods purchased and throw them upon the plaintiff's hands; or, in other words, whether the property in the goods had passed to the defendant before he sought to reject them.

Upon the 4th of October, 1890, the plaintiff, who was a farmer, sold to the defendant, who was a corn dealer, at his stand in Leicester market, by sample, thirty-one quarters of malting barley at 34s. a quarter, to be delivered in sacks at Theddingworth Station, about two and a half miles from the plaintiff's farm. At the time of the sale the plaintiff was aware that the defendant would resell the barley, and probably to brewers or maltsters; but the plaintiff had no knowledge when or to whom such resales would take place nor to where the defendant would consign the barley. As a matter of fact, as it turned out, the defendant on the same day resold the barley by the same sample to Messrs. Sharpe & Co., brewers and maltsters, at Silsby, at an advance of 2s. per quarter. On the 7th of October the plaintiff sold to the defendant in Market Harborough market three more quarters of barley of not such good quality as the first; and it was arranged that the plaintiff should send to the defendant a sample of this barley, the price to be thereafter agreed upon. This barley was also to be delivered by the plaintiff in sacks at Theddingworth Station. Upon the plaintiff's arriving home at his farm in the evening he found that his men, whilst winnowing the three quarters, had, against his orders, mixed them with the thirty-one quarters, and he at once wrote to the defendant informing him of what had been done, and adding that if the defendant complained that it made any difference to him in the sample he (the plaintiff) would make it good, but he hoped that it would not. Upon receipt of this letter the defendant, on the 8th of October, wrote to the stationmaster at Theddingworth Station to forward him a sample of the "about thirty-five quarters of barley ex A. K. Perkins." This the stationmaster did, taking the sample out of twenty of the thirty-four quarters which had then arrived at his station. The residue arrived there the next day. It was admitted that the stationmaster took a fair sample of the barley. Having inspected this sample the defendant, on the 9th of October, ordered the stationmaster to forward the thirty-four quarters (called forty) to the order of Messrs. Sharpe & Sons, maltsters, Silsby, at Silsby Station, stating that the cost of carriage was to be placed to his account. On the 10th of October the barley was sent off. On the 16th of October Messrs. Sharpe, by telegraph to the defendant, rejected the barley, which was then at Silsby, and the defendant thereupon wrote to Messrs. Sharpe as follows:—"October 16, 1890.—Your telegram to hand. I can only say we had a bulk sample from sending station before moving on, and considered it a fair delivery. However, will you bring large bulk sample on Saturday to Leicester market, and oblige? The barley left sending station on the 10th inst., according to my back rate.—Yours truly, WILLIAM BELL, jun." On the same day, before the receipt of the above-mentioned letter, Messrs. Sharpe wrote to the defendant stating, "It seems strange that you did not take a bulk sample of it yourself before ordering on to Silsby, and thus save carriage. We feel sure if you had done so, as promised, you would not have sent it, as it is quite unfit for brewing of ale."

The barley was subsequently rejected by the defendant, and hence the present action.

Lawrance, J., held that the defendant was, under the circumstances, entitled to reject the barley; and he accordingly dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Toller, for the appellant.—Once the property in the goods sold passed, the defendant's right of inspection is gone, and in this case the property in the goods passed on the 9th of October, when the defendant directed the stationmaster at Theddingworth Station, where the barley then was, to send on the barley to Silsby to Messrs. Sharpe. The judge in the court below relied on Kibble v. Gough, 38 L. T. N. S. 204, 26 W. R. Dig. 93, but that case is not applicable at all to the circumstances of the present case. The defendant, through his agent the stationmaster at Theddingworth, in fact took a bulk sample of the barley at Theddingworth, and was satisfied with it, for he ordered it to be sent on to Silsby. After that it was too late for the defendant to reject the barley.

He cited Lorymer v. Smith, 1 B. & C. 1; Parker v. Palmer, 4 B. & Ald. 387; Heilbutt v. Hickson, 20 W. R. 1005, L. R. 7 C. P. 438.

Loyd, Q.C., for the defendant, the respondent.—In the case of a sale by sample, the buyer is entitled to a fair opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sale sample after the goods have been delivered, and in such case the place of delivery is not necessarily the place where inspection must be had. The plaintiff knew that the defendant was not buying the barley for himself, but with a view to resell it to a brewer. Having regard to the nature of the transaction itself and to the general practice of the trade in like cases, it was an implied term of the contract that the place for inspection of the barley was not to be the roadside station at which the farmer was to deliver the grain, but such a place as might be named by the buyer, although such place might be unknown to the seller. Inspection of the barley in bulk at Theddingworth Station was impracticable, and was never contemplated by the parties. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Poulton v. Lattimore, 9 B. & C. 259.] The plaintiff knew that the defendant, being only a corn dealer, had no premises at Theddingworth where the barley could be properly inspected.

He cited Morton v. Tibbett, 15 Q. B. 428; Page v. Morgan, 33 W. R. 793, 15 Q. B. D. 228; and Grimoldby v. Wells, 23 W. R. 524, L. R. 10 C. P. 391.

Toller, in reply.—In Heilbutt v. Hickson the case of Poulton v. Lattimore was treated by Bovill, C.J., as a case of total failure of consideration.

Dec. 17.—The written judgment of the COURT (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ.) was read by

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—[After stating the facts as above set out, his lordship proceeded:—] The sole point the parties raise is whether upon the contract between them, and the facts of this case, the defendant was in time in rejecting the barley as and when he did. My brother Lawrance held that he was; and hence the present appeal. It will be noticed that by the contract the plaintiff was to deliver the barley at Theddingworth Station. No other destination was known to him, and we cannot doubt that if this had been a sale of specific ascertained barley, the property therein would have passed to the defendant upon its delivery to the railway company at the station by the plaintiff. The railway company would thereupon have become the agents of the defendant to receive it and to carry it to any place or places the defendant might direct. But it was said by Mr. Loyd for the defendant, that inasmuch as this was a sale by sample, the defendant was entitled to a fair opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sale sample after delivery, before the property in the barley passed to him, and that the place for inspection need not necessarily be the place at which the delivery is to be made; and in this we agree. The question, however, is if there can be read into this contract an implied term that the inspection was to be had at any place fixed by the vendee without the knowledge of the vendor. This is not a case in which before a sale by sample it is agreed that the destination of the goods shall be the vendee's premises or some other named locality, and that the transit thereto shall be performed partly by the vendor and partly by the vendee. In such a case it would be right to imply that the destination agreed upon, was the place for inspection, and that the joint transit was only an agreed mode of getting the goods there: see Grimoldby v. Wells. This is a case in which at the time of sale the only known destination was Theddingworth Station, at which the vendor undertook to deliver the barley at his own risk and expense. Of all that should take place afterwards as regards the barley, the vendor knew nothing. It was entirely at the disposal of the vendee, who might send it where and to whom he pleased, and when he pleased, and over which disposition the seller could exercise no control.

We find no evidence in this case to dislodge the presumption which primâ facie arises, that the place of delivery is the place of inspection. To hold otherwise would be to expose the vendor to unknown risks, impossible of calculation, when the contract was entered into. The vendee might consign the barley not only to one, but to different sub-vendees, living in different places and at different distances from Theddingworth Station, and until arrival at these places the barley would be at the risk of the vendor. If the barley was rejected by these sub-vendees upon arrival, the vendor would have at his own risk and cost to take the barley back from whatever places it might happen to be in, no matter how far they might be from Theddingworth Station, or to arrange for its sale at the places where it then was. As to these risks the contract is wholly silent, and in our judgment it is impossible to read into it that the vendor undertook these risks, as we were invited by Mr. Loyd to do. It was argued that Theddingworth Station was a mere roadside station, and that there was no opportunity there of comparing the bulk with the sample, and that consequently the station was not the place for inspection and that some other place was, and that this was the warehouse of the maltsters or brewers to whom the defendant might have chanced to have sent the barley. The evidence given shows that the bulk could be inspected in the sacks in the trucks at the station. The suggestion that the barley had to be shot before inspection is untenable, and there is no evidence to support it. Moreover, the letters of the 16th of October show that neither the defendant nor Messrs. Sharpe considered that there was any difficulty whatever in taking a bulk sample at the station; the one saying that he had had one taken, and the other saying that he should have done so, as promised. It seems to us that even if the plaintiff's country solicitors did take a wrong view of their client's position under the contract, as suggested by Mr. Loyd, this cannot affect its construction; and as there is nothing in the contract itself, nor any evidence, to show that by usage of trade as applied to such a contract, or otherwise, the primâ facie place for inspection had been altered, in our judgment, under the contract the place of delivery named was the place where the inspection was to be had, and consequently Theddingworth Station was the place where rejection should have taken place, and not the premises of the maltsters at Silsby. When the defendant took possession of the barley at the station and ordered it to his sub-vendees, the property in the barley passed to him, and his right of rejection was then gone. For these reasons we think the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. Lawrance, J., does not appear to have had his mind sufficiently directed to the real nature of the contract between the parties. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

Master and servant—Wages—Payment otherwise than in current coin—Deductions—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), s. 23.

The plaintiff, upon entering the employment of the defendants, signed an agreement to conform to all the rules of the defendants' works. One of the rules provided that the employés were to become members of the sick and accident club connected with the works, and were to contribute weekly to its funds according to the amount of wages received by each. The amount of the plaintiff's contribution was deducted weekly from her wages and paid over to the sick and accident fund. In an action by the plaintiff to recover as arrears of wages the deductions so made, except those in respect of medicine and medical attendance, Held, that the agreement under which the deductions were made was illegal under the Truck Act, and therefore could not justify the deductions being made, nor could it be vouched as an authority by the plaintiff to the defendants to pay the contributions for her to the fund; but that the plaintiff, by her conduct and acquiescence, had precluded herself from recovering the amount so paid.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division reversing the judgment of the Bow County Court judge.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants in their confectionery works, to recover £1 13s. 7d., being the amount of alleged illegal deductions from her wages. The plaintiff, upon entering the defendants' employment in 1886, signed a document by which she agreed to conform to all the rules and regulations of the defendants' works. Rule 28 provided that "all employés will have to become members of the Sick and Accident Club." By the rules of the sick and accident club the contributors were to consist of all employed in the works, who should contribute according to their wages, and the defendants deducted 2½d. weekly from the plaintiff's wages and paid it over to the fund. The plaintiff, upon leaving the defendants' employment, brought an action to recover the amount of the deductions as being illegal under the Truck Acts. It was admitted at the trial that part of this sum was properly deducted in respect of medicine and medical attendance, and the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the balance, £1 6s. 10d., upon the ground that these deductions were not authorized by section 23 of the Truck Act, 1831. The Divisional Court (Day and Charles, JJ.) reversed this judgment. The plaintiff by leave appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 10.—The judgment of Lord ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN, L.J., was read by BOWEN, L.J.—This cases raises a very important inquiry as to the meaning and construction of the Truck Acts, and more particularly of sections 2, 3, 4, and 23 of 1 and 2 Will. 4, c. 37. The plaintiff was, at different periods, ranging over some years, in the employ of the defendants, who are proprietors of large confectionery works, and her action was brought to recover arrears of unpaid wages amounting to £1 13s. 7d. The contention of the defendants is that the sums sued for are deductions which represent payments made with her consent during the period of her service to a sick and benefit society in connection with the works, and that such deductions either are excepted by section 23 from the general scope of the Act or else are payments made at her request to a fund under circumstances which would constitute a defence for the defendants by way of set-off or counter-claim or otherwise. The case was heard before the county court judge. At the hearing the plaintiff withdrew from her claim the sum of 6s. 9d., which represented contributions for medicine and medical attendance, and the judge directed judgment to be entered in her favour for the residue, £1 6s. 10d. on the ground that the defendants, by reason of the Truck Acts, could not justify the retention or deduction of the latter sum. The Divisional Court reversed his judgment, and the appeal has been brought by leave from their decision.

The clear intention of the Truck Acts was to insure to workmen the payment of the entire amount of their wages in actual current coin of the realm, unfettered by any promise or obligation that it should be spent in any particular manner or at any particular shop. The Legislature endeavoured to secure that the workman might have in his hand the very actual coin representing his wages, in order that he and his family might freely carry it home or expend it without impediment in the open market. Subject to certain exceptions to be considered hereafter, this was (speaking broadly) the object of this legislation. The Truck Act of 1831, with which alone we need concern ourselves for the practical purposes of this case, for the statute of 1887 does not substantially differ so far as this case is concerned, attempted to enforce this object by rendering illegal every payment, or contract for payment, of wages except in the mode provided by the Act. One head of sections imposed penalties upon all those who made such illegal contracts or payments. Another class of sections, the range of which was not altogether commensurate with the former, gave the right to the workman to recover the arrears of wages not actually paid over in coin, while it prevented the employer from setting up in answer to such action some rights of set-off, of which he might otherwise at law have availed himself, while, on the other hand, other rights of set-off were still left available to the employer. It is on the effect of this latter portion of the legislation, and the similar provision in the later statute, that this appeal, in our view, turns, and the present case depends mainly on the exact extent to which an employer's ordinary defence to an action at law has, in circumstances like the present, been interfered with by the Acts. The portion of the Act which deals with penalties is, nevertheless, worthy of consideration, since it may throw some light on the entire scope of the Acts, as also on the construction of special parts of them.

After reciting that it is necessary to prohibit the payment (in certain trades) of wages in goods or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm, the statute (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), by section 1, enacts that if in any contract the whole or only part of a workman's wages shall be made payable in any other manner than current coin of the realm, such contract shall be illegal, null, and void. The same fate is (under section 2) to befall any contract in which any provision, directly or indirectly, is made respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the persons with whom, the whole or any part of the wages shall be laid out or expended. These two first sections of the Act prohibit contracts which infringe on the prescribed limitations. Section 3 deals, not with contracts but with payments. The entire amount of the wages earned, it provides, "shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm and not otherwise"; and every payment made to such artificer by his employer of or in respect of any such wages by the delivery to him of goods or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid (except in certain excepted cases) is declared to be illegal, null, and void. Section 8 contains an exception in the case of bank-notes and drafts on neighbouring bankers; and section 23 a further exception in respect of specific deductions which are declared to be legitimate. Section 10 inflicts penalties on offenders against the Act.

Pausing here to consider what payments have been prohibited by the statute, we find that in order to be valid the payment to a workman must be of the entire amount of the wages due, and that it must be actually paid to the artificer in current coin of the realm, excepting in the excepted cases of bank-notes and cheques (section 8), and of specific deductions (under section 23). The statute insists (in all but the excepted cases) on actual payment in coin. Payment on account will not do. Payment in goods will not do. Nothing is to discharge the wages debt except actual payment in current coin. The first gloss, or interpretation, which we think principles of sound construction (in a highly penal Act) require us to adopt is that the payment will not be invalid simply because, instead of being made to the artificer himself, it is made to anybody lawfully and bonâ fide appointed to receive it as his agent. It cannot have been intended, where what is paid over is current coin of the realm, to make it a penal offence to pay such current coin to a man's wife or child instead of to the man himself. The principle of the common law is that what is paid to a man's agent lawfully authorized to receive it is paid, in the eyes of the law, to himself, and although the language of a statute may, of course, provide that none but an actual personal payment shall suffice, unless this intention is to be discovered in the statute, the ordinary rule of the law applies. The point at which the statute aims appears to us to be that the entire amount should be paid in coin, and the statute has not interfered with the ordinary doctrine that what is paid to a man's agent is to be treated as if it were paid to himself. It is hardly necessary to observe that since the Act prescribes payments in coin, deductions made by the employer, whether authorized by the workman or not, are not and cannot be payment to the workman in current coin of the realm. The employer cannot, for the purpose of compliance with the statute, be both payer and payee. To hold otherwise would be to make the statute idle. Secondly, it is to be observed that the legislation as to contracts for payments runs parallel to and is commensurate with the legislation as to payments. If the payment is in an illegal shape, the contract to make it in that shape is also declared not merely null and void, but also illegal. The result is that when such illegal contract has been made an offence against the Act has been committed; and the other doctrines of English law applicable to illegal, as distinct from merely voidable, contracts follow. Not merely cannot such a contract be enforced, but the contract cannot by itself give rise to any right or be vouched as an authority for any act done under it. So far we have dealt with the prohibitory portion of the Act.

We pass next to those provisions of the Act which affect directly civil litigation, and the defences open to an employer who is sued for all the arrears of wages which he has not actually paid in current coin. This part of the legislation begins with section 4, by which it is enacted that every artificer shall be entitled to recover from his employer so much of his wages earned as shall have not been actually paid to him by his employer in the current coin of the realm. The effect of this section by itself would be that in any action brought to recover the wages an employer could not plead as "payment" anything but an actual payment in current coin, save only in the cases excepted in other sections of the Act. But it is manifest that, if no further provision was to be made, an action by workmen for such arrears might be barred, and the objects of the statute defeated, by other defences which at law would be left open still to the offending employer. The employer might, for example, have supplied goods to the amount of the wages deducted, or the workman might, by virtue of an express or other agreement with his employer, have taken some consideration other than goods in place of the wages, or have authorized the employer to spend the money in some way which, though not payment in actual coin, might in an action to recover the arrears of wages, be set up by way of legal or equitable set-off, or used as a counter-claim to the action. Section 5 accordingly follows section 4, and is a section devoted to limiting a possible right of set-off. It will be seen that it extinguishes such right of set-off only in certain cases, leaving rights of legal and equitable set-off untouched in all other instances than those specifically mentioned. It is provided in the section that in such actions to recover wages due "the defendant shall not be allowed to make any set-off, nor to claim any reduction of the plaintiff's demand by reason or in respect of any goods, wares, or merchandise had or received by the plaintiff as or on account of his wages or in reward for his labour." The price of the goods in virtue of which the unpaid wages were deducted cannot accordingly be set-off. But the section goes further and debars the employer also from any set-off arising out of the sale to his workman of any other goods supplied at any other time, either by the employer's own shop or by any shop in the profits of which the employer has an interest. The statute draws its line of tutelary shelter here, and a similar, though not an absolutely identical, line is drawn in the Act of 1887. Beyond these lines all legal and equitable rights of set-off, and all legal and equitable defences other than payment, are still left open in any civil action to the employer.

The above analysis of the leading sections of the earlier Act shows that the penal sections of the Act and the provisions which affect the civil rights of the parties do not cover precisely the same ground. The payment in current coin of a portion only instead of the entire wages may be an offence against the Act, and yet when the workman sues to recover the unpaid portion, the employer is not precluded in all cases and every case alike from enforcing every set-off or legal or equitable defence that he possesses, although in respect of certain specified dealings he is deprived of a particular set-off. The offence against the public may well be complete and the penalty have been incurred, but it does not follow that the employer is to pay the workman the full arrear left unpaid in current coin, where, though not paid in current coin, the claim of the workman has been released or satisfied in some other lawful way which falls short of being actual payment. Money payment at the request of the workman to a third person will be accordingly one amongst other conceivable defences left open to the employer by way of set-off, and facts which establish a right of equitable as well as legal set-off will also be available to the employer if they are outside the set-off forbidden by the Act.

It now becomes necessary to apply the above interpretation of the statute to the facts of the present action. On entering the service of the defendants the plaintiff signed an agreement by which she bound herself to conform to all the rules and regulations of Messrs. F. Allen & Sons' works, and to submit to the penalties for breaches of the same. One of these rules and regulations (No. 28) was in the following terms:—"All employés will have to become members of the sick and accident club." Its rules provide for a weekly subscription to the fund proportioned to the weekly wages of each contributor. By virtue of this contract a proportionate deduction was in fact made each week from the plaintiff's wages which was carried or paid over to the fund on her behalf. In what manner the deduction found its way into the fund is not clear, since the defendants called no witnesses before the county court judge, but it was stated to us, and did not appear to be disputed, that the deductions were taken each week to the secretary of the fund, who paid them into an account kept at a separate bank by one of the defendants' firm acting as treasurer to the fund. That the plaintiff herself knew of the deductions being made was evident, inasmuch as she had been for years in the defendants' service, during which period she had twice left and twice returned and re-engaged herself, signing on each occasion the agreement above referred to.

It is at this stage desirable to brush away one or two legal points which might otherwise obscure the exact point of law we have to decide. It was not argued before us that the deductions made from her wages were only another mode of calculating her wages which took the case outside the Truck Act altogether (as in Chawner v. Cummings, 8 Q. B. 311; Archer v. James, 2 B. & S. 61, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 74. The defendants' counsel, on the other hand, urged upon us the argument that the deductions made came within section 23 of the Act. This latter point seems to us untenable. The proportion of the arrears attributable to payments for medicine and medical attendance was struck out of the plaintiff's claim in the county court, and the other objects of the fund—viz., insurance against sickness, accident, and death—are not within section 23. The defendants' case therefore depends, not on the construction of section 23, but on the effect of the earlier clauses of the statute. It is clear, to begin with, that the contract between the defendants and the plaintiff that these deductions should be made was an illegal one. It may well fall within the language of section 2 of the Act of 1831 and section 6 of the Act of 1887. But if the contract in question be even not within section 2 of the former and section 6 of the later Act, it appears to us still to be illegal under section 1 as being a contract that the wages shall be paid otherwise than in current coin. No justification can therefore be found in the signed contract for anything done under it. That the plaintiff has not actually received her entire wages in current coin of the realm seems obvious. Has there been any actual payment in current coin of the realm to anyone at all? On the evidence this seems most doubtful, and a mere show of passing current coin from the firm to the secretary of the fund would not necessarily satisfy a court or a jury that current coin was actually paid by the defendants to an agent of the plaintiff's lawfully authorized to receive it. An offence against the Act has, therefore, to all appearance, been committed, for the burden lay on the defendants to show the actual coin payment, and they have not chosen to call witnesses.

But, although an offence against the Act may have been committed, it remains still to be ascertained whether in a civil proceeding the employer in this case may not have an answer to the plaintiff's claim by way of set-off, counter-claim, or otherwise. No notice of set-off or counter-claim was given. But we should not allow justice to be defeated upon a mere defect of pleading, and the matter in the Court of Appeal must be treated as if all facts had properly been pleaded which are undisputed in the case. The question therefore arises whether the defendants are entitled on the facts of this case to say that, although an offence against the Act may have been committed, nevertheless the deductions from the plaintiff's wages have been disposed of with her consent in a manner which she cannot now impugn after the lapse of years. The defendants having called no witnesses, we cannot properly assume in their favour that the deductions were lodged in the hands of any third person for the purposes of the fund. We think, however, that, having regard to the rules and the balance-sheet put in by the plaintiff, and the manner in which the case has been conducted, we must infer that a fund has been honestly and actually set aside in the defendants' hands for the benefit of the contributors to the fund, to be applied from time to time according to its rules. To this fund we think we also must assume that the money professedly paid on behalf of the plaintiff has honestly found its way; and nothing, in our judgment, is intended to reflect in the least on the good faith of the defendants, either in the institution of the fund or in its management. If the trust fund to which money has been so paid was an illegal trust, the defendants could not set up as a defence payment to its credit of any sums at all. But the trust is not an illegal trust merely because it is made up of moneys collected from persons who have made illegal agreements to subscribe to it, subscription to it in lawful ways being perfectly possible. Fieri non debuit—factum valet. The purposes for which this money is held are not illegitimate. All that can be said is that as an authority for carrying moneys to the fund the defendants cannot rely on the workmen's contracts, all such contracts being illegal. But if an authority or a ratification can be found outside the original contract, that will be sufficient as a defence in this action. It could not be right that a workman should sanction the handing over of his contributions to a fund created for his own benefit and the benefit of others, and years afterwards recall his contributions. In the first place, such a gift or contribution once given would be irrevocable. In the second place, it would in all probability long since have been expended in the administration of the fund; and, indeed, we do not doubt but that the plaintiff's contributions have long since been appropriated to some of the ordinary expenditure of the society.

Did the plaintiff, then, authorize such contributions as professedly were made on her behalf to be so made and so expended? The original contract with the plaintiff cannot in law justify the deduction being made from her wages, nor, in our opinion, can it be vouched as of itself an authority by her to pay the contributions for her. The defendants cannot, therefore, fall back on the contract with the plaintiff to justify the payment over of her contributions to the fund. But the plaintiff has known for years of, and has acquiesced in, these deductions and their destination. She twice left the defendants' service and has twice returned to it. She must also have known, not, indeed, of the details of the expenditure, but that the current contributions were in fact expended on the objects of the society. We do not think that she can, years afterwards, complain of what has been done with her knowledge and with her tacit assent. The Truck Act has been broken. But she has precluded herself, by her own conduct and by her long acquiescence in the payment to the fund of her contributions, from now recalling them. She does not, indeed, assert that she either objected to it or that she did not know of it, and the fact that she did not assent was not even alleged before us, nor was it suggested before the county court judge. The defendants can, therefore, avail themselves as an answer to this action in the nature of a set-off or counter-claim of the fact that these sums have been paid over, professedly on the plaintiff's behalf, to a trust fund of which J. Allen is trustee, and have been used for the purposes of the fund, and that she subsequently ratified and assented to such payment and expenditure.

It remains for us to pronounce an opinion as to the relevancy and applicability of some of the authorities cited in argument before us. Cutts v. Ward, 15 W. R. 445, L. R. 2 Q. B. 357, is a decision on the construction of section 23, and has no bearing on the present inquiry. Ex parte Cooper, 26 Ch. D. 693, 33 W. R. Dig. 23, is a case the headnote and reported language in which require explanation, if not rectification. By an arrangement, not in writing, sums were, in that case, deducted from wages for a doctor's fund and for a reading-room, of which there was a treasurer. The fund was handed over by the employers to the doctor and treasurer from time to time. But at the time of the liquidation of the employers' firm £149 stood in the employers' books to the credit of the doctor's fund, arising from the deductions from the wages which had been made but not yet paid over, and £63 stood in like manner to the credit of the treasurer of the reading-room. No trust, it would appear, had been created by the direction of the men. "All that appears by the evidence," says Lord Selborne, "is that the workmen were desirous that what was in substance due from them to the doctor and for the reading-room should be paid through the machinery of a retainer out of their wages." The employers' defence to this application accordingly failed on every ground. Actual payment in current coin there had been none, so as to raise a valid plea of payment. No payment otherwise than in current coin had been made to the doctor or to the reading-room of which the employers could avail themselves by way of set-off. There had been no agreement with the doctor or the reading-room by which the workmen's debt had been discharged, or under which the doctor had accepted the liability of the employers. There was nothing accordingly which amounted to any other legal or equitable defence, to any release for valuable consideration, or to any legal or equitable set-off or counter-claim. The actual decision in Ex parte Cooper is, we think, entirely in conformity with our interpretation of the statute. The language of the judgments of the court is not as clearly worded in the report as might be desired. "The employers have retained the amount out of the wages," says Lord Selborne, "but they have never paid it over, and there is no evidence to satisfy me that anything equivalent to payment to the workmen has taken place." Strictly speaking, payment over to the doctor, if it even had taken place, would have been a bar to the action, not because it was equivalent to payment to the workmen, but because it would give rise to a defence on other grounds than that of payment. Cotton, L.J's suggestion, that, if such payment had taken place, "it might possibly amount to a payment in cash"—by which we incline to think he means current coin—"not to them"—that is the workmen—"but to their agent, or to a person on their behalf appointed to receive it," is an expression again not perfectly exact. For the purpose of the case it was not necessary to point out what we, nevertheless, now think it desirable to make plain, that, although such payment over would have taken the transaction out of the operation of the Truck Act, by amounting either to a set-off or other legal or equitable defence, it would not necessarily have been equivalent to or pleadable as payment, or, in other words, as an actual payment in current coin of the realm within section 4. The court below appears to have considered that the present appeal was governed by the authority of Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Co., 39 W. R. 475, [1891] 2 Q. B. 281. It appears to us that the point on which our judgment in this case hinges either did not arise or was not at all considered in that case. The deductions there were made as contributions to a sick and funeral allowance fund. The fund was for the benefit of the defendants' servants, and was managed on their behalf by the defendants. The case was really decided by A. L. Smith and Grantham, JJ., on the ground that a larger sum had actually been paid out of the fund for medical attendance on the plaintiff and his wife than the total amount of his contributions which he sought in the action to recover. Inasmuch as such payments could be lawfully deducted under section 23, the action necessarily failed. The question what would have been the result if it had been otherwise, and the contribution had not in fact been actually expended for the plaintiff at his request under section 23, did not accordingly occur. It might have otherwise become necessary (as here) to consider whether the defendants in that case had constituted themselves trustees of any funds left in their hands for distribution under a binding trust, and had actually distributed the same as moneys appropriated to trust purposes under the plaintiff's own direction. We cannot, therefore, agree with the Divisional Court in their view, that the present case is covered by the decision in Lamb's case, although our conclusion is that their judgment must, for the reasons we have given, be affirmed. But as we are not satisfied that the action of the defendants in respect of this fund has been consistent with the provisions of the Truck Act, we think that, although the plaintiff's civil claim against the defendants fails, there ought to be no costs of this appeal, although we do not in the least doubt that the defendants' conduct in respect of the fund has been dictated by kindly and humane motives and characterized by good faith.

KAY, L.J:—I agree in the judgment which has been read, but I desire to express a doubt which I feel upon one point. Upon the evidence before us I cannot make out that the defendants had any set-off at law or in equity such as is allowed by section 5 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37, because I do not gather from the evidence that the deductions have in fact been paid over to anyone with the plaintiff's authority. I agree, however, that the circumstances do raise a case of counter-claim, and the doubt I have is whether a cross-action, brought by way of counter-claim, would be an answer to a claim under the Truck Act. The other members of the court being of opinion that it would be an answer, I do not desire to dissent from that opinion, but I only wish to express the doubt I feel.

Appeal dismissed.

SCHAUER v. J. C. & J. FIELD (LIMITED). (a.)

Copyright—International Copyright Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), s. 6—Saving of rights and interests previously acquired—Trade-mark—Interest in advertising—Subsisting and valuable interests—Artistic work first produced in foreign country.

By the International Copyright Act, 1886, s. 6, upon an Order in Council being made with respect to any foreign country, the author and publisher of any artistic work shall be entitled to copyright in the United Kingdom in respect of works first produced before such order comes into operation, "provided that, where any person has, before the date of the publication of an Order in Council, lawfully produced any work in the United Kingdom, nothing in this section shall diminish or prejudice any rights or interests arising from or in connection with such production which are subsisting and valuable at the said date."

An Order in Council was made applying the Act to German subjects. Before the date of the publication of the order an artistic work, first produced in Germany, was lawfully produced in the United Kingdom and registered, and used as a trade-mark upon goods. The work was also reproduced by the proprietors of the trade-mark on showcards and trade lists for the purpose of advertising their goods. The trade-mark, as registered, had the words "trade-mark" printed on it, but these words were omitted in the showcards and trade lists. In an action to restrain infringement of copyright by the use of these showcards and trade lists.

Held, that the proprietors of the trade-mark had an interest, as such proprietors, in advertising it; that this was an interest arising from or in connection with the trade-mark itself, and subsisting and valuable at the date of the publication of the Order in Council; that the omission of the words "trade-mark" in the showcards and trade lists was immaterial; and, consequently, that the proprietors of the trade-mark were protected in their use of the showcards and trade lists by the proviso to section 6.

Motion.

The plaintiff, a foreigner, claimed to be entitled to the copyright in an oil painting called "Lisette," so far as regarded the right of reproduction by photographic processes, and also to the copyright in a photograph by Carl Quiddi, of Berlin, of the same oil painting as a distinct work of art.

The oil painting was produced in Germany before December, 1885, and represented the half-length figure of a girl in a mob cap, laughing, with a lighted candle in her left hand, shielding with her right hand the light, which was reflected over her face and bust.

On the 29th of January, 1887, Messrs. Field, candle manufacturers, applied under the Trade-Marks Acts to register a trade-mark in class 47 for candles of all descriptions, and such trade-mark was registered in due course.

In November, 1887, the trade-mark was, together with the goodwill of their business, assigned by Messrs. Field to the defendants, a limited company, and the defendants were afterwards entered on the register as the proprietors of the mark.

The mark as registered consisted of a photograph of "Lisette" on a small scale, probably taken from the photograph by Carl Quiddi, of Berlin, or from a reproduction of it. Across the lower part of the girl's figure, as registered under the Trade-Marks Acts, the words "trade-mark" appeared. Over the girl's head, but at some distance above it, there also appeared in the "Trade-Marks Register" the words, "Field's candles." The defendants had used this trade-mark upon their goods, and in their use of the trade-mark reproduced it in various sizes and colours.

The defendants had also reproduced the picture in various sizes and colours without the words "trade-mark" on showcards and trade lists, and these they gratuitously distributed amongst their customers for the purpose of advertising their goods. They contained an enlarged reproduction of the figure of the girl as represented in the trade-mark photograph, but printed in colours, with the words, "Ozokerit candles," and the name of the company in conspicuous type displayed outside the figure, and were, as well as the trade-mark pictures, produced by chromo-lithography, and not by photography.

In January, 1892, the plaintiff registered himself as the owner of the aforesaid copyright in England, under the International Copyright Act, 1886, and an Order in Council made thereunder on the 28th of November, and published on the 2nd of December, 1887.

The plaintiff, by his writ in the action, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from printing, publishing, multiplying, selling, or distributing any copies or colourable imitations of the plaintiff's copyright work, "Lisette," and for the delivery up to the plaintiff of all blocks and copies of the copyright work which were in the defendants' possession, and he also claimed penalties under the Act of 1862.

By the International Copyright Act, 1886, s. 6, upon an Order in Council being made under the International Copyright Acts with respect to any foreign country, the author and publisher of any work first produced in that country before the date at whith such order comes into operation are to be entitled to the same rights and remedies as if such Acts and order had applied to that country at the date of the said production, "provided that where any person has, before the date of the publication of an Order in Council, lawfully produced any work in the United Kingdom, nothing in this section shall diminish or prejudice any rights or interests arising from or in connection with such production which are subsisting and valuable at the said date."

By the said Order in Council of the 28th of November, 1887, which was published on the 2nd of December, 1887, protection under the International Copyright Acts was extended to authors of literary and artistic works in divers foreign countries, including Germany.

During the greater part of the argument counsel contended that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction which would restrain the defendants from using their trade-mark. But ultimately that contention was given up, and in the result of the argument counsel merely asked for an injunction, and the injunction sought was one so framed as, while leaving the defendants in the full enjoyment of their trade-mark, would preclude them from using their showcards and price lists. The hearing of the motion was by consent treated as the trial of the action.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff's case is founded on the claim of the plaintiff Schauer to copyright under the International Copyright Act, 1886, and the Order in Council made thereunder, which was published on the 2nd of December, 1887, and came into operation on the 6th of that month. During the argument, counsel, threading their way, as best they could, through the intricate mazes of the International and other Copyright Acts, raised numerous questions; but, in the view I take, the case falls to be decided on a comparatively simple point—viz., the meaning and effect of the proviso in the 6th section of the International Copyright Act, 1886, as applied to the material facts, a short statement of which will suffice.

The copyright claimed relates to an oil painting produced in Germany before the 20th of December, 1885, by an artist named George Horn, entitled "Lisette," representing the half-length figure of a girl in a mob cap, laughing, with a candle in her left hand, shielding with her right hand the light, which is reflected over her face and bust. The nature of the copyright claimed appears from the two separate entries which the plaintiff Schauer caused to be made in the register at Stationers' Hall on the 19th of January, 1892, a few weeks before the commencement of the action. The claims are two: first, for the copyright in the painting so far as regards the right to reproduce by photographic processes; and, secondly, for the copyright in a distinct work of art—viz., a photograph from the oil painting produced by one Carl Quiddi, of Berlin. The plaintiff Schauer is a foreigner residing in Berlin.

On the 29th of January, 1887, Messrs. Field, candle manufacturers, applied under the Trade-Marks Acts to register a trade-mark in class 47 for candles of all descriptions, and the trade-mark was subsequently duly registered, the registration taking effect as from the date of the application. This trade-mark was, in November, 1887, assigned to the defendants, the company, with the goodwill of Messrs. Field's business, and the company now appear on the register as the proprietors of the mark. The defendants' business is very extensive, and the trade-mark has been largely used by them in their business, and is very valuable. The mark, as registered, consists of a photograph on a small scale of "Lisette"; probably this photograph was taken from Quiddi's photograph, or a reproduction of it. Across the girl's figure, just below the waist, the words "trade-mark" occur in the photograph registered under the Trade-Marks Act, the original of which was produced in court from the controller's office. Outside the girl's head, and at some little distance from it, there appears in the "Trade-Marks Register" the words "Field's candles." The proprietor of a trade-mark is not restricted as to size, or colour, or the mode of production. In their user of their trade-mark the defendants have reproduced it in various sizes and colours, the means employed being chromo-lithography; as a matter of fact they have not had recourse to photography.

During the greater part of the argument the plaintiff's counsel contended that they were entitled to an injunction which would restrain the defendants from using their trade-mark. But ultimately this contention was given up. Obviously it could not be maintained in the face of the proviso contained in the 6th section of the International Copyright Act, 1886. Undoubtedly the defendants are within the protection of the proviso so far as regards their trade-mark and its user. They had, before the date of the publication of the Order in Council lawfully produced a work, viz., their trade-mark, and had rights arising from or in connection with such production which were subsisting and valuable at the date of the publication of the order. The trade-mark was lawfully produced, because at the date of its production, in January, 1887, the plaintiff and those from whom he claimed had no copyright in England.

In the result of the argument, the plaintiff's counsel asked merely for an injunction, and the injunction they sought was one so framed as, while leaving the defendants in the full enjoyment of their trade-mark would preclude them from using their showcards and price lists. The issuing of the showcards and price lists was the only ground of complaint which remained after the case as to the trade-mark had been abandoned. [His lordship here referred to an exhibit as a good example of the showcards used, and proposed to be used in future by the defendants. It consisted of a black disc containing in the centre an enlarged and coloured reproduction of the girl as represented in the trade-mark photograph. The reproduction was by chromo-lithography. There were printed on the disc, but outside the figure of the girl, the words "Ozokerit candles," and the name of the company in conspicuous type, the letters being white.] The showcards are being used, and are intended to be used, solely for the purpose of putting on the market the goods to which the trade-mark applies. They are not sold by the defendants, but are merely distributed gratuitously to their customers. Whether they have or have not any artistic merits, they are not put forward as works of art; they are used, and intended to be used, solely for the purpose of attracting attention to the goods with a view to their sale, and in connection with the trade-mark. The plaintiff has done for the defendants what the defendants have never done for themselves, or intended or contemplated should be done by their customers or others into whose hands the showcards may come. He has taken the showcard and framed it with a mount which cuts off the words "Ozokerit candles" and the defendants' names, leaving the representation of the girl alone visible in the oval of the mount; and he says: "See what can be done with the card; a work of art is produced which can be hung up as a picture." But the defendants cannot be made responsible for acts which they neither do nor intend or even contemplate should be done by others. So much for the facts. The point of law raised was on the words in the proviso, "rights or interests arising from or in connection with such production which are subsisting and valuable."

Now a showcard, used as the defendants use and intend to use theirs, is only one of the numerous modes of advertising adopted at the present day. The advertisement by showcards or otherwise of their trade-marks is a common and well-known practice on the part of the proprietors, from which they derive benefit by the increased sale of their goods. It was urged for the plaintiff that the word "rights" in the proviso meant an exclusive right in a particular person, and not a right enjoyed by the public generally, and it was said that the proprietor of a trade-mark has not a right, in this sense, of advertising his trade-mark, and that any person is at liberty to advertise another's trade-mark.

It is not very easy to understand how a trade-mark can be honestly advertised by any person other than the proprietor of the mark, or persons selling or intending to sell the goods manufactured under the trade-mark. Persons not interested in the sale of the goods do not, as a matter of fact, when acting honestly, advertise the trade-mark with a view to push the sale of the goods. Traders, in matters of business, are not in the habit of acting upon motives of mere benevolence to other traders by advertising at their own expense trade-marks in which they have no concern for the benefit of the proprietors or others interested in the sale of the goods. But, passing by the word "rights," I come to the word "interests." The decision in Moul & Mayeur v. Groenings, 39 W. R. 691, [1891] 2 Q. B. 443, if authority be wanted, shows that "interests" in the proviso has a more extended meaning than "rights." Some attempt was made by one of the plaintiff's counsel to use the judgment delivered in that case for the purpose of cutting down the meaning of the word "interests" to "capital embarked," or in some other way. But the judgment did nothing of the kind. What was decided was that the bandmaster had an interest, and was protected. The defendants here, as the proprietors of the trade-mark, have, in my opinion, an interest in advertising it, and this interest is a special interest in them as distinct from the rest of the public. This interest I hold was an interest arising from or in connection with the trade-mark itself, and was subsisting and valuable at the date of the publication of the Order in Council. This interest in the defendants is wholly unconnected with any copyright in the defendants; they have none, and claim none; it arises from or in connection with their trade-mark alone. It becomes immaterial, then, to consider when any particular showcard or advertisement of the trade-mark was first produced by the defendants. The interest of the defendants to advertise the mark is general, and is not confined to any particular showcard or other form of advertisement adopted before the publication of the Order in Council. In effect, the plaintiff, while conceding to the defendants the right to use the trade-mark, is endeavouring, by the injunction they seek, to deprive the defendants of some of the ordinary and legitimate benefits enjoyed by proprietors in connection with their trade-marks. It is absurd to say that the owners of a trade-mark may use it, but not advertise it.

One point remains to be noticed in connection with the showcards. The trade-mark, as registered, contained, as already mentioned, the words "trade-mark" printed on the girl's figure, and these words are omitted in the showcards. Thereupon it was suggested towards the close of the reply that the defendants were advertising on their showcards, not the trade-mark, but something else. If they were really doing this their act would not be protected by their interest in the mark. But this omission appears to me to be too trifling to frame anything upon it. The defendants are not, under guise or pretence of advertising their mark, really putting forth an independent picture or work of art; they are honestly advertising the substance of their trade-mark. If any other trader put the representation of the girl as she appears in the showcard on goods not of the defendants' manufacture, he would clearly be taking the substance of the defendants' mark, and would infringe the defendants' rights in the mark.

It is not necessary to consider the trade lists separately, what I have said as to the showcards applies, with at least equal force, to the trade lists.

For these reasons, and expressing no opinion on the other points raised, I think the action fails, and must be dismissed.

Action dismissed.

In re GARDNER.
LONG v. GARDNER. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Interest on legacy—Infant executor.

Testatrix by her will appointed an infant one of her executors, and gave to him, as such executor, a legacy of £1,000.

Held, that the legacy would not carry interest until the infant should attain twenty-one years and agree to act as executor.

Further consideration.

By her will, dated the 8th of December, 1887, Mrs. Richardson Gardner appointed her friend George H. Long, her nephew William Compton Smith, Lionel James Richardson, and the Honourable Stanley Goulbourn Giffard executors thereof, and gave to each of her executors a legacy of £1,000. In another clause of her will testatrix declared: "I hereby declare my will to be that no gift, legacy, bequest, or benefit by this my will or any codicil hereto given, bequeathed, or intended for any person who, at the date of my decease, shall be an infant shall become vested in such legatee unless, being male, he shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being female, shall have been married, or shall marry under it."

Testatrix gave the income of her estate to her husband for life, and after his death, subject to certain legacies, gave the ultimate residue thereof to the said Honourable Stanley Goulbourn Giffard.

The testatrix died on the 2nd of April, 1889, and her will was proved by her first three named executors on the 23rd of May, 1889, S. G. Giffard being at that time an infant. An action for the administration of the estate was commenced on the 16th of December, 1889, and on the 3rd of March, 1890, the usual order for accounts and inquiries were made. In his certificate, dated the 18th of July, 1892, the chief clerk raised, inter alia, the question whether the legacy to S. G. Giffard, who was still an infant, carried interest. The action came on for further consideration on the 8th of November, 1892.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and F. A. Jones, for the plaintiffs, the three executors.

Everitt, Q.C., and P. V. Smith, for the husband of the testatrix.

Sir Arthur Watson, Q.C., and Methold, for the infant.—We say that this legacy is given to the infant as executor. He cannot, we admit, take it unless he accepts the office. It is almost certain that there will then be duties for the executors to perform when the infant attains the age of twenty-one years, and if he then accepts the office the legacy might then be paid to him with interest. There is no direct authority on the point, but in Reed v. Devaynes, 2 Cox. 285, the Master of the Rolls expressed an opinion that such a legacy to an infant would carry interest. He there distinguishes between an executor who has neglected to prove and an executor who has been prevented from proving. In Angermann v. Ford, 9 W. R. 512, 29 Beav. 349, interest was refused to an executor on the ground that he had wilfully neglected to prove. The infant executor's interest in the legacy is vested, and subject to be divested only on his dying before attaining twenty-one years. The clause as to legacies not vesting until the legatees attain the age of twenty-one is not sufficient to divest it. A legacy of this kind must carry interest.

NORTH, J.—In this case a legacy of £1,000 has been bequeathed to an infant, who will not receive it until he attains twenty-one years, and the question arises whether he is entitled to the interest upon that amount.

This is a case in which an infant is, with others, appointed executor, and a legacy of £1,000 is given to him as executor. It is my opinion that he is not entitled to that unless he acts as executor, and he is only entitled to interest upon it from the time at which the legacy is payable to him.

One or two cases were referred to in which the proving of the will was spoken of as essential. I do not think the proving of the will is in the least essential, the real point is whether he accepts the trusts and fulfils the duty of executor, and he may do that without proving the will if somebody else has proved it, for, as Lord St. Leonards pointed out in Cummins v. Cummins, 8 Ir. Eq. Rep. 723, 1 Jon. & Lat., p. 64, L. R. 7 H. L., p. 723, probate by one executor is quite enough for all—it is unnecessary for others to prove. If the will has been proved their acting is sufficient without further probate. In the present case the will has been proved by three of the other executors. Therefoe no further probate for the infant is necessary. If when he attains twenty-one he elects to act as executor the existing probate is ample for the purpose, but unless he elects at that time to act as executor he will not be entitled to the legacy. Therefore it is a legacy contingent on his accepting the office of executor and acting as such. I think that is settled by authority. The case that Sir Arthur Watson referred to, Angermann v. Ford, goes to prove that. There was a legacy to William Augustus Ford of £1,000 for his own use and benefit, and then he was appointed one of the executors. He first of all renounced probate, but afterwards, in 1859, he did what the law then allowed—he retracted this renunciation and a further probate was granted to him. Then the question was as to his right to the legacy, and the Master of the Rolls pointed out that he was only entitled to the legacy if he clothed himself with the character of the executor. "It is well settled that he must clothe himself with the character of executor before he can claim his legacy. Mr. Jessel argued, and I am disposed to concur with him, that his right to the legacy depends upon whether he has bonâ fide taken upon himself the duty of executor." Then, after dealing with the facts in that particular case, he says, "I think that I cannot in this state of circumstances take into account the greater or lesser period of time during which he has renounced, and that if an executor proves and acts as such any time before the real business of administrating the estate is concluded, he is entitled to be paid the legacy given to him by the testator. In this case, therefore, I am of opinion that Mr. Ford has fulfilled the conditions essential to entitle him to his legacy, and that the payment or retention of it must be allowed in the account taken. Interest is payable from the time the legacy becomes due, and therefore it must not commence until he proved the will." By "proving the will" I take him to mean "proved or accepted the duty of executor under the will," because I think it clear from Cummins v. Cummins that a further actual probate by him is entirely unnecessary.

Then in In re Hawkins' Trusts, 12 W. R. 945, 33 Beav. 570 (where the question was as to a legacy to an executor for his trouble), it was held not payable, as he had been prevented by severe illness from proving the will and from ever acting. In that case he had never acted—the mere probate was immaterial if he had acted—and inasmuch as he had never acted as executor it was held he was not entitled to the legacy.

Again, in Lewis v. Mathews, 17 W. R. 841, L. R. 8 Eq. 277, there was a legacy to an executor for his trouble. He was in Australia; he sent home power of attorney under which another person administered, and under which the rents of the real estate were received. He died without proving the will, but still it was held that he had shown his intention to act under the trusts of the will sufficiently to entitle his representative to the legacy. There they received it although he had not actually proved.

That being so, it seems to me that this is a legacy payable to the legatee when he determines to act—when he takes upon himself the duty of executor—which can only be when he attains twenty-one. In my opinion, therefore, it does not carry interest in the interim. It is unnecessary to consider the further clause, as to the vesting of the legacy to infants. I have, however, formed a strong impression on it. I consider the clause which says that the legacy to the infant legatee is not to vest until he is twenty-one means what it says. It does not say the legacy given to him is to be vested before that time, but divested if he does not attain twenty-one. It means what it says; it is to vest at twenty-one, and I think that would prevent his having interest in the meantime, if it were necessary to decide that point.

In my opinion, therefore, the practical result of it is, that it is not necessary to make any provision for the payment of the legacy at present, though it may have to be raised out of the estate if the event arises upon which it is to be paid.

Service of a writ of summons on the agent in London set aside on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

Motion.

This was a motion to set aside the service of a writ on a foreign corporation under the following circumstances: The defendant company was established to carry on the business of hotel proprietors in the State of Tennessee, America, and was incorporated according to the law of Tennessee. All the directors were resident in America, and the offices of the company were at New York and at Cumberland Gap, in Tennessee. About three-fourths of the shareholders were resident in England. The company had an agent in London, who kept a register of all the English shareholders, and who was authorized to register transfers of shares duly signed by the president of the company in America. He was also authorized to receive calls on shares from the English shareholders, and to remit the money to America. His office in London had the name of the company painted up on the door, as also the names of several other companies. He also issued circulars and notices from his office stating that it was the London office of the company. Some of the office furniture belonged to the company, and on one occasion the agent had used money belonging to the company in a transaction on the Stock Exchange.

The action was brought by a shareholder in the company asking for an injunction to restrain the company from carrying into effect a resolution for the reconstruction of the company and for other purposes. The writ was served on the London agent of the company at his office in London.

Buckley, Q.C., and Carson, for the motion, contended that the company carried on no part of its business here, and, therefore, could not be sued in this country.

They cited Newby v. Von Oppen and Colt's Patent Firearms Manufacturing Co., 20 W. R. 383, L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; Mackereth v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 21 W. R. 339, L. R. 8 Ex. 149; Nutter v. Messageries Maritimes de France, 54 L. J. Q. B. 527, 34 W. R. Dig. 150; Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, 37 W. R. 703, 23 Q. B. D. 519.

Hastings, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, contrà, said that the company did carry on business in London, as it was proved in evidence that rooms could be engaged at the hotel in Tennessee on application being made at the London office of the company. They submitted that the writ was duly served on the company, and ought not to be set aside.

They referred to Newby v. Von Oppen and Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526.

STIRLING, J., said there was no statutory provision affecting service on such a company. [He stated the nature of the action, and continued:—] The question here arises whether the rules of court with respect to service have been complied with. Do the rules apply to such a company as this? They do extend to foreign corporations, and the latest case on the subject is Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris. [His lordship referred to the judgment of Cotton, L.J., and the rule as laid down by him, and continued:—] The result of that passage is that if a foreign corporation sets up here, and is resident here, and carrying on business, it is within the jurisdiction of this court. Is it established in this case that the company carries on a principal part of its business in London? What is its business? It is mainly to carry on the business of a hotel in Tennessee. It undoubtedly has an agent here, a Mr. Charles Holland. His office is used as an agency, and the name of the company is up. Some of the office furniture belongs to the company, but that is not enough; it must carry on business here. It has lent money on the Stock Exchange, but that is not part of the principal business of the company. It is sworn by Holland that it was only one transaction carried on from fortnight to fortnight. It only proves that the company did at one time possess property in this country. It is said you could obtain rooms in Tennessee by applying in London, but this allegation breaks down. This is a case of a company having its capital divided in shares—a number of the shareholders are resident in England, and there are kept in London certain books under the control of Holland, containing a list of the shareholders, &c. Holland's powers are limited, as I have stated. That is not carrying on a business within the meaning of the rule as laid down by Cotton, L.J. Therefore the motion must succeed, and the service of the writ must be discharged.

"THE WILHELM TELL." (a.)

Shipping—Salvage—Apportionment—Agreement to participate in salvage remuneration in proportions previously determined—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 182—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 18.

In a case of apportionment of salvage it appeared that it had been stipulated by the articles that the salvors, the owners, master, and crew of a steam trawler, should participate in all sums awarded for salvage in proportion to a percentage set forth therein, and that, according to this proportion, the master of the trawler would be entitled to ten per cent. of all salvage awards, her mate to seven per cent., and her boatswain to three per cent. of the same.

Held, that the stipulation so embodied in the articles was not inequitable, and that the court would apportion shares of the salvage to the applicants, the master, mate, and boatswain of the trawler, in accordance with such stipulation.

Motion.

This was a motion by the master, mate, and boatswain of the steam trawler Irrawaddy, for the apportionment to such master, mate, and boatswain of their respective shares of a salvage award of £1,000 theretofore awarded by the court to the owners, master, and crew of The Irrawaddy for salvage services rendered to the barque Wilhelm Tell in the North Sea from the 12th to the 16th of December last.

J. P. Aspinall, for the master, mate, and boatswain.

Butler Aspinall, for the owners of The Irrawaddy.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

BARNES, J.—In this case the master, mate, and boatswain of The Irrawaddy ask to have the sum of £1,000, less unrecovered costs, apportioned between them and the other parties interested, and for an order that the applicants are not bound by the articles of The Irrawaddy to receive only the proportions of salvage set out therein against their respective names.

This sum of £1,000 has been awarded to the owners, master, and crew of the steam trawler Irrawaddy in a suit brought by them against the sailing vessel Wilhelm Tell for salvage services rendered in the North Sea to the latter vessel in (a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

December, 1891, whereby The Wilhelm Tell was, with other assistance, taken into the Humber.

In rendering these services the master and boatswain of The Irrawaddy were both injured while on board their own vessel. The master received an injury to one of his fingers, in consequence of which he was ill for a month, and during that time he received no pay, but incurred no medical expenses. The boatswain had his left leg broken, and in consequence was laid up for thirteen weeks. During this time he received no wages, but, as he was treated in the Hull Infirmary, he also incurred no medical expenses. When he recovered he was taken on by the owners of The Irrawaddy as a deck hand. These particulars were furnished to me after the hearing of the case.

The Irrawaddy was for some time under repair owing to the damage received by her in rendering the said services. Admissions were put in before me from which it appeared that at the time aforesaid the master, mate, and boatswain were respectively serving under articles of agreement, of which the following is an extract: "And it is also agreed that every member of the crew, including apprentices, shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sum or sums of money received for any salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement." Then follows a memorandum, from which it appears that the captain (Minns) was engaged on the 7th of December, 1891, at a rate of wages which was based on a share of the fishing profits of one and three-eighths per cent., and a share of salvage of ten per cent. The mate, engaged at the same time, was to have one per cent. of the profits and seven per cent. of salvage. The boatswain, engaged on the 4th of November, 1891, was to have 22s. a week and three per cent. of salvage.

It was contended by Mr. Aspinall, for the applicants, that this agreement was not binding on them, and that they were entitled to have such an apportionment as the court might deem just under the circumstances, without regard to the agreement. He relied on section 182 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 and the following cases—namely, The Enchantress, Lush. 93, 8 W. R. Adm. Dig. 23; The Pride of Canada, Br. & L. 208, 12 W. R. Adm. Dig. 31; The Louisa, 2 Wm. Rob. 22; The Ganges, L. R. 2 A. & E. 370, 18 W. R. Adm. Dig. 22; and The Rosario, 2 P. D. 41, 25 W. R. Dig. 270.

Mr. Butler Aspinall, for the owners, contended, on the other hand, that the agreement was binding upon the parties, on the grounds, first, that the 18th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of 1862 applied to this case; and, secondly, that the 182nd section of the Act of 1854 did not prevent the parties from entering into an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage, and that the agreement in the present case was equitable.

Section 182 of the Act of 1854 provides, inter alia, that "every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon . . . any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative," and the 18th section of the Act of 1862 declares that the said 182nd section is "not to apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which, according to the terms of the said agreement, is to be employed on salvage services, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships."

I do not think the point was referred to in argument; but it is to be noticed that those sections apply only to seamen, and not to masters, for the term "seamen" does not include masters; see the interpretation clauses (section 2) of the Act of 1854. They do not, therefore, appear to affect the master in the present case. As to the point raised on the 18th section, I am of opinion that The Irrawaddy was not a ship which, according to the terms of the agreement, was to be employed on salvage service within the meaning of that section. She was, in fact, to be employed, according to the terms of the agreement, in trawling in the North Sea, and the clause as to salvage was only inserted in order to deal with the case of an apportionment of any salvage which she might have the good fortune to earn.

The contentions on the part of the applicants give rise to more difficulty; but in my opinion the result of the cases above referred to, and also the cases of The Afrika, 5 P. D. 192, 28 W. R. Dig. 212, and of The Beulah, 2 Notes of Cases, 61, is to show that the 182nd section of the Act of 1854 does not prevent seamen from entering into an equitable agreement for the apportionment of salvage, though it prohibits stipulations by which they abandon their rights to salvage, and that the court will uphold an agreement with seamen for the apportionment of salvage if it is not inequitable.

In The Louisa Dr. Lushington readjusted the agreed apportionment apparently on the ground that it gave the owners more than the court ever, at that time, decreed to them, and it would seem as if he must have considered that the scale of apportionment agreed to was inequitable.

In The Enchantress, the same learned judge stated that he would decree an equitable apportionment unless barred by an equitable agreement or an equitable tender; and he said that "local and customary agreements, if equitable, such as that, where there is a lifeboat company, those who stay shall be rewarded as those who go, the court will favourably consider."

The Pride of Canada, Br. & Lush. 208, more fully reported 1 Mar. L. C. 406, was only a case in which the owners failed to bring the case within the 18th section of the Act of 1862; but Dr. Lushington, according to the report in the Maritime Law Cases, stated that, even before the Act of 1854, no seamen could enter into a stipulation of an equitable nature.

In The Ganges Sir Robert Phillimore held that an agreement in that case to pay certain wages, and a fixed rate of poundage on the towage and salvage money earned by a tug, was not inequitable, although the sum allowed to the plaintiff, a temporary master, would be very inadequate remuneration according to the general principles upon which salvage is distributed.

In The Afrika Sir Robert Phillimore adopts the language in The Enchantress which I have quoted above. He says, 5 P. D., at p. 194, "On this point I think it necessary to refer to the law laid down in The Enchantress, and I take the law as laid down in that case to be perfectly clear. In that case Dr. Lushington said, 'I conceive a duty is hereby imposed upon me to decree, upon application made, what, in my judgment, is an equitable apportionment of salvage, unless I am barred by one or two circumstances, either an equitable agreement between the parties, or an equitable tender.'"

In The Beulah Dr. Lushington said that he would make an exception to any arrangement made with seamen where there had been any extraordinary personal risk and labour to the seamen. If, however, an equitable agreement had been entered into I do not myself understand on what principle such an exception should be allowed, unless, perhaps, it might be considered in exceptional cases that the services of the men were beyond the scope of what was contemplated by the agreement at the time it was entered into.

The policy of the law is to protect seamen from improvident arrangements, and to encourage their exertions to save life and property. An agreement which secures these objects appears to me to be unobjectionable. They are secured in the fishing trade in the way I am about to point out. I should observe that no distinction is drawn in the cases between masters and seamen, though, as I have pointed out, sections 182 and 18 do not apply to masters. In all these cases there was no special legislation affecting the parties besides the Merchant Shipping Acts; but at the time of the argument of this case the form of articles used for The Irrawaddy was produced, and it then appeared that it was in the form issued by the Board of Trade in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 41). Section 13 of that Act provides that "the skipper of every fishing boat shall enter into an agreement with every seaman (not being a boy, under such agreement as is by this Act required) whom he carries to sea from any port in the United Kingdom as one of his crew. . . . And every such agreement shall be so framed as to admit of stipulations, to be adopted at the will of the skipper and seaman in each case, as to advance and allotment of wages, and may contain any other stipulations which are not contrary to law."

The Irrawaddy was a steam trawler, to which the Act applied, and her owners were compelled to use this form of articles, which had been sanctioned by the Board of Trade. The articles were for trawling in the North Sea, and contained as part of the printed form the clause above mentioned as to the apportionment of salvage, and a column for the insertion of the share of salvage. For such a vessel engaged in such a trade under such articles it seems very reasonable to have a provision for apportioning salvage on a fair basis, taking the rough with the smooth. This form must now be in use amongst a very large number of vessels, and if a fair percentage of the salvage is allotted to each man on the articles, the men have the advantage in easy towing cases, which are not infrequent, though their duties may be more arduous in rendering more difficult services.

I am informed that the present agreement gives the owners about two-thirds, and the master and crew one-third, of any salvage award.

In my opinion the agreement as to the apportionment of the salvage contained in these articles ought to be supported, on the ground that it is entered into in the form and manner which I have described, and is equitable, and that the stipulation as to apportionment is not contrary to law. Moreover, in the present case I do not think the applicants ran any greater risk than any of the rest of the crew, though they were more unfortunate in the accidents they met with. The court would hardly in such a case as this, apart from the agreement, give the owners of a steamer rendering useful towing services upon salvage terms less than two-thirds of the sum awarded.

A further point was raised by the owners, that, in arriving at the net sum to be apportioned, they were entitled to deduct certain sums, set out in the admissions, for repairs, and, as against the boatswain, certain further sums for loss of profits, time, &c., but in my opinion the owners are not entitled to make those deductions. The agreement is for a certain share of the salvage, and in my judgment that means the sum awarded less, as is agreed, the unrecovered costs in obtaining the award.

The agreement is binding, and the owners in a particular case may have to bear some disadvantages, just as some members of the crew do.

I therefore apportion the sum of £1,000, less unrecovered costs, in the porportions mentioned in the articles of agreement, and as neither party has succeeded entirely in their contentions, I leave each party to pay their own costs.

TABERNACLE PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY (Appellants) AND KNIGHT'S ARBITRATION, Re (No. 2). (a.)

Arbitration—Building society—Power to direct arbitrators to state a case—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 36—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 19, 24.

Section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, which provides that any arbitrator may, at any stage of the proceedings in the reference, and shall, if so directed by the court, state, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, any question of law arising in the course of reference, applies to arbitrations under the Building Societies Act, 1874.

Where an order nisi has been obtained by a party who has no notice of an award having been made, it lies upon those who contest it to show that the award was in fact executed prior to the order being made.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (39 W. R. 507, [1891] 2 Q. B. 63) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry and Bowen, L.JJ.) reported 39 W. R. 507, [1891] 2 Q. B. 63.

A dispute having arisen between Knight and the appellants, a building society of which he was a member, reference was made to arbitration under section 34 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, as directed by the rules of the society.

During the progress of the arbitration a request was made to the arbitrators on behalf of Knight to state a special case for the opinion of the court upon a question of law arising in the course of the reference. They declined, and on the 16th of January, 1891, an order nisi was made at chambers directing them to do so, unless cause was shown to the contrary. It appeared that the arbitrators made and signed their award before either of them had notice of the order nisi; but there was no evidence that this had been done before the making of the order nisi.

The order nisi was made absolute. The Court of Appeal held that there was power under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to order abitrators appointed under the Building Societies Act, 1874, to state a special case as directed by the order.

The building society appealed.

The sections of the Act and the arguments used sufficiently appear in the judgments.

Cock, Q.C. (Maconn with him), for the appellants.

Fillan (A. L. Reed with him), for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The first question in this case is whether the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42 is inconsistent with the provisions of the general Arbitration Act,

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

52 & 53 Vict. c. 49. The policy of section 19 of the later Act is very manifest. During the progress of an arbitration it may be seen that the arbitrator has mistaken the law and is about to act upon his error, and the power of putting him right used to consist in the right of either party to revoke the submission to arbitration. That power has been greatly controlled by legislation, and now it may be extremely difficult for a party to obtain an order giving leave to revoke unless a case is stated.

Such a case actually occurred in your lordships' House (East and West India Dock Co. v. Kirk, 12 App. Cas. 738, 36 W. R. Dig. 7), and unless the parties had consented to terms (which happily they did), though leave would have been given by this House to revoke the submission, it is obvious that this is a clumsy and incomplete remedy. The court ought to have in its own hands power to compel in a fit case a reference to a court of competent jurisdiction, so as to prevent a failure of justice. This is a power independent of and altogether different from the right of the parties under section 36 of the Building Societies Act of 1874, which enacts that the determination of the arbitrators or the court shall be conclusive. It provides, also, that the arbitrators or registrar, as the case may be, may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Judicature on any question of law.

The later statute makes the provision which I have first referred to, apply to every arbitration under any Act passed before or after the commencement of the Act itself (1889), and only excepts from its operation any Act inconsistent with the Act regulating the arbitration, or with any rules or procedure authorized or recognized by that Act.

If the two provisions may stand together, I am unable to follow the argument that the one Act is inconsistent with the other; and the whole argument depends upon the word "inconsistent" in the later statute. It is obvious to inquire, where is the inconsistency if both may stand together and both operate without either interfering with the other?

The policy, object, and application of the two sections are entirely different. I think in the Building Societies Act the object was to enable the arbitrators, on the solicitation of the parties, to state a question of law which might enable them to decide the case in its final result. I think the object of section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, though in one sense it may be said to have for its object the same result, was rather to hold a control over the arbitration while it was proceeding, by the courts, and not to allow the parties to be concluded by the award when, as it is said, parties may be precluded by the arbitrator's bad law if once the award is made, although they might have had a right to repudiate the arbitration if they had done so before the completion of the award.

I am therefore of opinion that the first objection here fails, and that the Acts, not being inconsistent with each other, may be read together, and the court or a judge would have jurisdiction to interfere.

The second objection turns upon a question of fact; and I should agree that if a complete award had been made a statute which gives the power to a court or judge at any stage of the proceedings under a reference would not be applicable where the proceedings had come to an end by a completed award. Now I will assume that in this case the award was very nearly completed, but I am equally satisfied that it was not completed and published as the award, but was in process of being completed. I will assume that the arbitrators had no notice of the rule nisi. But the affidavit which stated the fact that they had no notice of the rule nisi is studiously reticent about when, in fact, what is relied on as the completion of the award was effected; and I infer as a fact that the rule nisi was obtained, whether the arbitrators had notice of it or not, before the award was signed, even if that would be completion.

I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—Section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, enacts that any arbitrator may, at any stage of the proceedings in the reference, and shall, if so directed by the court, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference. The provisions of the Act are, by section 24, made applicable to every arbitration under any previous or subsequent statute, "except in so far as this Act is inconsistent with the Act regulating the reference, or with any rules or procedure authorized or recognized by that Act."

The appellants concede that, had it not been for the exception in section 24, the provisions of section 19 would have applied to arbitrations under the Building Societies Act of 1874. They maintain that these provisions are inapplicable, in respect of their being inconsistent with a proviso in section 36 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, to the effect that the statutory arbitrators "may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Judicature upon any question of law," and that the court had, therefore, no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from.

If the provisions of section 19 had been inserted verbatim in section 36 of the Building Societies Act they would not have repealed the discretion of the arbiters to state, or refuse to state, a case on the request of a party to the reference. They would simply have conferred upon the arbitrators the additional privilege to state a case proprio motu, and upon the parties the additional right to obtain an order from the court. The appellants were accordingly constrained to argue that, whenever the provisions of the Arbitration Act are found to add to the enactments of any other statute regulating arbitrations, they are, in the sense of the exception, inconsistent with it. To hold that the Legislature intended to attach that meaning to the word "inconsistent" would be to defeat the object of the leading enactment in section 24. In my opinion the object of the Legislature was to add to the remedies open to the parties under a statutory arbitration; and the sole purpose of the exception was to prevent the application of the powers conferred upon the court by the Act of 1889 to arbitrations under any statute whose provisions, either expressly or by reasonable implication, excluded the exercise of such powers.

A second point was raised by the appellants which is not noticed by any of the learned judges of the Appeal Court. Section 19 only authorizes the intervention of the court during the dependence of the reference, and does not warrant an order being made upon an arbitrator to state a case after his award has been duly completed; and it was argued that in this case there was a defect of jurisdiction, inasmuch as the award of the arbitrators had been adjusted and signed by them before an order nisi was obtained.

If there had been any evidence to show, or if there had been a suggestion in the pleadings, that an award was published on the same day as the order, but before the latter was applied for, I should not, as at present advised, have been prepared to hold that this case was governed by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Wright v. Mills, 7 W. R. 498, 4 H. & N. 488. There the court had undoubted jurisdiction, and was, moreover, seised of the case at the time when, fictione juris, its order was held to have been made. Here the court had no process before it until the initial order was applied for; and it had no jurisdiction to grant the order if, at the time of the application there was a completed award.

I am satisfied, however, that no foundation has been laid in fact for the argument which was addressed to us; and that circumstance probably accounts for the absence of any comment upon it by the Court of Appeal. There is an affidavit to the effect that the arbitrators' award was drawn up and signed by them before they had notice of the order of court. That statement, which was the sole basis of the argument, plainly implies that the award was not completed before the order was made, and that fact was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction. The completion of the award, between the issuing of the order and its intimation to the arbitrators, cannot deprive the parties of their statutory remedy, or oust the jurisdiction of the court.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed, with costs.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The question involved in this appeal is whether the 19th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, applies to arbitrations under the Building Societies Act, 1874. That section provides that "any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall if so directed by the court or a judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference." Section 24 of the same Act provides as follows: "This Act shall apply to every arbitration under any Act passed before or after the commencement of this Act as if the arbitration were pursuant to a submission, except in so far as this Act is inconsistent with the Act regulating the arbitration or with any rules or procedure authorized or recognized by that Act."

It is said on behalf of the appellants that section 19 of the Arbitration Act is inconsistent with the Building Societies Act, 1874, and therefore does not apply to arbitrations under it. The material section of the latter Act is the 36th, which provides that "every determination by arbitration . . . under the Act of a dispute shall be binding and conclusive on all parties, and shall be final, to all intents and purposes, and shall not be subject to appeal and shall not be removed or removable into any court of law, or restrained or restrainable by the injunction of any court of equity, provided always that the arbitrators . . . may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Judicature on any question of law."

The argument of the appellants is, that this section vests in the arbitrators the discretion whether a case shall be stated or not, and that the later Act, which empowers the court to order the arbitrators to state a case, is therefore inconsistent with it. I cannot accede to this view. No doubt the Building Societies Act empowers the arbitrators to state a case, and leaves it to them to determine whether they will exercise this power or not; the parties cannot compel them to do so. The Arbitration Act, which confers upon the court the power to order a case to be stated, if it applies, adds, no doubt, to the provisions which are to govern an arbitration under the Building Societies Act, but it is clear that the fact that the provision is an additional one does not of itself show that there is any inconsistency in the two Acts, for, if so, the 24th section would never have any operation. I think the test is, whether you can read the provisions of the later Act into the earlier without any conflict between the two. This you can clearly do as regards the enactment under consideration. For these reasons I concur in the judgment of the court below.

A further point was argued at the bar which is not noticed in the judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal. It was said that, even if the Arbitration Act applied, the respondent had come to the court too late, inasmuch as the arbitrators made their award on the 16th of January, 1891, and it was only on that day that the order nisi was made, calling upon the arbitrators to show cause why they should not be required to state a case for the opinion of the court. The learned counsel for the appellants contended that it was for the respondent to show, in order to support the order, that it was obtained before the arbitrators had made their award, and were thus functi officio. It is unnecessary to determine whether the rule that a judicial act must be regarded as dating from the first moment of the day on which it is done would apply to such an order as that under consideration, or whether it would be sufficient cause for not making the order absolute if it were shown that the award, though bearing the same date, was in fact signed before the order nisi was made. I can entertain no doubt that, where an order nisi has been obtained by a party who has no notice of an award having been made, it is for those who contest it to show that the award was executed prior to the order being made. This is not shown in the present case. The affidavit of the arbitrators states only that their award was made and signed before either of them "had notice of the order nisi."

For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Lord MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord FIELD.—I also am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. There are two questions to be considered. The first one is of general importance, namely, whether or not section 19 of the Arbitration Act of 1889, by which the court can order an arbitrator to state a case raising any question of law, is inconsistent with the arbitration provisions of the Building Societies Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42). The second question is whether in the present case the order to state a case was made whilst the proceedings under the reference were pending.

With regard to the first point I can see no reason whatever why the enactments should not very properly stand together. The Building Societies Act contemplates, no doubt, as the learned judges of the Divisional Court thought, a speedy and comparatively inexpensive remedy. It gives that remedy by arbitration, the judges being selected by the litigating parties themselves. Those arbitrators might be laymen, as in the present case they were, or they might be qualified and trained lawyers. But then the statute only gives the arbitrators power to state a case in their discretion at the request of either party.

Now, in the present instance the arbitrators seem to have come to the conclusion, I will not say very rapidly, but very decidedly, that the view which they took was the only possible view that could be taken; and certainly this case, as it seems to me, is an illustration, and a very convenient one, of the benefit which will arise from consolidating and construing the two Acts together. Under the Building Societies Act the matter was, in the discretion of the arbitrators, at the request of either party; but then there came this Act, a general Act, which adds an element to it enabling either of the parties who wishes to have the point authoritatively determined to compel the arbitrators, whether they will or no, to state a case.

Now, it was thought by the learned judges in the Divisional Court that by implication that provision was excluded, because it was said that the Building Societies Act, being an Act eminently for the discussion of questions without delay and without expense, it was entirely contrary to the sense and principles of that Act to import the power to state a case when that Act itself had laid down the only limits within which a case was to be stated. But it must be recollected that it may be far better and must be generally far better, in a case where the rights of the parties depend upon a question of pure law, the construction of statutes or authorities, to have a right decision than to have merely an inexpensive one; and when it is seen that the Legislature here has interposed the discretion of the judge before whom the case must come before any case can be stated for decision, it seems to me that there is no sufficient ground in the supposed policy of the Acts in question for excluding the operation of the last Act. The provisions may very well stand together. By the first either party may request; by the second, if either party request and the arbitrators refuse to state a case, then upon the party going before a judge and showing that the case is one involving some question of law (of course that is a matter which the judge will take into consideration—not a mere question of fact, but some question of law, and not only that, but some question of law upon which two opinions may possibly exist) the judge has power to compel the arbitrators to state a case.

With regard to the second point, I should not be prepared to carry further the doctrine with respect to part of a day and to hold that it cannot be considered in certain cases. In this case I am clearly of opinion, and the evidence satisfies me, that the order was really and truly made before the award.

Ex parte GOLDBERG. (a.)

Practice — Appeal — Application to appeal in formâ pauperis—Court to which application should be made.

Where a party who has not sued or defended as a pauper in the court below desires to appeal in formâ pauperis, the application for leave should be made ex parte to the Court of Appeal, and the court will require the provisions of ord. 16, rr. 22-24, to be followed upon such application.

Application ex parte for leave to appeal in formâ pauperis from an order of Mr. Registrar Hope in bankruptcy. The applicant did not appear in formâ pauperis in the proceedings in the court below.

The applicant appeared in person.

Lord ESHER, M.R. — We must now decide definitely whether this application ought to be made in this court. The question would be the same in the case of an appeal from any court to this court. The applicant did not appear in formâ pauperis when before the registrar, but he now desires to appeal in formâ pauperis. I had at first some doubt whether this was the proper court to apply to, but it seems to me that, as this is a proceeding in an appeal, this court must have inherent jurisdiction in a matter relating exclusively to proceedings in this court. This court, and no other court, has inherent jurisdiction to deal with that matter. The case of Kiff v. Roberts, 35 W. R. 176, 33 Ch. D. 265, is an authority in support of this view, because the minutes of the order in that case show that this court gave the plaintiff liberty to appeal in formâ pauperis. We have, therefore, jurisdiction to entertain the application, and the provisions of ord. 16, rr. 22-24, must be followed. The provisions of those rules have been complied with in the present case, and the application is properly made ex parte. The application will therefore be granted. Whether the order may be challenged subsequently, upon the ground that the materials are irregular, or upon some other ground, is a different matter, which does not now arise.

BOWEN and A. L. SMITH, L.JJ., concurred.

Application granted.

CARLILL v. CARBOLIC SMOKE BALL CO. (a.)

Contract — Advertisement — Reward — Consideration — Acceptance—Notification of acceptance—Wagering—Insurance against disease—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109—14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2.

The defendants, who were the proprietors and vendors of a medical preparation called "The Carbolic Smoke Ball," in November, 1891, published the following advertisement:—"£100 reward will be paid by" the defendants "to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic, influenza, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks" in a certain specified manner; "£1,000 is deposited with the A. Bank, showing our" (the defendants') "sincerity in the matter." The plaintiff, on the faith of this advertisement, purchased from a chemist one of the defendants' smoke balls, and used it three times a day from the 20th of November, 1891, to the 17th of January, 1892, when she contracted influenza.

Held, that the advertisement was not a mere puff, but an offer to contract intended to be acted upon; that, by the performance of the conditions therein contained, the offer had been accepted by the plaintiff, and a contract thereby constituted between the plaintiff and the defendants; that, having regard to the character of the transaction, no notification of acceptance of the offer was necessary; that there was consideration moving from the plaintiff; and, consequently, that a binding contract by the defendants to pay the plaintiff £100 in the event which happened, had been constituted.

Held, also, that such contract was neither a contract by way of wagering within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, nor a policy of insurance within 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Decision of Hawkins, J. ([1892] 2 Q. B. 484), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of Hawkins, J., reported [1892] 2 Q. B. 484.

The defendants, the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., in November, 1891, published in a newspaper the following advertisement:—"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic, influenza, colds, or any disease caused by taking cold, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball. £1,000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent-street, showing our sincerity in the matter. During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand carbolic smoke balls were sold as preventatives against this disease, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the carbolic smoke ball. One carbolic smoke ball will last a family several months, making it the cheapest remedy in the world at the price of 10s. post free. The ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. Address, Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., 27, Princes-street, Hanover-square."

The defendants were the proprietors and vendors of the carbolic smoke ball. The plaintiff, Mrs. Carlill, having read this advertisement, on the faith of it purchased at a chemist's one of the defendants' smoke balls, and used it as directed, three times a day, from November 20 till January 17, 1892, when she was attacked by the influenza. She thereupon brought this action against the defendants to recover £100.

The defendants pleaded that there was no contract between them and the plaintiff that they should pay the plaintiff £100; and that if there were such a contract it was void, either under 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2, as being a policy of insurance not made in accordance with the provisions of that section, or as being contrary to public policy, or under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as being a contract by way of wagering.

The facts not being disputed, Hawkins, J., held on the points of law raised by the defence (1) that there was a contract by the defendants to pay the plaintiff £100 in the events which happened; (2) that such contract was not a policy of insurance within section 2 of 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, nor a contract by way of wagering within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the £100.

Finlay, Q.C., and T. Terrell, for the appellants.—First, no contract was constituted so as to enable the plaintiff to sue, because (a) it was not made either with the plaintiff or any other ascertained person, but with the whole world: Week v. Tibold, Rolle's Abr., (M) 1, p. 6 [LINDLEY, L.J.—It looks as if there were no promise at all in that case]; Harris v. Nickerson, 21 W. R. 635, L. R. 8 Q. B. 286; and (b) it was too vague and indefinite generally, no time being limited for the performance of the condition: Guthing v. Lynn, 2 B. & Ad. 232. Secondly, there was no consideration for the promise to pay £100, which on the face of it would apply to a case where a person who stole a ball, used it, and got influenza. No benefit accrues to the defendants by the mere user of the balls. In Gerhard v. Bates, 1 W. R 383, 2 Ell. & B. 476, the second reason given (at p. 487) in the judgment of Campbell, C.J., is in our favour. The advertisement was a mere puff, or at most a promise binding in honour only, not in law; it was nudum pactum. The case of Denton v. Great Northern Railway Co., 4 W. R. 240, 5 Ell. & B. 860, which seems against us, can only be supported on the ground that the advertisement there amounted to a misrepresentation of fact. Thirdly, no notification of the acceptance by the plaintiff of the defendants' offer was given by the plaintiff, and some notification was necessary to constitute a contract: Ex parte Harris, 20 W. R. 690, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 587. The circumstances of this case show that it would be unreasonable to suppose that notification of acceptance was not necessary, as here the terms of the advertisement itself supply no means to the defendants of ascertaining the person with whom, by his performance of the condition, a contract is said to have been entered into. The defendants had no means of checking, so as to see whether the plaintiff had used the smoke ball as indicated. Fourthly, if there is a contract it was a contract by way of insurance, and therefore void under 4 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2, because the names of the persons interested therein were not inserted in it. Fifthly, if a contract at all, it was a contract to indemnify persons using the smoke ball against influenza, and therefore a wagering contract: Good v. Elliott, 3 Term Rep. 693, at p. 706; and therefore void under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109: Brogden v. Marriott, 3 Bing. N. C. 88.

Dickens, Q.C., and W. B. Allen, for the plaintiff, were not called on to argue the points as to the contract (if any) being either a policy of insurance or a wagering contract.—This advertisement was not, nor intended to be, a mere puff; the statement as to the deposit of £1,000 in a bank negatives that. It was, in fact, an offer to contract, which offer was accepted and converted into a contract by any person performing the conditions of the advertisement: Denton v. Great Northern Railway Co. The moment the plaintiff performed the conditions of the advertisement she became ascertained as the acceptor of the offer, and the offer became a contract with the plaintiff All the reward cases are in point and in the plaintiff's favour: Williams v. Carwardine, 4 B. & Ad. 621; Denton v. Great Northern Railway Co. As to notification of the acceptance, that is not necessary where, as here, the character of the offer clearly shows that notification was not intended or required, and where the contract was complete when the conditions of the offer had been fulfilled by the plaintiff: Brogden v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, per Lord Blackburn, at p. 691; Spencer v. Harding, 19 W. R. 48, L. R. 5 C. P. 561, per Willes, J., at p. 563; Denton v. Great Northern Railway Co.; the doctrine as to notice of acceptance is not applicable to an executed, as distinguished from an executory, contract. As to consideration, in the case of a purchaser of the smoke ball there would clearly be consideration; and even apart from purchase the mere user of it by the plaintiff done at the defendants' request and for the defendants' benefit is a sufficient consideration; the passage in Gerhard v. Bates relied on by the defendants is explainable, on the ground that it turned on the form of the declaration alleging the promise in that case, the promise as there alleged being only applicable to the original holders of shares, and there being no allegation that the plaintiff there was an original holder. As to the limit of time for the performance of the condition, three constructions are possible—viz., during the existence of the then increasing epidemic, or while the user of the ball was going on, or within a reasonable time after the expiration of the continuance of such user; and either construction will suit the plaintiff.

Finlay, Q.C., in reply.—What the plaintiff calls the consideration—i.e., the using the ball—is no consideration at all, but a mere condition, just as much as the catching of the influenza, on which the reward was to be payable. The object of the advertisement was to induce people to buy the balls, not necessarily to use them. Once a ball had been purchased the defendants were indifferent as to its user subsequently. The advertisement, from its terms, is not confined to persons who bought and used the ball after the advertisement appeared; it would apply equally to persons who had done so before it appeared. The mere user of the ball—apart from the purchase of it—was not a service done to the defendants, and therefore no request by the defendants to use the ball can be implied. In Williams v. Carwardine the nature of the act done on which the reward was to be paid was a service to the defendant; a request is as necessary in the case of an executed consideration as an executory consideration: Lampleigh v. Brathwait, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., p. 153. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Victors v. Davies, 12 M. & W. 758, and Fisher v. Pyne, 1 Man. & Gr. 265 n.] As to notification of the acceptance, it would be unreasonable to attribute to this advertisement that it meant that the mere acceptance of the promise by anyone in the world, although unknown to the defendants, completed the contract: see per Lord Blackburn in Brogden v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 2 App. Cas., at p. 692. As to the limit of time, there is nothing at all in the advertisement to limit it to the then existing influenza epidemic.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The defendants are interested in selling as largely as possible a thing they call the carbolic smoke ball. The defendants have great faith in it as an effectual preventive against influenza, colds, and other diseases caused by taking cold, and also as useful in a great variety of other things. They state that "the carbolic smoke ball never fails to cure all the diseases herein mentioned when used strictly according to these directions." The defendants, like other tradespeople, want to induce the public to have sufficient confidence in this thing to buy it largely. They are the vendors, and the more they can sell the better for them; and the more the thing is used, primâ facie the more they will sell, so that in that way the more it is used the better for the defendants.

That being the position of affairs, they publish this advertisement in various papers in a form to attract attention, for the purposes to which I have already alluded. [The Lord Justice read the advertisement, and proceeded:—] The plaintiff is a lady who, upon the strength of this advertisement, bought one of these smoke balls—not at the defendants' place of business, but at a chemist's shop in Oxford-street—and used it three times daily for two weeks, according to the printed directions supplied; and before she had in fact done using it she was unfortunate enough to contract influenza, so that in her particular case the smoke ball did not produce the desired effect. Thereupon she claimed the £100 from defendants, who refused to pay it; hence this action. Hawkins, J., decided in the plaintiff's favour, and the defendants now appeal.

Mr. Finlay, on their behalf, has argued the case with great ingenuity; his argument, in substance, however, comes only to this, that there is no binding promise at all.

Some of the contentions raised in the court below on behalf of the defendants I need only mention for the purpose of dismissing them. First it was said that no action would lie upon this, because it is a policy. You have only got to look at the document to dismiss that argument. Then it was said that it was a bet; Hawkins, J., examined that argument with his usual skill, and came to the conclusion that a bet was never intended by anyone, and that there was nothing whatever in common with a bet in the transaction. I so entirely agree with him that I propose to pass that over as not worth serious attention.

We have not got in this case to deal with any inferences of fact. What we have to deal with is an express promise to pay £100 in certain events. Read it how you will, there is here, in my opinion, a distinct promise expressed in language perfectly unmistakable—"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts the influenza after having used the ball three times daily," &c. I have come to that conclusion after looking fully into the whole statement in order to see whether this was intended to be a promise at all, or whether it was a mere puff—a sort of thing that meant nothing. Is it a mere puff? I answer No, and I base my answer upon the following passage: "£1,000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank showing our sincerity in the matter." Now what is that deposited for? What is that statement put in for, except to negative the suggestion that this is a mere puff and means nothing at all? The deposit is called in aid by the advertiser as proof of his sincerity in the matter. What does that mean? Of his intention to pay the £100 in the events which he has specified. Whoever drew this advertisement has distinctly in words made that promise. I make these remarks for the purpose of giving point to the observation that we are not inferring the promise from the language used. Here the promise is as plain as words can make it.

Then it is said, on behalf of the defendants, that the promise is not binding, because, in the first place, it is not made with anybody in particular. That is a point which is common not only to the words of this advertisement, but to the words of all other advertisements offering rewards. They are offers to anybody who performs the conditions named in the advertisement, and anybody who does perform the conditions accepts the offer. This advertisement is, I take it, in point of law an offer to pay £100 to anybody who will perform the condition, and the performance of the condition is the acceptance of the offer. This view rests upon a line of authorities, the earliest of which is the celebrated advertisement case of Williams v. Carwardine, which has been followed by numerous other cases as to advertisements of rewards. That is the legal analysis of it so far.

The next point urged is this: granting that the performance of the condition is an acceptance of the offer, that acceptance must be notified. Unquestionably, as a general proposition, when an offer is made there must not only be acceptance, but notification of the acceptance, to constitute a contract. But is that so in cases of this kind? I apprehend that a case of this kind is rather an exception to the rule, or if not an exception, it is open to the observation that the notification of the acceptance need not precede the performance. This offer is a continuing one; it was never revoked, and if notice of acceptance be required—which I very much doubt—the person who makes the offer gets the notice of acceptance contemporaneously with the notice of the performance of the condition. Anyhow, if notice be required, he has got it before his offer is revoked, and that is all that is required by the general proposition itself. But I rather think that the true view in a case of this kind is that which was expressed by Lord Blackburn in Brogden v. Metropolitan Railway Co., that the person who makes an offer of this kind shows by his language, and from the nature of the transaction, that he does not expect, and does not require, notice of the acceptance apart from the performance of the condition itself.

We have, therefore, all the elements necessary to form a binding contract, enforceable in point of law, subject to two observations. First, it is argued that the language used here is so vague that it cannot really be construed as a promise—that the vagueness of the language shows that a legal promise was never intended or contemplated. The language is vague and uncertain in some respects, and particularly in this, that the £100 is to be paid to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic after having used the balls three times daily and so on—and it was asked, how long after using the balls? According to the language of the advertisement no time is fixed as to that, and construing the offer most strongly against the person making it, one might infer that any time after was meant. I am inclined to think, however, that such a construction would be pushing too far the doctrine of taking the language of the offer most strongly against the person making the offer. I doubt if business men, or reasonable men, would understand the offer to mean that if you took a smoke ball and used it three times daily for the time specified (two weeks), you were to be guaranteed against influenza for the rest of your life. I do not think that was what was meant. But, if it does not mean that, what does it mean? It is for the defendants to show what it does mean. It seems to me that there are two reasonable constructions which may be put on the advertisement as to this matter, either of which will answer the purpose of the plaintiff. Possibly there may be three constructions; it may possibly mean that it is limited to persons catching the increasing epidemic—that is, the then present influenza epidemic—or any colds, or diseases caused by taking cold, during the prevalence of the then increasing epidemic. That is one suggestion; it does not fascinate me, I confess. I prefer the other two suggestions, one of which is, that you are warranted free from catching this epidemic, or colds, or other diseases caused by taking cold, whilst you are using these smoke balls. If that be the meaning, the plaintiff was using the ball, and whilst using it got the epidemic. The other construction—and the one which I myself prefer—is that the warranty is against taking the influenza, &c., within a reasonable time after having used the smoke ball. Then it is asked, what is a reasonable time? One of the Lords Justices suggested that that depended upon the reasonable view of a germ in developing. I do not feel much pressed by that difficulty. It seems to me that what is a reasonable time may be got at, in a business sense and in a sense to the satisfaction of a lawyer, in this way: Find out what the smoke ball is composed of —a chemist will tell that; find out from a skilled physician how long such composition could be reasonably expected to endure so as to protect a person from an epidemic or cold; and in that way you will get a standard to be laid before a jury—or a judge without a jury—by which they might exercise their judgment as to what a reasonable time would be. In my opinion the true construction of this is, that £100 will be paid to anybody who uses this smoke ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions, and who gets influenza, or cold, or other diseases caused by taking cold, within a reasonable time after so using it. That is, I think, the fair and proper business construction of this offer. If that be the true construction of it, it is enough for the plaintiff. I will, therefore, say no more as to the vagueness of the document.

I come now to the last point which I think requires attention, that is, the point as to consideration. Mr. Finlay has argued with great skill that this is nudum pactum. We must apply to that argument the usual legal tests. Let us see whether there is no advantage to the defendants. Mr. Finlay says it is no advantage to them how much the smoke ball is used; what is an advantage and benefit to them is the sale; and he has put the ingenious case that there might be a lot of these balls stolen, and that the user of the stolen balls by the thief or other persons would be no advantage to the defendants. The answer to that is, that it is quite obvious that, in the view of the advertisers, a use by the public (if they can only get the public to have confidence enough to use the smoke balls) will react, and produce a sale, which is decidedly beneficial to the defendants. It appears to me, therefore, that you get out of this an advantage to the defendants quite enough to constitute a consideration. Then, again, the matter has to be viewed from the other side. What about the person who acts upon this, and accepts the offer? Does not such person put himself to some inconvenience at the request of the defendants? Is the user of this smoke ball three times daily for two weeks, at the request of the defendants, to go for nothing? It appears to me that there is a distinct inconvenience, if not a detriment, to any person who uses this smoke ball. When, therefore, this argument of want of consideration is analyzed, it appears to me that there is ample consideration for the promise. We were pressed upon this point with the case of Gerhard v. Bates which was a case where some promoter of a company had promised the bearers of share warrants that they should have dividends for so many years, and the promise, as alleged, was held not to show any consideration. Lord Campbell's judgment upon that is intelligible; for when one comes to examine it, it is, I think, open to the explanation given by Mr. Dickens—viz., that the real point there was that the promise, if any, was made to the original bearers, and not to the plaintiff in that case; and that as the plaintiff was not suing in the name of the original bearer there was no contract with him. Then Lord Campbell goes on to enforce that view by showing that there was no consideration shown by the promise to him. I cannot help thinking that Lord Campbell's observations upon consideration would have been very different indeed if the plaintiff in that action had been an original bearer, or if the court had got to consider what a société anonyme was, and that the promise was, and had been alleged to be, a promise not only to the first bearer, but to anybody who should become the bearer. There was no such allegation, and the court said, in the absence of such allegation, that they did not know what a société anonyme was—meaning of course judicially—and, therefore, that there was no consideration. But in the present case, for the reasons I have given, I cannot see the slightest difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there is consideration.

It appears to me, therefore, that the defendants must perform their promise; and if they have been so unguarded and so unwary as to expose themselves to a great many actions, so much the worse for them. For once in a way the advertiser has reckoned too much on the gullibility of the public. It appears to me it would be very little short of a scandal if we held that no action would lie on such a promise as this, acted upon as it has been.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

We were asked by counsel for the defendants to say that this document was a contract too vague to be enforced. The first observation that arises is, that the document itself is not a contract at all. It is an offer made to the public; an offer the terms of which, Mr. Finlay says, are too vague to be treated as a definite offer the acceptance of which would constitute a binding contract. He relies on his construction of the document, in accordance with which he says there is no limit of time fixed for the catching of the influenza, and that it cannot seriously be meant as a promise to pay money to a person who catches the influenza at any time after the inhaling of the smoke ball. He says also, that when this document is looked at, you will find great vagueness in the limitation of the persons with whom the contract was intended to be made. That, in the first place, it does not follow that the persons do not include persons who may have used the smoke ball before the advertisement was issued: at all events, that it is a contract with the world in general; and also that it is an unreasonable thing to suppose it to be a contract, because nobody in their senses would contract themselves out of the opportunity of checking the experiment which was going to be made at their own expense, and there is no such provision here made for the checking. All these things, he says, show that this is rather in the nature of a puff or a proclamation than a promise—an offer intended to mature unto a contract when accepted.

Mr. Finlay relies upon his right to say that the terms are too uncertain to be consolidated into a contract; but he seems to think that the strength of the position which he desires to take up is rather this, that the vagueness of the document shows that no contract at all was intended. It seems to me that, in order to arrive at the true construction of this document, we must read it in its plain meaning, as the public would understand it. It was intended to be issued to the public and to be read by the public. How would an ordinary person, reading this document, construe it, upon the points which Mr. Finlay has brought to our attention? It was intended, unquestionably, to have some effect, and I think that the effect it was intended to have was, that by means of the use of the carbolic smoke ball the sale of the carbolic smoke ball should be increased. This advertisement was designed to make people buy the smoke ball, no doubt; but it was also designed to make them use it, because the suggestions and allegations which it contains are directed immediately to the use of the smoke ball as distinct from the purchase of it. It did not follow that the smoke ball was to be purchased from the defendants directly, or even from agents of theirs directly. The intention was that the circulation of the smoke ball should be promoted, and that the usage of it should be increased. The advertisement begins by stating that a reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic; Mr. Finlay suggests that the word "contracts" is applicable, not only to persons who contract the epidemic after the publication of the advertisement, but that it might also include persons who had contracted the influenza before. I cannot so read it. It is written in colloquial and popular language, and I think the expression is equivalent to this: "£100 will be paid to any person who shall contract the increasing epidemic after having used the carbolic smoke ball three times daily for two weeks," and it seems to me that that is the way in which the public would read it. A plain person who read this advertisement would read it in this plain way, that if anybody, after the advertisement was published, used three times daily for two weeks the carbolic smoke ball, and then caught the influenza or cold, he would be entitled to the reward.

Then Mr. Finlay asked, "Within what time is this protection to endure? Is it to go on for ever; or what is the limit of time?" As to that, I confess that I myself think that there are two constructions of this document, each of which is good sense and each of which seems to me to satisfy the exigencies of the present action. It may mean that the protection is warranted to last during the epidemic. If so, it was during the epidemic that the plaintiff contracted the disease. It may mean—and I think it more probable that it does mean—that it is to be a protection while the smoke ball is in use. That seems to me the way in which an ordinary person would understand an ordinary advertisement about medicine and about, especially, a specific against influenza. It could not be supposed that after you have left off using this smoke ball you are still to be protected for ever—as if there was to be a stamp set upon your forehead that you were never to catch the influenza because you had used the carbolic smoke ball. I think it means during use; that is the way I should read the advertisement, and I think the language of the advertisement lends itself to that conclusion. [The Lord Justice read the advertisement, and remarked that it concluded with saying that one smoke ball would last a family for several months; and continued:—] That means that it is to be going on being used; and there is also a statement that the ball can be refilled at a cost of five shillings. I therefore have no hesitation myself in saying that I think the plain construction of this protection was that it was to endure during the time that the carbolic smoke ball was being used. Lindley, L.J., thinks that the contract would be sufficiently definite if you were to read it in the sense that the protection was to be warranted during a reasonable period after use. I have some difficulty myself on that point; but it is not necessary for me to develop it, because, as I read the contract, it covered the exact moment during which the disease was contracted in this case.

Then, was the reward intended to be paid? The advertisement says £1,000 is lodged at the bank for the purpose. It not only says it will be paid, but it says, "We have lodged £1,000 to meet it." Therefore, it cannot be said that this advertisement was intended to be a mere puff. I think it was intended to be understood by the public as an offer which was to be acted upon.

Then it was urged that there was no check for the benefit of the persons who made the offer, and that it would be an insensate thing to promise £100 to a person who used the smoke ball unless you could check his using it. The answer is, that if a person chooses to make these extravagant promises he probably does so because it pays him to make them; and if he has made it, the extravagance of the promise is no reason in law why he should not be bound by it.

But it is said that it is made to all the world—that is, to anybody. It is not a contract made with all the world — there is the fallacy of Mr. Terrell's argument. It is an offer made to all the world, and why on earth should not an offer be made to all the world, which is to ripen into a contract with anybody who comes forward and performs the condition? It is an offer to become liable to anyone who, before it is retracted, performs the conditions, and, although the offer is made to the world, the contract is made with that limited portion of the public who come forward and perform the condition on the faith of the advertisement. It is not like cases in which you offer to negotiate, or in which you issue an advertisement that you have got a stock of boots to sell or houses to let—in which cases there is no offer to be bound by any contract. Such advertisements are offers to negotiate—offers to receive offers—offers to chaffer—as I think some learned judge has said in one of the cases cited. If this is an offer to be bound, then it is a contract the moment the person fulfils the condition. That seems to me to be sense, and it is also the ground on which all the advertisement cases have been decided during the century. It cannot be put better than it is put in Willes, J.'s judgment in Spencer v. Harding: "In the advertisement cases," he says, "there never was any doubt that the advertisement amounted to a promise to pay the money to the person who first gave information. The difficulty suggested was that it was a contract with all the world"—that is also the difficulty suggested here by Mr. Terrell—"but that, of course, was soon overruled. It was an offer to become liable to any person who, before the offer should be retracted, should happen to be the person to fulfil the contract of which the advertisement was an offer or tender.

That is not the sort of difficulty which presents itself here. If the circular had gone on to say, 'We undertake to sell to the highest bidder,' the reward cases would have applied, and there would have been a good contract in respect of the persons." As soon as the highest bidder presented himself in such case (says Willes, J.), the person who was to hold the vinculum juris on the other side of the contract was ascertained, and it became settled.

Then there was a very ingenious point taken by Mr. Finlay and Mr. Terrell, viz., that there was no notification of the acceptance of the contract.

It cannot be doubted that, as an ordinary rule of law, an acceptance of an offer ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together. Unless that be done the two minds may be apart, and there is no consensus which is necessary, according to English law, to make the contract. But there is this clear gloss to be made upon that doctrine, that as the mode of notifying acceptance is a part of the contract which is for the benefit of the person who makes the offer, as well as for the opposite party, the person who makes the offer may dispense with notice to himself, if he thinks it desirable to do so; and I suppose there can be no doubt that where a person, in an offer made to another person, expressly or impliedly intimates a particular mode of acceptance as sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the other person, to whom such offer is made, to follow the indicated method of acceptance; and if the person making the offer expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating an acceptance of it back again to himself, the offer is one which in its character dispenses with notification of the acceptance. Then, according to the very intimation of the person proposing the contract, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification. That seems to me to be the principle which lies at the bottom of the acceptance cases, of which an instance is the well-known judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Harris's case, and another in the judgment of Lord Blackburn in Brogden v. Metropolitan Railway Co. The passage I refer to in the latter judgment will be found in the report in 2 App. Cas., at p. 691, and it seems to me that that is exactly the line which it takes.

If that is the law, how are you to find out whether the person who makes the offer does intimate that notification of acceptance will not be necessary in order to conclude a binding bargain? In many cases you look to the offer itself. In many cases you extract it from the character of the business that is being done; and in the advertisement cases it seems to me to follow as an inference to be drawn from the transaction itself, that a person is not expected to notify his acceptance of the offer before he performs the condition, but that if he performs the condition, at once notification is dispensed with; and it seems to me no other view could be taken from the point of view of common sense. If I advertise to the world that my dog is lost, and that anybody who brings the dog to a particular place will be paid some money, are all the police, or other persons whose business it is to find lost dogs, to be expected to sit down and write me a note saying that they have accepted my proposal? Why, of course they look after the dog, and as soon as they find the dog they have performed the condition. The very essence of the transaction is that the dog should be found, and it is not necessary under such circumstances, in order to make the contract binding, that there should be any notification of acceptance at all. It follows from the nature of the thing that the performance of the condition is sufficient acceptance without the notification of it; and a person who makes an offer in an advertisement of that kind makes an offer which must be read by the light of that common sense reflection. He does, therefore, in his offer impliedly indicate that he does not require notification of the acceptance of the offer.

Then we were very ably pressed by Mr. Finlay that this was a nudum pactum, that there was no consideration for the promise. He said that the taking the influenza was a condition, and that the using the smoke ball was a condition, and that there was no consideration at all; in fact, he said, that there was no request to use the smoke ball, express or implied.

I will not elaborate the discussion upon the exact law as to requests in this kind of contract; I will simply refer to Victors v. Davies, 12 M. & W. 758, and to the note by Serjeant Manning in the report of Fisher v. Pyne in 1 Man. & Gr., at p. 265. The short answer to this argument is that there is in the present case a request to use, involved in the very offer and acceptance. What is consideration? The definition of consideration as given in Selwyn's Nisi Prius, 13th ed., vol. 1, p. 55, is: "Any act of the plaintiff from which the defendant derives a benefit or advantage, or any labour, detriment, or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, provided such act is performed, or such inconvenience suffered by the plaintiff, at the request or with the consent, either express or implied, of the defendant." Can it be said here that if the person who reads this advertisement applies to his nostrils thrice daily for such time as may seem to him tolerable, for a whole fortnight, the carbolic smoke ball, he is doing nothing at all, that it is a mere act, which is not to count towards consideration to support a promise. The law does not require us to measure the adequacy of the consideration sufficient; if there is an inconvenience sustained by the one party with the consent of the other, that is enough to import a consideration. It is enough that here the plaintiff used the smoke ball. That is consideration enough. But, further, as has been shown by the plaintiff, she not only used it, but her using it was intended and contemplated by the promisor as being indirectly a benefit to the promisor himself, because the use of the smoke ball would promote the sale of the smoke ball.

Then we were pressed with Gerhard v. Bates. As to that I can only repeat what Lindley, L.J., has already said. In Gerhard v. Bates—which arose upon demurrer—the point upon which the action failed was that the plaintiff did not allege—and he did not allege it probably because he could not prove it—that the promise was made to the class of persons of whom alone the plaintiff was; and therefore there was no privity between the plaintiff and the defendant. But Lord Campbell went on to give a second reason. If his first reason was not enough, and if the plaintiff and the defendant there, had come together as contracting parties, and if the only question was consideration, it seems to me that Lord Campbell's reasoning would not have been sound. It is only if you read it as pointing out the want of consideration flowing from one person to the other in the particular case—assuming them not to have come into the relation of contracting parties—that it can be supported; but if so the language was superfluous. The truth is, that if in that case you could once have found the parties to be contracting parties, there would have been no difficulty about consideration; but in Gerhard v. Bates you could not find the parties to be contracting parties. So in this case, if once you determine that there was a promise made to the plaintiff here as one of the public that if she used the smoke ball three times daily for a fortnight and got the influenza she should have the money, it seems to me that her using the smoke ball was sufficient consideration. If I say to a person, "If you use such and such a medicine for a week I will give you £5," and he uses it, there is ample consideration for the promise. It seems to me in the present case there was ample consideration.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first point in this case is whether the defendants' advertisement was an offer which, when accepted and its conditions performed, constituted a promise to pay, assuming that there was good consideration to uphold that promise; or whether it was only a puff from which no promise could be implied; or, in other words—as it has been put to us—a mere statement by the defendants of the confidence they entertained in the efficiency of their remedy; or, to put it in the words used by Lord Campbell in Denton v. Great Northern Railway Co., whether this advertisement was to be mere waste paper. That is how that learned judge summarized the arguments put forward as to the advertisement in that case.

I read this advertisement in this way, as if the paragraph in the middle of it were taken out and placed at the end of it, for it seems to me it then runs much more easily and is much more intelligible. In my view the true reading of this advertisement is this:—"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. to any person who, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with such ball, contracts the increasing epidemic, influenza, colds, or any diseases caused by taking colds." If I may paraphrase that, I think it means this:—If you—that is, one of the public as yet not ascertained, but who will be ascertained by the performing the condition—will hereafter use my smoke ball three times daily for two weeks according to my printed directions, I will pay you £100 if you contract the influenza within the period mentioned in the advertisement. Now why is there not a request there? In consideration of your using my smoke balls at my request, and paying for them—though that is not in, yet it is a necessary part of the use—then if you catch the influenza within a certain time I will pay you £100. It must not be lost sight of, that this advertisement also states that, as security for what is being offered, and as proof of its sincerity, £1,000 is actually lodged at the bank, wherewith to satisfy a possible demand which might be made in the event of the conditions contained therein being fulfilled, entitling a recipient to the £100 offered. How can it be said that such a statement as that embodied a mere expression of confidence in the wares the defendants had to sell? I cannot read the advertisement in any such way. In my judgment the advertisement was an offer intended to be acted upon if the conditions were performed, and when accepted constituted a binding promise on which an action would lie, assuming that there was consideration for that promise.

Mr. Finlay said that it was a promise in honour, or an agreement in honour, or a contract in honour; I asked him what he meant by that, and he said that it was a mere nudum pactum. That, I understand; I understand that if there be no consideration for a promise, it may be called a promise in honour, or, as a lawyer would call it, a promise without consideration and nudum pactum; but if he means anything else I do not understand it. I do not understand what a promise or an agreement in honour is, unless it is one on which an action cannot be brought because it is nudum pactum; and about nudum pactum I will say a word presently.

In my judgment this first points fails, and I think that this was an offer intended to be acted upon, and, when acted upon and the conditions performed, gave a right of action to a person performing those conditions.

Then it was argued that the promise was too wide, because there is, it was said, no limit of time within which the person is to catch the influenza. I am not going to pause there. As has been pointed out by Lindley, L.J., there are as to this three possible constructions to this contract. I like the last two, if I may call them so, the best—viz., either "catching the influenza during the time you are using the balls," or "catching the influenza within a reasonable time after the expiration of the two weeks during which you have used it three times daily." It is not necessary to say which is the correct construction. The third possible construction is "during the epidemic"; but whichever be the true construction, there is sufficient limit of time to prevent the contract being too vague in that particular.

Then it was argued that if the advertisement constituted an offer which might culminate in a contract if it were accepted, it was not accepted by the plaintiff in the manner contemplated; and it was said that the manner contemplated was such that notice of the acceptance had to be given by the party using the smoke ball to the defendants before user, so that the defendants might be at liberty to superintend the experiment. All I can say is that there is no such provision in the advertisement at all; and that in my judgment no such provision can be read into it. I entirely agree with what has fallen from the other Lords Justices—viz., that this is one of those cases in which a performance of the condition—the condition being the user of this smoke ball three times daily for two weeks—is an acceptance of the offer.

Then it was said that there was no person named in the advertisement with whom any contract was made. That, I suppose, has taken place in every case in which actions on advertisements have been maintained for the time of Williams v. Carwardine—and before that—down to the present day. I have nothing to add to what has been said on that subject—that a person becomes a persona designata and able to sue when he performs the conditions mentioned in the advertisement, which gives him a right to the money therein offered.

Then it was said that there was no consideration, and that it was nudum pactum. There are two considerations here. One is the consideration of the inconvenience of having to use this ball three times daily for two weeks. That is a consideration moving from the plaintiff to the defendants; and the other consideration is the money gain likely to accrue to the defendants by the enhanced sale of the smoke balls by reason of the plaintiff's user of them—ample considerations to support the promise.

I have only now to add that, as regards the points raised as to this being a policy or a wager, in my judgment there is nothing in either of them.

SKINNER & CO. v. SHEW & CO. (a.)

Patent—Action to restrain threats by "Circulars, advertisements, or otherwise"—Threats contained in letters—Answer to inquiries—Privileged communications—Patentee unable to bring action for infringement—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

A "threat" within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883, may be contained in letters written bonâ fide in answer to inquiries made about a patent. Such a letter cannot be considered as a privileged communication.

The words "or otherwise" in the section are not to be classed as ejusdem generis with "circulars or advertisements": they are extended by the words which precede them, and not confined by them.

Driffield and East Riding Pure Linseed Cake Co. v. Waterloo Mills Cake and Warehousing Co., 34 W. R. 360, 31 Ch. D. 638; Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co., 37 W. R. 636, 42 Ch. D. 665; and Barrett v. Day, 38 W. R. 362, 43 Ch. D. 435, approved.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of North, J., who had held that certain letters of the defendants contained "threats" within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and had granted an injunction to restrain such threats, with an inquiry as to damages. The correspondence which constituted the alleged "threats" is set out in the judgment of Lindley, L.J. Ultimately, on the 16th of May, 1892, the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action against the defendants, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from making or continuing threats of legal proceedings or liability by letters, circulars, advertisements, or otherwise in respect of the alleged infringement of patent No. 4,102 of 1885, of which the defendants claimed to be the assignees, damages, and costs.

Section 32 of the Act provides as follows:—"Where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention, by circular, advertisement, or otherwise, threatens any other person with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of any alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention; any person or persons aggrieved thereby may bring an action against him, and may obtain an injunction against the continuance of such threats, and may recover such damage (if any) as may have been sustained thereby, if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not in fact an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats; provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent."

Bousfield, Q.C., and T. Terrell, for the appellants, contended that their letters did not contain a threat within the meaning of section 32 of the Act.—The letters were written merely in answer to questions which they were bound in common fairness and honesty to answer and to give an opinion upon. The purview of the section had been extended by the decisions beyond what was intended. Under the old law, as in a case of libel, this would have been a privileged communication. The section was passed with reference to a well-known class of cases: Wren v. Weild, L. R. 4 Q. B. 731, 17 W. R. Dig. 91; Halsey v. Brotherhood, 29 W. R. 9, 15 Ch. D. 514. In such cases no action would lie against the threats unless mala fides was proved, and the section was directed against threats without mala fides. The word "otherwise" must be restricted to words ejusdem generis with circulars and advertisements: Barrett v. Day, 38 W. R. 362, 43 Ch. D. 435; Dwarris on Statutes, pp. 621, 657. If mala fides were shown here the remedy would be outside the section. The doctrine of privilege must be read into the section.

Moulton, Q.C., and Micklem, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought on the 32nd section of the Patents Act, 1883. North, J., has held, under circumstances to which I will shortly allude, that the defendants have threatened by "circulars, advertisements, or otherwise," not certainly by circulars or advertisements, but "otherwise," some person with legal proceedings or liability in respect of an alleged manufacture and so on; and he has granted an injunction. The short outline of the case is this. It seems that the defendants have a patent camera, and it appears that they were customers of the London Stereoscopic Co. It appears that the plaintiff has got a camera, whether he has got a patent for it I do not at this moment recollect—I think it is said he had—but he wanted to introduce his camera to the public, and he sent it to the London Stereoscopic Co. The London Stereoscopic Co., thinking that it looked something like the defendants' patent camera, with which they were acquainted, wrote to the defendants and asked them their opinion about it, whereupon the defendants wrote this letter of the 18th of February, 1892, to the London Stereoscopic Co.: "In reply to yours of the 13th inst., we beg to confirm our opinion previously expressed, that the camera in question is an infringement not only of our patent No. 4,102/85 but also of our No. 15,657/91. We have taken further advice in the matter, and we are prepared to stop the sale of the camera if placed on the market. If you are willing to do so it would save time and trouble if you would give us the name of the manufacturer, and we will communicate direct with him." In consequence of that the Stereoscopic Co. declined to buy any of the plaintiff's cameras, and they said, through their solicitors, in their letter that which is only natural: "Under these circumstances it is absolutely impossible for our clients to continue any negotiations for an agreement. However useful your invention may be, they cannot submit themselves to the risk of a lawsuit." Then on the 20th the plaintiffs themselves wrote to the defendants this letter: "We are informed from a letter which you sent to the London Stereoscopic Co. that you intend to dispute our right to make our patent hand camera, of which they showed you a sample. We may say we have taken competent advice from more than one eminent authority, and we are fully prepared to defend any action that you may bring. The only probable result will be the quashing of your own patent through defective specification. In any case we are advised that our camera is clear. We are sorry to have to come to litigation with you, but we are so sure of our own ground that we cannot for a moment entertain the idea of withdrawing our camera from the market." Then in answer to that the defendants write to the plaintiffs: "In reply to yours of the 20th we can only confirm ours of the 18th to the London Stereoscopic Co., that we considered the camera in question an infringement of our patents Nos. 4,102/85 and 15,657/91, and are prepared to take action to stop the sale. In order that we may go further into the matter before loss of time is incurred, if you would send us a camera and give us the number of the patent it would be an aid to our further investigation of the matter," and so on.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, North, J., has held that those threats are within the meaning of the expression in the 32nd section. And before I say any more about that, we must look a little further into this section. Supposing they are threats, then the person threatened—that is, the present plaintiff or any person aggrieved—may bring an action against the person making the threat, and may obtain an injunction against the continuance of such threats, and may recover such damages as may have been sustained thereby. But that is subject to these two qualifications: "if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not in fact an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats." Well, now, it is admitted here by Mr. Bousfield that the plaintiffs' camera cannot be regarded by him as in fact an infringement of the defendants' legal rights. That is explained by the state of the patent, and the necessity for amendment. Therefore, that condition is complied with. Then there is this further proviso, "that this section shall not apply"—that is to say, an action shall not lie under this section "if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent." For the same reason—viz., that the defendants' specification is not in a fit and proper state, and that an amendment is desirable — Mr. Bousfield also admits that it is a fact that the defendants are not in a position to commence and prosecute an action for the infringement of their patent; therefore, both these conditions may be regarded as complied with, and we need not trouble ourselves further about them, except that that last proviso contains, I think, the key to the legislation. I make that observation because we all know, as a matter of history, that this section in the Patents Act was introduced partly in consequence of the decision of this court in Halsey v. Brotherhood. Now, the object of this Act was to cure two blots—first of all, to give an action for damages where there was not one before; and, secondly, to enable an action to be brought against a man who uses these threats unless he will or does follow up his threat by commencing an action himself. That is the keynote.

Now, bearing in mind the state of the law which preceded this enactment, let us look to see what it is. The observations which I have made throw a good deal of light on the word "otherwise," to which I will presently refer more at length. The object of this section is, I think, apparent when once you bear in mind what I have already pointed out, and it is this—you are not to threaten; you are not to do it even in a general kind of way which might not be regarded as a threat to any particular person; you are not to do it even by a circular or advertisement; but if you do threaten, no action is to lie against you if you will prosecute the person who is aimed at by your threats. That is the substance of it. Now I will read the section: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now, Mr. Bousfield has urged upon us, that, although the letters to which I have referred may be regarded as threats, they are not threats by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise, if you read "otherwise," as he says you ought, ejusdem generis with circulars or advertisements—that is to say, by some published notice or in some public way more or less like a circular or an advertisement. If you so read it, it strikes me you miss the substance of the section: that is to say, you allow a man to make all sorts of threats, provided he does not do it by circular or advertisement, or by some method like a circular or advertisement. The object of the section is to prevent threats, even, as I say, in a general way by circular or advertisement, which might, or might not, be construed or regarded as a threat. You are not to do it; but the proviso shows that if you do it, you are not liable if you bring an action. Is this the construction which has been put on this section before? It appears to me it is, and has been for some few years past. It was the construction put upon it in Driffield &c. Co. v. Waterloo Mills &c. Co., 34 W. R. 360, 31 Ch. D. 638, it was the construction put upon it in the Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. The Automatic Weighing Machine Co., 37 W. R. 636, 42 Ch. D. 665, and it was the construction put upon it in Barrett v. Day, 38 W. R. 362, 43 Ch. D. 435—all before three different judges; the first being the decision of Bacon, V.C., the second being the decision of Kekewich, J., and the third the decision of North, J.; and they have all adopted the view that a threat by a letter is sufficient, although you cannot call a mere letter something like an advertisement or a circular. My own opinion is that that construction is the correct one.

Then we are urged to say that a letter which is in answer to a question is privileged. It appears to me that the question of privilege is far away from the subject of this inquiry. There is nothing about privilege in it either at common law or under the statute as I understand, but certainly not under the statute. There is nothing in the language of section 32 which invites or allows the consideration of such a question as privilege. I think, therefore, the decision of North, J., in this case was right. As to those letters being threats, there is no doubt about it. The only doubt is whether they are threats within the true meaning of the word "otherwise." I have come to that conclusion, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The inquiry perhaps is not too far to embark upon as to what was the state of the law before the statute, and then we shall see what the statute meant. At common law there was a cause of action whenever one person did damage to another wilfully and intentionally, and without just cause or excuse. Under the head of that class of action came the actions of slander of title, whether the subject of the slander was real or personal property If a man falsely and maliciously—because the malice would show there was no just cause—made a statement about the property of another, which was calculated to do, and which did do, damage to the other in the management of that property, an action would lie at common law and the damages would be recoverable; and at chancery I suppose that even if you could not prove actual damage incurred, the court might, if actual damage was likely to occur, prevent the wrongful act by injunction. The cases on the chancery side and on the common law side which occurred before the Act, and which make it clear what the state of the law was, are Halsey v. Brotherhood on the chancery side and Wren v. Wield on the common law side. Although in each of those cases an action was held not to lie, the law is laid down in an unmistakable manner. Nor does it require elaboration to show that if I make a misstatement falsely and maliciously about the property of another, which does him damage, the common law would take cognizance of such an action. Then comes the statute. It is to be observed that in order to make good such a cause of action at common law, or in order to make good such an application to the court for an interference by the court on the equity side, you must show the statement was false and malicious—a wilful act done without just cause or excuse; and if a person, in the maintenance of what he conceived to be his rights, put forward a statement without knowing it to be false, but believing it to be true, even if the statement did damage to another person, an action would not lie, and the court of equity would not interfere. Why? Not because this is a right which belongs to the law of libel, but because it belongs to the general class which I have described; and the effect is the same, that if there was an occasion upon which a person was acting upon his rights in putting forward his own case the law would not interfere; and that the result of that would be, as is obvious, that a threat about an infringement, or an alleged infringement, could not be made the subject of an action or a suit unless you were prepared to show it was malâ fide; that there was no reasonable excuse for it. But it is to be observed that that threw the onus on those who instituted such an action, and made the remedy in a case of assertion of patent right, the effect of which was to paralyze the trade of others, almost nugatory; because it would be extremely difficult to prove that the persons put forward these assertions maliciously, or without just cause or excuse, to interfere with the proceedings of another; and apparently the Legislature was of opinion that there was a mischief which was not touched by the common law, and which it could cure, and we must see by the section itself what the mischief was and how far the section has cured it.

In the first place it seems to me that the whole argument of Mr. Bousfield and Mr. Terrell depends upon their convincing us that this particular threat is not a threat within the meaning of section 32, "by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise." They say first of all that this is not a threat, because it is addressed in answer to a letter with regard to one threat; and, secondly, the other threat is a threat addressed to the particular person who is supposed to infringe the patent. But using the language in its ordinary sense it is difficult to see that this intimation ceases to be a threat, because it is addressed to a third person in answer to an inquiry, or because it is addressed to the person himself. We are not dealing with libel or with any question of publication. We are dealing with threats. If I threaten a man that I will bring an action against him, I threaten him more or less, because I address that intimation to himself; and I threaten him none the less because I address the intimation to a third person. Mr. Bousfield's argument, as it seems to me with his usual quickness and perception to be understood, depends on his being able to convince us that this is not a threat by circular, advertisement, or otherwise. The word "otherwise," he says, ought to be cut down and considered according to the rule which is shortly described as the rule of ejusdem generis, that it follows upon "circular or advertisement," and that you must construe "otherwise" in such a sense as to confine it to the class, or at least to the genus, of the circulars or advertisements. There is no doubt of the existence of the rule ejusdem generis; it cannot be denied that the general words ought to be construed with reference to the words which immediately are around them. But there is an exception to that rule, if it be a rule, and not a maxim of common sense, which is, that although the words immediately around and before the general words are words which are primâ facie confined to a class, if you can see, from a wider inspection of the scope of the Legislature, that the general words, notwithstanding that they follow particular words, are nevertheless to be construed generally, you must give effect to the intention of the Legislature as gathered from the entire section. And here the question is whether the entire section, when you have regard to the special subject-matter as it is applied, does not lead you to the view that the larger meaning must be put upon the words "or otherwise," and that they are rather extended by the words which precede them than they are themselves confined by them. What is the subject-matter, in the first place, of this section? It is a threat about a patent action. Now every person of common sense knows what is involved in patent actions, and what the expense of them is; and everybody knows that to be threatened with a patent action is about as disagreeable a thing as can happen to a man of business; and the thing most calculated to paralyze a man in his business, even if he be innocent of any infringement of patent law.

To say that the threat, which the Legislature intends to stop, is only such a threat as is directed generally to the public by circulars and advertisements, would be to make the protection incommensurate with the evil, because a man might be addressing a threat at a particular moment to a purchaser, and might do as an irretrievable damage to the manufacturer, whose manufacture was about to be purchased, as if he had put his threat in the Times newspaper. Take the language of the section, and see if the scope of the section does not run in the same direction. First of all, an injunction may be obtained against a continuance of such threats—language which seems to indicate that it is a hanging over the head, of the threat, which the Legislature intends to put an end to. When we come to the last paragraph, which says, "Provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent," the whole meaning, it seems to me, of the section leaps into light. The Legislature desires that threats on patent actions shall not hang over a man's head, that the sword of Damocles in such a case should either not be suspended or should fall at once; and it is with that view that the section seems to be framed. If you read the section in that light, it seems to me that the words "or otherwise" cannot be construed in the narrow way in which Mr. Bousfield desires them to be construed, so that the Act of Parliament should make a remedy not commensurate with an obvious mischief; and although I agree that you should not find out the mischief in order to extend the remedy, yet, if the mischief is obvious, and apt words are to be found in the section, nothing is plainer than that you ought to expound an Act of Parliament so as to deal with the whole mischief which is disclosed.

What is the explanation of the addition of the words "circulars or advertisements"? I think it is rather to enlarge the words "or otherwise" than to cut them down. It might well be doubted whether a threat, which was not addressed to a particular person, or was not addressed to a particular customer, could be said to be a threat if it was couched in the general form of an advertisement issued to the world, or a circular issued to the trade. It might be said, It is not a threat at all—I am only informing you of the way in which I intend to do my business. The statute says circulars and advertisements, nevertheless, may contain threats, and uses these words so as to sweep into its net every kind of threat, the result of which would be that a man would be paralyzed in his trade by having an action on a patent suspended before his eyes, and an action without the opportunity given to him to determine the suspense at once, and to bring the question which is raised by his antagonist to a speedy and immediate issue. On these grounds it seems to me that the decisions of Bacon, V.C., and Kekewich, J., are right in the cases which my learned brother has cited, and North, J., in following them in the case of Barrett v. Day was really doing what was just.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have only to add a few words as to what my view is of the short reading of this section, because it is upon that section 32 that the whole of this case turns. Having heard the able arguments which have been addressed to us, I have arrived at this conclusion, that it is an absolute prohibition against a person threatening, unless the threatener can get himself within either of the two saving clauses at the end of the section. I will say this, that my reading of the section is that you shall not threaten legal proceedings unless the manufacture to which the threat applies infringes the legal right of the threatener, and unless the threatener is about to forthwith bring an action to show the validity of his threats. If he cannot bring himself within those two, what I call, saving clauses at the end of that section, then the section absolutely forbids a man threatening legal proceedings with regard to a patent action at all; and, in my opinion, it is nihil ad rem to say that what he did was bonâ fide, or that what he did was on a privileged occasion, because the section says you shall not threaten unless you come within those two provisoes at the end.

Then we were pressed very much with the words "circulars, advertisements, or otherwise," and I think Mr. Bousfield's argument was taking, and it looked to me at first as if the words "or otherwise" were confined to circulars or advertisements. But when once you come to the conclusion that this is an absolute prohibition against threatening legal proceedings at all unless the man comes within the two provisoes, I entirely agree with what has been said by my brothers who have preceded me, that, instead of "otherwise" being a word which should be cut down to "circulars or advertisements," it is a word which should be enlarged, so as to increase the means by which a threat can be made. With what was said by Bowen, L.J , I entirely agree. If they had not had in this section circulars or advertisements, a threat to a third person by a letter might have been argued not to have been a threat within the section. In my judgment North, J., is right, and Kekewich, J., was right, and Bacon, V.C., was right, and I agree that this appeal ought to be dismissed

Chan. Div. North, J. — Nov. 19.

ROBERTS v. BOOTH. (a.)

Practice—Dismissal of action for want of prosecution—Counter-claim—Default of reply thereto—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 21, r. 16; ord. 23, r. 4; ord. 27, r. 11.

The defendant to an action delivered a counter-claim. The action was dismissed for want of prosecution, the plaintiff having failed to deliver a reply.

Held, that, under ord. 27, r. 11, the defendant was entitled to set down the action on motion for judgment on his counter-claim.

Short cause.

This action was commenced on the 24th of November, 1891. By his statement of claim, delivered on the 27th of May, 1892, the plaintiff alleged the existence of a partnership between himself and the defendant, and claimed a partnership account, payment of sums due, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from acts therein complained of.

The defendant delivered a defence and counter-claim on the 21st of June, 1892. By his defence he alleged that the partnership was dissolved about the 7th of October, 1892, and that under an agreement of that date he had employed the plaintiff at a weekly salary subject to a week's notice on either side, and that at the dissolution of the partnership nothing was due to the plaintiff from him or the firm. The plaintiff left the service of the defendant on the 21st of September, 1891. By his counter-claim the defendant alleged that the plaintiff, whilst in his employment under the agreement of the 7th of October, received debts due to the defendant amounting to £66 4s. 10d., and converted the money to his own use, and claimed payment of the said sum, and costs.

The plaintiff having delivered no reply, an order was made in chambers on the 9th of November, 1892, dismissing the action for want of prosecution in default of a reply being delivered within seven days. No reply was delivered.

The defendant now moved for judgment for the relief claimed by his counter-claim.

P. F. Wheeler, for the defendant.—Under ord. 21, r. 16, where a defendant sets up a counter-claim, and the action is dismissed, the counter-claim may be proceeded with. Under ord. 23, r. 4, where a counter-claim is pleaded, a reply thereto shall be subject to the rules applicable to statements of defence. Under ord. 27, r. 11, if a defendant makes default in delivering a defence the plaintiff may set down the action on motion for judgment. If, therefore, the plaintiff makes default in delivering a reply, the defendant may set down the counter-claim on motion for judgment: Jones v. Macaulay, 39 W. R. 211, [1891] 1 Q. B. 221.

The plaintiff did not appear.

NORTH, J.—I think that is the right construction of the rules. But there is nothing to show that the debt, or some part of it, has not been paid since the delivery of the counter-claim. On production to the registrar of an affidavit by the defendant that the plaintiff has not, since the delivery of the counter-claim, paid any part of the sum therein claimed, and of an affidavit of service of the notice of motion on the plaintiff, there must be judgment for the defend-

LAWSON v. MASTER.
CIRENCESTER ELECTION PETITION. (a.)

Election law—Parliament—Practice—Election petition—Trial of—Change of venue—Scrutiny—"Special circumstances"—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 11, sub-section 11.

The existence of "special circumstances" is, under section 11, sub-section 11, of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, a condition precedent to the exercise by the court of the jurisdiction, under that sub-section, to order that an election petition shall be tried elsewhere than in the county or division where the election took place.

Where, therefore, an application was made to change the venue of an election petition, upon the grounds that the petition was limited to a scrutiny of certain ballot papers, involving the examination of a very small number of witnesses; that it would materially lessen the expense of the trial; and would otherwise be for the general convenience of the parties, who both concurred in the application,

Held, that the above circumstances did not amount to "special circumstances" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that the court had, therefore, no power to make the order.

By section 11, sub-section 11, of the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), it is provided that the trial of an election petition in the case of a petition relating to a county election shall take place in the county, "provided always that if it shall appear to the court that special circumstances exist which render it desirable that the petition should be tried elsewhere than in the county, it shall be lawful for the court to appoint such other place for the trial as shall appear most convenient."

By section 9, sub-section 1, of the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c 23), counties returning more than one member are to be divided into the same number of divisions as the number of members. By sub-section 3 of the same section "the law relating to Parliamentary elections shall apply to each division as if it were a separate county."

A petition presented against the respondent, the sitting member for the Cirencester Division of the county of Gloucester, alleged corrupt and illegal practices, and also involved a scrutiny of ballot papers. The charges of corrupt and illegal practices were subsequently withdrawn, and the petition was then confined to the scrutiny, in which the matters to be dealt with were the case of one tendered vote, as to which it was stated that not more than six or seven witnesses would have to be called, and the examination of forty-two ballot papers on the one side and twenty on the other, which at a recount of the votes had been reserved for the opinion of the court.

An application, in which both parties concurred, was now made to the court to order the petition to be tried in London.

A. T. Lawrence, for the petitioner.—Where there are charges of corrupt and illegal practices, the policy of the Act, no doubt, is to provide that the petition shall be heard in the place affected. But where the petition is reduced to a scrutiny, the reason no longer exists, and that fact amounts to such "special circumstances" as will enable the court to consider the convenience of the parties, and change the venue of the petition to London. [CAVE, J.—It is important that in a scrutiny people should see how the ballot papers can be looked at, and not that those who are affected should hear that it is done at a distance.] The division is a large one, and the court has already made an order in this case changing the venue from Cirencester to Gloucester; and in the Thornbury Election Petition the validity of certain ballot papers were reserved by the judges for the opinion of the court in London. [CAVE, J., referred to Collins v. Price, 5 C. P. D. 544, 29 W. R. Dig. 82.]

Coward, for the respondent, concurred in the application.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It appears to me that this application must be refused. This statute is very important, and it does not become any court to attempt to evade it. One great end aimed at by the Act is to secure, when it is reasonably possible, that the trial shall take place where the petition arises, and the court has no right to order the trial elsewhere, unless in the opinion of the court "special circumstances" render it desirable. Then, and then only, does the Act use the word "convenient."

When "special circumstances" do exist, then the court may order the petition to be tried where it thinks would be most convenient. But the existence of special circumstances is a condition precedent, and I cannot see anything in the facts or arguments urged here which show that such special circumstances exist in this case.

It is said that the fact that the petition has resolved itself into a scrutiny of ballot papers is sufficient of itself to show special circumstances. But I cannot think that that fact is sufficient, or that it should be the meaning of the statute; it may be a most important reason why the trial should be in the place affected. Indeed, that state of things might well occur in fully half the petitions presented. It does not, therefore, appear to me that that is a sufficient "special circumstance" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, or one of the conditions precedent contemplated by the Act to the removal of the trial.

The mere question of expense cannot, I think, affect us, for the Act might have said that the trial should take place wherever the court thought would be least expensive. The policy of the Act is to have a local administration of it. Now I have said that there are no "special circumstances" in this case to warrant our ordering the venue to be changed; but I can conceive that when there exists the overpowering influence of one man, strong and excited party feeling on one side or the other, or both, or possible riots, those things may well be "special circumstances." But I think they must be "special circumstances" such as render it, not only more convenient that the place of trial should be changed, but more conducive to the ends of justice. And I think, therefore, that it would be dangerous to allow mere questions of convenience to form the basis of the decision of the court in such cases.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have been very glad if I could have seen my way to meet the convenience of the parties in this application. It seems, however, impossible in the face of the words of the Act of Parliament; the mere fact that it is less expensive or otherwise more convenient to the parties to remove the trial of the petition out of the county is not, in my opinion, sufficient to enable us to make such an order. I entirely agree with my lord's interpretation of the Act, and this application must therefore be dismissed, but as the parties concurred in the application without costs.

WATTEAU v. FENWICK. (a.)

Principal and agent—Undisclosed principal—Liability for contracts of agent—Secret limitation of agent's authority—Credit given to agent alone.

The ordinary rule of law that a principal is liable for the acts of his agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding secret limitations upon that authority, applies also where the existence of any principal was unknown to the person contracting with, and giving credit to, the agent alone.

W. supplied goods to an agent H., on H.'s sole credit, in ignorance that H. had principals. F. & Co., who were in fact H.'s principals, had allowed H. to appear as ostensible principal while managing their business, with secret instructions not to buy goods. H. failing to pay, W. sued F. & Co. for the price of goods supplied, which were such as were ordinarily dealt in and supplied to such a business.

Held, that F. & Co. were liable.

Appeal from a decision of the deputy county court judge at Middlesbrough.

The action was for goods supplied to a beerhouse, the "Victoria," at Middlesbrough. A man named Humble, who had occupied the house previous to 1888, in that year assigned the house to a firm of brewers in the same town, Messrs. Fenwick & Co., the defendants in the action.

Humble, however, remained as manager, his name being continued over the door, and the licence retained in his name. He was also the occupier of another house at a place called Crook.

The plaintiff supplied Humble at the "Victoria" with cigars, corks, and bovril to the extent of £25, and, being unable to obtain payment from him, sued the defendants.

It was admitted that the plaintiff had given credit to Humble alone, and that Humble had never disclosed his principals. He had, moreover, paid sums on account to the plaintiff, and it was also proved that some of the cigars had been taken possession of by the defendants, on Humble leaving his position, and had been sold to the incoming tenant.

It was also proved by the defendants that Humble had no authority to order any goods with the exception of mineral waters, it being stipulated that all others should be supplied by their firm.

The learned county court judge held that the defendants had held out Humble to the world as an agent having a general authority, and that they were, therefore, liable in respect of the claim as to the cigars and bovril, which came within his implied authority as manager, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for £22.

The defendants appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Scott Fox, for the appellants.—Where a person is known to be in the position of manager only, his principal would be liable, and the same result would follow if the goods were supplied to him on the credit of his principal behind. Where, however, credit is given alone to the person supplied, actual agency in fact must be proved, and the plaintiff could only recover against the defendants for such goods as he had actual authority to buy, and here Humble had no authority to buy bovril and cigars. This is not a case, moreover, of "holding out," inasmuch as the plaintiff knew nothing of the principals, and that doctrine, which rests upon the agent's being clothed with apparent authority, does not apply where credit is given alone to a person alone.

Houghton, for the respondents.—Where the principals clothe a person with apparent authority to do such things as are reasonably necessary to carry on a business, they are liable: Edmunds v. Bushell & Jones, L. R. 1 Q. B. 97. [WILLS, J.—That case applies if there was a "holding out" of Humble by the defendants.] But the principle is not confined to cases where the principal vouches the agent as having authority; it applies also where he invests him with apparent ownership of the business as ostensible principal. If he does that, he clothes him with every authority incidental to the business. It is true that credit was specifically given to Humble, but the defendants, by their conduct in putting Humble in a position to obtain credit which he might not otherwise have got, rendered themselves liable. No tradesman who knew of the principal would give credit to the agent alone under ordinary circumstances.

He cited also Yorkshire Banking Co. v. Beatson & Mycock, 28 W. R. 879, 5 C. P. D. 109; Stracey, Ross and Others v. Deey, in note to George v. Clagett, 7 T. R. at p. 361; Ramazotti v. Bowring, 8 W. R. 114, 7 C. B. N. S. 851.

Finlay, Q.C., in reply.—Humble was put by the defendants in the position of "principal" in this business, and he had no general authority to order goods on their credit unless he was held out as an "agent": Summers v. Solomon, 5 W. R. 660, 7 E. & B. 879. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—If you put a person in a position in which he would ordinarily have authority to order goods, surely you are liable?] Yes, but he was not put forward as having authority to buy goods for anyone but himself, and had in fact instructions not to order goods such as those in question.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., read, and stated that he entirely concurred in, the written judgment of Wills, J.: The plaintiff sues the defendant for the price of cigars supplied to the Victoria Hotel, Stockton-on-Tees. The shop was kept, not by the defendant, but by a person named Humble. This person's name was over the door of the shop. The plaintiff gave credit to him, and to him alone, and had never heard of the defendant. The business, however, was really the defendant's, and he had put Humble into it to manage it for him, and had forbidden him to buy cigars on credit. The cigars, however, were such as would usually be supplied to, and dealt in at, such an establishment. The learned county court judge held that the defendant was liable. I am of opinion that he was right.

There seems to be less of direct authority on the subject than one would expect. But I think the Lord Chief Justice during the argument laid down the correct principle—viz., once it is established that the defendant was the real principal, the ordinary doctrine as to principal and agent applies—that the principal is liable for all the acts of the agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding limitations, as between the principal and the agent, put upon that authority. It is said that it is only so where there has been a holding out of authority—which cannot be said of a case where the person supplying the goods knew nothing of the existence of a principal. But I do not think so. Otherwise in every case of undisclosed principal, or at least in every case where the fact of there being a principal was undisclosed, the secret limitation of authority would prevail and defeat the action of the person dealing with the agent and then discovering that he was an agent and had a principal.

But in the case of a dormant partner it is clear law that no limitation of authority as between the dormant and active partner will avail the dormant partner as to things within the ordinary authority of a partner. The law of partnership is, on such a question, nothing but a branch of the general law of principal and agent, and it appears to me to be undisputed and conclusive on the point now under discussion.

The principle laid down by the Lord Chief Justice, and acted upon by the learned county court judge, appears to be identical with that enunciated in the judgments of Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., in Edmunds v. Bushell, the circumstances of which case, though not identical with those of the present case, come very near to them. There was no question of holding out, as the plaintiff knew nothing of the defendant. I appreciate the distinction drawn by Mr. Finlay in his argument, but the principle laid down by the judgments referred to, if correct, abundantly covers the present case. I cannot find that any doubt has ever been expressed that it is correct; and I think it is right, and that very mischievous consequences would often result if that principle were not applied.

In my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

ROBERTSON & EASON (Appellants) v. JOHNSON (Respondent). (a.)

Fisheries—Oysters—Sale during close season—Exemption of oysters "taken within the waters of some foreign State"—Oysters taken in French waters and relaid in English waters—Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 42), s. 4.

Oysters imported alive from foreign oyster-beds and relaid for purposes of storage in English waters, although remaining in the English waters for several months, are oysters "taken within the waters of a foreign State" within the proviso to section 4 of the Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877, and a person who has relaid them from the English waters and sold them during the close season cannot be convicted of an offence under that section.

Special case stated by an alderman of the City of London, who had convicted the appellants upon an information charging that they did on the 4th of July, 1892, sell a hundred oysters contrary to the Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877.

Section 4 of that Act provides as follows:—"A person shall not sell, expose for sale, consign for sale, or buy for sale—(1) any oysters known at the passing of this Act in the oyster trade as 'deep sea oysters' between the 15th day of June in any year and the following 4th day of August; or (2) any description of oysters other than those aforesaid between the 14th day of May in any year and the following 4th day of August." The section provides for a penalty for offences against its provisions, and proceeds: "Provided that a person shall not be guilty of an offence within this section if he satisfies the court that the oysters alleged to have been sold, &c., (1) were taken within the waters of some foreign State."

The following facts were stated in the special case:—

On the 4th of July, 1892, during the period of close time provided by the Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877, the appellant Eason, who was an assistant to the appellant Robertson, sold at his shop in the City of London, and with his approval, 100 oysters for the sum of seven shillings to an officer of the Fishmongers Co.

The said 100 oysters so sold by the appellants were opened, and one of them was dead, nine were spawning, fifty-seven had just spawned, and the remaining thirty-three were in fair condition.

The oysters so sold were not deep-sea oysters, but had been brought over from France in February or March and deposited on a muddy bottom some fathoms deep at Stangate Creek, in the River Medway.

They were laid in a part of the beds in Stangate Creek which was entirely empty of oysters, and in which no oysters but matured French oysters were placed, and they were dredged up by the appellant Robertson's servants as they were required for the market.

They were brought over in a mature state and practically fully grown, and if used at the time they were imported would have been fit for food. It is the practice in the oyster trade to import French oysters before the hot weather begins, and to relay them in English waters in the manner aforesaid.

Their nurture at Stangate Creek was derived from the water and natural causes, and was not effected artificially. French oysters relaid in the waters at Stangate Creek both grow larger and "spat" or spawn, but such spat or spawn is unproductive, and mature oysters cannot be reared from the spat of imported French oysters.

At Stangate Creek no cultivation of the spawn of French oysters takes place and there is no recognized oyster bed or bank there.

It was contended before the alderman by counsel on behalf of the appellants that they had committed no offence against the statute in question, as the oysters came within the first proviso of the said 4th section, viz., that they were "taken within the waters of some foreign State," to wit, the Republic of France. That the meaning of those words was that the oysters might be dredged and taken within the waters of some State outside the jurisdiction of the said Act, and that the oysters not allowed to be sold in close time were English oysters taken within the jurisdiction of the said statute; that these oysters were originally "taken" in French waters and were merely relaid in

(a) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

English waters at Stangate Creek, such waters being used merely as a warehouse for storing the oysters which could only be kept in water. That oysters could not be imported in the summer time direct from the foreign State because they would die; they were, therefore, imported in cold weather and put in the beds at Stangate Creek to keep for sale during the close time for English grown oysters, and that such re-laying for the purpose of storage was not a bedding of the oyster for the purpose of reproduction. That the statute was passed to provide a close time for English oysters and to prevent English oyster beds from becoming impoverished, and that the words "taken within" in section 4, referred to the original act of dredging from the oyster bed wherein the oysters had been cultivated and had grown from spat to maturity.

The appellants by their counsel referred to the case of Guyer v. Reg., 37 W. R. 586, 23 Q. B. D. 100.

The report of the select committee of the House of Commons upon the Oyster Fisheries, and the evidence taken before them, upon which it was alleged the Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877, was based, were referred to in the argument by both parties.

The alderman was of opinion that the case of Guyer v. Reg., above quoted, was not in point, the game having been killed in the country from whence it was brought and sold in this country in the same condition as it left the foreign State; that the oysters relaid in beds as described were alive when brought into this country, and that while lying in English waters for four months or thereabouts they materially changed in their condition, and could not be treated as the same oysters as if they had been sold within a reasonable period of their being brought from foreign waters, and without the opportunity of such change taking place; and that the appellants had not satisfied him that the said 100 oysters so sold, as aforesaid were, within the meaning of the statute, "taken within the waters of some foreign State."

He was also of opinion that the oysters, having been relaid in English waters, had so changed their condition as to render them to a large extent not suitable for human food, as nine were spawning, fifty-seven had spawned, and thirty-three only were in fair condition.

Finally, he was of opinion that the statute was passed, not only to provide a close time for English oysters, but to prevent oysters being consumed at a period when they were not in an edible condition, and that the words, "taken within the waters of some foreign State," meant taken for the purpose of as early consumption as the time of transit and sale would permit, and he therefore convicted the appellants.

The question for the court was whether the alderman's determination was correct.

Finlay, Q.C., and Charles Matthews, for the appellants.

Poland, Q.C., and F. Humphreys, for the respondent.

The arguments of both parties were similar to those used before the alderman and stated above.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 11.—POLLOCK, B.—This is an appeal from a conviction by one of the aldermen of the City of London upon an information charging that the appellants did unlawfully sell a hundred oysters contrary to the statute. [His lordship then read section 4 of the Fisheries (Oyster, Crab, and Lobster) Act, 1877, and referred to the findings of the magistrate as stated in the case, and continued:—] He then goes on further to find that the oysters, after having been relaid in English waters, had so changed their condition that they were to a great extent unsuitable for human food. Now, as to that finding, I think it is immaterial to the question raised by this case. But I think also that the magistrate was influenced in coming to a decision by that finding. This Act has no reference to the question of fitness or unfitness for human food, and there are other Acts which deal with that point. The case also refers us to the report of the committee of the House of Commons upon Oyster Fisheries. That report does not, of course, assist us to construe the words of the Act, but it is important as giving us a history of the trade of importing foreign oysters, and as showing that for some years before this Act was passed there was a very large trade of that kind. The statute deals with fisheries. It is an Act "to amend the law relating to the fisheries of oysters, crabs, and lobsters, and other sea fisheries," and its intention is to preserve them in the fishing grounds around the coast of this country. I am clearly of opinion that the oysters in this case come within the proviso in section 4, and were "taken" within the waters of a foreign State. A somewhat similar case was dealt with in Guyer v. Reg., in which it was held that the Game Act, 1831, which prohibits a licensed dealer in game from having game in his shop during the close season did not apply to birds killed abroad. Hawkins, J., in his judgment in that case says (at p. 107): "It might well be contended that a partridge which never was alive in England, but was bred and killed in Russia, cannot be truly said ever to have been an English bird of game within the contemplation of an Act of Parliament which, so far as regards the killing or taking of game birds out of season, could only refer to birds killed or taken on English ground, and as regards the traffic in game out of the prescribed season must be intended to refer to such birds only as are protected by the close season."

It seems to me that the same argument applies to the oysters in this case, and the question for us is, as I have said, whether they were "taken" within the waters of a foreign State or whether they were "taken" when they were removed from Stangate Creek. If they had been very small oysters and had been placed in Stangate Creek in order that they might be nurtured there, they might come within the second category. But if they had been brought from abroad and kept in a tub for a short time, it is clear that this Act would not apply, and I do not think that it applies where the oysters have merely been placed in such a place as Stangate Creek for a short time for purposes of storage. It seems to me to be all a question of degree. I am, therefore, of opinion that the conviction in this case ought to be quashed.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The intention of the Legislature in passing this Act was to create a close time during which oysters should not be taken from English fisheries, and it was not dealing—as, indeed, it has no power to deal—with the question of taking oysters within the waters of foreign States. The sole question which we have to decide is whether these oysters were taken within the waters of a foreign State within the meaning of the proviso in section 4 of the Act of 1877. After carefully considering this question, I have come to the conclusion that these oysters cannot be considered as being taken in an English fishery, but that they are for all intents and purposes French oysters. It is clear that the Legislature contemplated oysters being brought over alive to this country, and there is nothing to prevent a person receiving them and selling them at once. If they may be brought alive into this country, it is clear that they may be stored in a tank or other confined place until they are wanted for use. If taken from such a receptacle they clearly could not be said to have been taken from an English fishery. In the case before us, the oysters were brought from France and placed in Stangate Creek, where there were no other oysters; the place where they were put was marked off from the rest of the ground, they were not put there for breeding purposes, and, although Stangate Creek covers a considerable number of acres of ground, I see no reason why oysters should not be stored there as they might be in a smaller space. It seems to me to be rather a question of fact whether they were placed there merely for the purpose of storage. That was so here. They, therefore, never assumed any other character than that of French oysters, and I cannot see that any penalty attaches. I agree that if they were brought over when they were very small and were then placed on a bed and nurtured with English oysters there, that would be making them English oysters, and would be within the mischief that the Act intended to deal with, but if (and I have no reason to suppose the contrary) they were only placed there in the way described by the magistrate, I cannot bring myself to think that the Legislature contemplated dealing with such a case. I therefore agree with Pollock, B., that this conviction must be quashed. It is quite immaterial for the purposes of the present case that when they were sold some of them were unfit for human food.

Conviction quashed.

BANKS v. HOLLINGSWORTH. (a.)

Mayor's Court—Removal of action—Certiorari—Discretion of judge—Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 86), schedule, clause 12.

By clause 12 in the schedule to the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, which has been applied by Order in Council to the Mayor's Court, "No action entered in the court shall before judgment be removed or removable from the court into any superior court by any writ or process, except by leave of a judge of one of the superior courts in cases which shall appear to such judge fit to be tried in one of the superior courts."

Held, that the question whether an action was fit to be tried in the superior court was a matter of opinion for the judge, and that he had a discretion in all cases as to whether an action should be removed into the superior court.

Per Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.—The words "fit to be tried" meant "ought to be tried" in the superior court.

Appeal from an order of Mathew, J., in chambers, affirming an order of the master, refusing to grant a writ of certiorari to remove the action from the Mayor's Court, London, into the High Court.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., and Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barristers-at-Law.

The action was brought in the Mayor's Court to recover £35 from the defendant, a stock and share dealer, the declaration alleging that the defendant induced the plaintiff to deposit with him £35 by the false and fraudulent representation that he had opened a syndicate for operating in certain stocks and shares. It appeared that the defendant issued a circular to the public inviting them to subscribe to the syndicate, and that the plaintiff thereupon paid £35 to the defendant. There were two other similar actions brought in the Mayor's Court against the defendant in respect of the same circular by different plaintiffs, one for £55 and the other for £10, and the former of the two actions had been already removed into the High Court. The defendant in his affidavit stated that many others of his customers had subscribed for shares in the syndicate in the same way as the plaintiff, and that if the plaintiff succeeded in the action many other claims would be made against him, and that the action, being founded on fraud, was of such a nature and so important to him as to be fit and proper to be tried in the High Court.

35 & 36 Vict. c. 86, schedule, clause 12 (which by an Order in Council dated the 26th of June, 1873, is made applicable to the Mayor's Court): "No action entered in the court shall before judgment be removed or removable from the court into any superior court by any writ or process, except by leave of a judge of one of the superior courts in cases which shall appear to such judge fit to be tried in one of the superior courts, and upon such terms as to payment of costs, security for debt and costs, or such other terms as such judge shall think fit."

Cock, Q.C., and E. Morten, for the defendant.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Glyn, for the plaintiff.

POLLOCK, B.—This is a case in which no doubt the discretion of the learned judge, and of the court upon appeal, must be exercised with caution. For myself I am not inclined to disturb the discretion exercised by my brother Mathew. It is quite clear that the Legislature has made a distinction between cases in which the amount claimed is under £50 and those in which the amount claimed is over £50. That being so, the parties are brought within section 16 of the Mayor's Court Act, except in so far as that section is varied by clause 12 in the schedule to the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, and that clause is material only as removing the words in section 19, "after plea pleaded."

It stands upon the merits, therefore, that this case cannot be removed unless the judge certifies or finds that it is fit to be tried in one of the superior courts; but that does not, to my mind, limit the discretion of the judge to the small point to which it is reduced by Mr. Cock: that the judge is to say that this case is fit to be tried in a superior court because such cases are tried in a superior court. That does not seem to me to be the meaning of the Legislature in cases in which the claim is under £50. I quite agree that it is a very serious thing for a defendant to be charged with fraud: but that in itself cannot be the test, and the only test, whether a case is fit to be removed, because there are a great many cases in which, the amount being small, there may be charges of fraud on one side or the other. That, therefore, cannot of itself be a ground of removal.

But then it is said that the defendant here carries on a special business, and that, if the plaintiff wins, other actions of the same kind will immediately be brought against him, and therefore it is a case which ought to be tried in a superior court, because the defendant has a larger interest in it than the plaintiff. That is not a ground, I think, upon which we ought to act in a case of this kind, where the plaintiff is entitled to rest upon his particular contract with the defendant, which he says he was induced to enter into by some fraudulent statement on the part of the defendant. This seems to me to be a case which can be properly, and would be properly, tried by a judge and jury in the Mayor's Court; and there are other questions, such as questions of delay and expense, which we ought to consider, and I think my brother Mathew was right in saying that this is not a case which, in his discretion, ought to be removed. It seems to me that this appeal must be dismissed.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 16th section of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857, is applicable to cases where the amount sought to be recovered shall not exceed £50. Under that section there was a power undoubtedly to a defendant before judgment to remove such a case, either in pursuance of a judge's order, or else after giving security; but taking that section by itself, there was a proviso that any judge of the superior courts might, in the exercise of his discretion, order a writ of certiorari to issue to remove any such cause without any such recognizance as aforesaid. Now, however, the defendant has lost the power which he formerly had under section 16, for clause 12 in the schedule to the Act of 1872, which has been referred to, applies to the Mayor's Court, and under that clause no action whatever is to be removed before judgment by any writ or process, except by leave of a judge of the superior courts in cases which shall appear to such judge fit to be tried in one of the superior courts. Therefore, we have to consider this question under the 16th section of the Mayor's Court Act and the 12th clause of the later Act, and it is argued that the mere fact that the action is one for fraudulent representation, and that other actions of a similar character are being brought, or are apprehended, is enough to induce us to say in our discretion that a writ of certiorari must issue, although the damages claimed do not exceed £50. I have read the cases of Cherry v. Endean, 34 W. R. 458, and Simpson v. Shaw, 56 L. J. Q. B. 92, 35 W. R. Dig. 36, and it appears to me that the effect of these two cases falls far short of what is suggested on the part of the appellant here. It cannot be that simply because a case is one which can be tried, and often is tried, in the superior court, that a judge is bound to say under section 16 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857, and under clause 12 in the schedule of the Act of 1872, that, even although £50 is not claimed, it is fit to be tried in the superior court, in the sense which is necessary to induce him to issue the writ of certiorari. In this case I am not satisfied, in the exercise of my discretion, that this is a case in which a writ of certiorari ought to issue. The defendant's affidavit undoubtedly shows that the case is one of great importance to him, but the plaintiff's affidavit—contradicted, it is true, by the defendant's—indicates reasons why the trial should take place at once, and these reasons were satisfactory to my brother Mathew in chambers. I cannot see my way to saying that he exercised his discretion wrongly, a discretion which, as I repeat, appears to be absolutely unlimited in cases under section 16 of the Mayor's Court Act, 1857, although that section must now be read conjointly with clause 12 in the Act of 1872.

The defendant appealed.

E. Morten (Cock, Q.C., with him), for the defendant.—If the action is fit to be tried in the High Court it is a matter of right to have it removed. Formerly by section 16 of the Mayor's Court Procedure Act, 1857, the defendant had a right, upon fulfilling certain conditions, to have an action under £50 removed to the superior court. Now clause 12 of the schedule to the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, is applicable, and if the action is "fit to be tried" in the High Court, the defendant has a right to have it removed. This being an action of fraud, it is fit to be tried in the High Court, and must be removed: Simpson v. Shaw. [They also referred to Cherry v. Endean.] Secondly, the action ought to be removed as it charges fraud, and as one of the actions has been already removed the others ought to be removed also, with the view to their being consolidated.

R. T. Reid, Q.C. (Glyn with him), for the plaintiff.—Clause 12 gives a discretion to the judge. Leave of the judge must be obtained, and the action must "appear to the judge" fit to be tried in the High Court. The words "fit to be tried in the superior court" mean more fit under all the circumstances to be tried there than in the inferior court. The facts in this case are simple. The amount is small, and there is no difficult question of fact or law to be determined.

Morten replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff brought an action in the Mayor's Court in respect of an alleged fraudulent representation contained in a circular issued by the defendant, by which he was induced to pay the defendant £35. The defendant took out a summons at chambers to have the action removed into the High Court, and he argues that, as the action charges him with fraud, it is "fit to be tried" in the High Court, and, therefore, that he has a right to have it removed, or, if not, that at any rate it ought to be removed; and the reasons for removing it are enhanced by the fact that there are two other actions of fraud brought against him in the Mayor's Court by different plaintiffs arising out of the same circular, that the first of those actions has been already removed to the High Court, and that it is desirable that the other two should be also removed, so that the actions may be consolidated. Now the case really depends upon the true construction of clause 12 in the schedule to the Borough and Local Courts of Record Act, 1872, which has been applied by Order in Council to the Mayor's Court. That clause is in a negative form. It is said that by section 16 of the Mayor's Court Procedure Act, 1857, a defendant in a case like this would formerly have had a right to have the action removed upon fulfilling certain conditions. That may have been so. But it is obvious that clause 12 is a limitation upon a right which the defendant had before. By that clause a defendant cannot have his action removed unless it appears to a judge of the High Court fit to be tried in the High Court, and the judge gives leave. The clause does not say by leave of a judge in cases which are fit to be tried in the superior court, but in cases which shall appear to such judge fit to be so tried. That gives the judge power, after considering all the circumstances of the case, to make or refuse to make an order. What, then, is the meaning of the words "fit to be tried in one of the superior courts"? It cannot mean an action which the superior court is fit to try, as the superior court cannot be said to be unfit to try any action. It must mean an action which ought to be tried in the superior court.

The question, therefore, in each case must be whether, considering all the circumstances of the case and the interests of all parties, the action is one that ought to be tried in the superior court rather than in the inferior court in which it is brought. That being so, the judge must consider, among other things, the amount claimed; but, even if the amount is small, yet the judge may consider that the case is of a complex nature and requires the experience of a judge of the superior court to try it, and may on that ground make an order for its removal. There are many other circumstances which may affect the mind of the judge: for example, in which court will more speedy justice be done? I do not say that any one of these circumstances alone would induce the judge to remove the action. The judge must look at all the circumstances, and say whether the action ought to be tried in the superior court rather than in the inferior court. It is a matter within the discretion of the judge. I doubt whether he ought to take into consideration the fact that other plaintiffs have commenced other actions against the defendant in respect of a similar cause of action; but, at any rate, if he can do so, that is only one of the circumstances which the judge has to consider. The exercise of discretion by the judge will not be interfered with on appeal except where the court clearly sees that it has been wrongly exercised. In the present case the discretion has been rightly exercised, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—This is clearly not a case in which, if the judge had a discretion in the matter, we should interfere. The question depends upon clause 12 in the schedule to the Act of 1872. To ascertain whether the judge has a discretion one must sooner or later consider the words "fit to be tried in one of the superior courts." Is there anything in the context which affects those words? In the first place, no action is to be removed—thus taking away the right to have it removed—except by leave of the judge, and the condition precedent to the leave being granted is that the case must appear to the judge fit to be tried in the superior court. The words which immediately precede the words to be construed are applicable to language of discretion, and show that the question of fitness to be tried is a matter of opinion for the judge. If the matter is one of opinion, and not of law, it follows that the clause leaves the judge free to exercise his opinion as a matter of discretion. This being, therefore, a matter of discretion, we cannot interfere. I agree, however, with the Master of the Rolls that the discretion here has been reasonably exercised.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This case goes one step further than the decision in Cherry v. Endean. It is said that if the case is fit to be tried in the High Court the defendant has a right to have it removed. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that the words "fit to be tried" mean "ought to be tried," and this is a matter for the judge in the exercise of his discretion to determine.

Appeal dismissed.

Poor rate — Rateability — Sewage works — Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 135, 150.

The appellants were the owners of certain sewage works, consisting of deodorizing and outfall works, pumping engines and machinery, constructed under the Metropolis Management Act, 1885.

Held, that such works were, by section 135 of that Act, placed on the same footing as sewers, and therefore, on the authority of London County Council v. Churchwardens of West Ham, 40 W. R. 659, [1892] 2 Q. B. 44, the appellants were not liable to be assessed to the poor rate in respect of the sewage works.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by quarter sessions on an appeal against the decision of the assessment committee of the Woolwich Union, and a similar appeal against the decision of the assessment committee of the St. George's Union.

The two appeals were argued together.

In the Woolwich case the appellants were assessed, as owners and occupiers of certain works, buildings, and land known as the Northern Outfall deodorizing works, at £28,000 as the gross value and £23,000 as the rateable. The quarter sessions reduced the assessment to £20,567 as the gross value, and £17,139 as the rateable value, subject to the case.

The special case was as follows:—

1. The London County Council, the appellants, are the governing body of the administrative county of London and are by virtue of the provisions of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 41 the successors to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and are the present owners of the deodorizing and outfall works, machinery, land, and buildings, the subject-matter of this appeal. The appellants have to discharge all the duties of the Metropolitan Board of Works in reference to the drainage of the metropolis.

2. Pursuant to powers and duties contained in the various Acts passed for the better government and drainage of the metropolis known as the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855, 1858, and 1862, the Metropolitan Board of Works and the appellants designed and constructed a system of drainage and of treatment of sewage for the metropolitan area. Such system is hereinafter referred to as "the said metropolitan system." Under the said system the land in question was purchased by the said Metropolitan Board of Works, and the necessary works, buildings, and machinery have since been constructed thereon by the said Metropolitan Board of Works and by the appellants for the purpose of storing, deodorizing, and otherwise treating the sewage drained from the whole metropolitan area north of the Thames, which averages from 96 to 126 million gallons daily.

3. The said works, buildings, and machinery were specially designed and constructed for the work which they have to do in connection with and for the purpose of the said metropolitan system, of which they form an essential part.

4. The said works, buildings, and machinery were

and are suitable and necessary to enable the appellants to discharge their statutory duties under the said Acts and for the advantage of the inhabitants of the metropolis to treat and dispose of the sewage, and are held, occupied, and used by the appellants in the manner and solely for the purposes herein set forth, and the appellants are entitled to levy rates upon the whole metropolitan area, including the parish of Woolwich, to enable them to occupy and use the said land, works, buildings, and machinery as aforesaid. The sewage to be treated is brought to the said premises from places outside the parish of Woolwich, and by reason of the high level of the sewers bringing the same the drainage of the parish of Woolwich north of the Thames is not admitted into the said metropolitan system.

5. The appellants do not derive any pecuniary profit from the said hereditaments, and the works are maintained by the appellants under the provisions of the above-mentioned Acts.

6. By the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 150, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104, s. 3, and the Acts amending the same, the Metropolitan Board of Works were, and the appellants are now authorized to purchase or take on lease or otherwise land for the purposes therein mentioned, and they are empowered by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 154, to dispose by sale or otherwise of the property so acquired.

7. The court of quarter sessions found as a fact that the appellants were practically the only possible tenants of the said premises so long as they remained part of the said metropolitan system, and that if the said premises belonged to a private owner, he would let, and the appellants would hire, them for the purpose of being used in connection with and as part of the said metropolitan system at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the gross and rateable values of £20,567 and £17,139 respectively.

8. The court of quarter sessions further found as a fact that, if the said premises were not used in connection with and as part of the said metropolitan system, but were entirely disconnected therefrom, and applied to any other use or purpose for which they could be made available, the gross value thereof was £1,200, and the rateable value £1,000.

9. The appellants contend that the said land, works, buildings, and machinery are only capable of beneficial occupation if used for purposes other than those of the said metropolitan system, and that they should be assessed at the value for which the same would let to a hypothetical tenant from year to year supposing the said land, works, buildings, and machinery were not used as part of the said metropolitan system, but were entirely disconnected therefrom, and applied to any other use or purpose for which they could be made available, and that they should be assessed according to the rule laid down in Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, 19 W. R. 246, L. R. 6 Q. B. 193.

10. The respondents contend, and the court of quarter sessions held, that it is not necessary to rateability that the premises as actually occupied and utilized should yield or be capable of yielding a commercial profit, and that under the circumstances aforesaid the appellants do beneficially occupy the premises, and ought to be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants of the said land, works, buildings, and machinery, and that the rule laid down in London School Board v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 34 W. R. 583, 17 Q. B. D. 738, and in Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent Union, 38 W. R. 181, 24 Q. B. D. 197, governs the case.

In the St. George's Union case the appellants were assessed as owners and occupiers of land, buildings, pumping station, and machinery situate in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, within the St. George's Union, at £5,858 as the gross value and £3,994 as the rateable value. It appeared from the special case that the circumstances of the appellants' ownership and occupation of the said lands and works were the same as in the Woolwich case.

The Divisional Court (Wright and Collins, JJ.) held, upon the authority of The Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent and London County Council v. Erith Guardians (unreported) that the appellants were rateable in respect of the works in both cases, and gave judgment for the respondents. (In London County Council v. Erith Guardians, which was heard in the Court of Appeal on the 16th of May, 1892, the question was as to the rateability of sewage works, the property of the London County Council. The appellants' counsel, on behalf of the appellants, stated to the court that he could not distinguish that case from Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent, and the court therefore gave formal judgment against the appellants.)

Avory (Ryde with him), for the London County Council.—The case is covered by London County Council v. Churchwardens of West Ham, 40 W. R. 659, [1892] 2 Q. B. 44, in which it was held that sewers were not rateable. The present case is one of sewage works, which are held by the appellants under exactly the same circumstances as the sewers were in the West Ham case. The statement by counsel in London County Council v. Erith Guardians that that case could not be distinguished from Mayor, &c., of Burton-upon-Trent v. Assessment Committee of Burton-upon-Trent was incorrect, as is shown by the more recent decision of this court in the West Ham case. [He was stopped by the court.]

Littler, Q.C., Sinclair Cox (Cutler with them), for the Woolwich Union, and Meadows White, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the St. George's Union, argued that the case was distinguishable from the West Ham case and was governed by London County Council v. Erith Guardians, and, secondly, that the West Ham case ought not to be followed because of certain statutes which were not then brought to the attention of the court. Their arguments are fully set out in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

The following cases were also referred to:—Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 17 W. R. 527, L. R. 4 Q. B. 15; Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham; Guest v. Overseers of East Dean, 20 W. R. 332, L. R. 7 Q. B. 334.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this case is governed by the rules laid down in London County Council v. Churchwardens of West Ham. That case raised the question of the rateability of sewers which were part of the main drainage system of the metropolis, which system was made and carried on under sections 150 and 135 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. This court decided that those sewers were not rateable, and the court came to that decision by reason of the interpretation which they put on sections 150 and 135. By these sections the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorized to purchase land and to construct a sewage system. They had no power to let the lands purchased and used for that purpose, and this court, therefore, held that there could be no hypothetical tenant other than the board, no other person could become a tenant of sewers which the board were bound to maintain and use for the purpose of the sewage system. The only other point left for us to consider in the West Ham case was whether the London County Council could, within the meaning of the London School Board v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, be hypothetical tenants of the sewers. In that case the court held that the owner of land might himself be a hypothetical tenant, and that he might be so if he could be supposed hypothetically to be the tenant of the land or whatever it was which it was proposed to rate. If the owner could legally be the tenant and could pay a rent (because he could not be a tenant without paying a rent), then he might be a hypothetical tenant. In the West Ham case we held that the London County Council could not be a hypothetical tenant, because to make it such, it must be supposed that somebody else was the owner of the sewers, or of the land occupied by the sewers, and could lease the sewers or the land so occupied to the council. We said that section 135 of the Metropolis Management Act was absolutely inconsistent with that idea, for if it could be assumed that the council could lease the sewers from a landlord, then you must assume that the landlord could put the ordinary restrictions of a landlord into the lease—for instance, that if the rent were not paid he might re-enter; but that is absolutely contrary to the statutory duties of the council, which are to make and keep the sewers. We, therefore, held in that case that the sewers could not be rated, but the question of the rateability of sewage works was not then raised. We have now, however, to consider that question. What are these works? They are not ordinary pumping engines, but are pumping engines which have been made for the purpose of the drainage system, and they are an indispensable part of that system. They are the works mentioned in sections 150 and 135. Section 135 puts the sewers and the sewage works on precisely the same footing. Therefore, if we have to hold that the sewers, for the reasons which we gave, were not rateable, it must be the same with regard to the works, which are part of the same sewage system. The reasoning and grounds of the judgment with regard to the sewers apply equally to the works.

But it has been argued that we ought to differ from that decision because certain Acts of Parliament were not called to our attention in that case, which at first sight seems a somewhat startling proposition. The first statute we were referred to was the Metropolis Management Act, 1858, section 3 of which provides that the power of taking land given by the Act of 1855 and all other powers in that Act and the Act of 1858 shall extend and be applicable as well to works of deodorizing sewage as to all other works. The effect of that is merely that if the council take land for the purpose of deodorizing they must take it in the same way and subject to the same restrictions as other works. That section does not add to or diminish the effect of sections 150 and 135. We were also referred to section 23 of this Act of 1858. That section merely provides that the expenses incurred in dealing with sewage in the River Thames shall be defrayed in the same manner as under the Act of 1855. It does not affect the present case. The next statute was the Local Government Act, 1888, and it is said that section 40, sub-sections 8 and 9, gives to the County Council a different power with regard to the drainage system, and the taking and using of land for that purpose, than existed in the previous Acts. By sub-section 8 of section 40 the powers, duties, and liabilities of the Metropolitan Board of Works were transferred to the London County Council. That includes the power of taking or leasing land, and the duty of using it only in the way mentioned in section 135 of the Act of 1855. Then sub-section 9 provides that if the London County Council borrow for the purposes of the Act they shall borrow in accordance with the provisions of the Acts relating to the Metropolitan Board of Works; but that, save as aforesaid, part 4 of the Act shall apply to the County Council when acting as successors of the Board of Works. Then it is said that if you refer to part 4, section 65 provides that a county council may for the purpose of any of their powers or duties acquire, purchase, or take land on lease, and it is said that amongst their duties is the duty of dealing with the drainage system. But neither of these sections makes the position of the council with regard to the drainage system different from that of the Board of Works. None of these Acts alter in any way the construction and application of the Act of 1855, upon which we gave our opinion in the West Ham case. We are bound by that decision, and, therefore, both these appeals must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—I think that these works are not hereditaments for which the County Council can be rated. It appears to me that there is no valid distinction to be made between the works in this case and the sewers in the case of London County Council v. Churchwardens of West Ham. I think they stand precisely on the same footing, and the same arguments and same reasons which were applicable to the sewers are applicable to these works, therefore I do not propose to go into that matter at any length, or indeed at all. It has been argued before us that there are Acts of Parliament, subsequent to the Act of 1855, which were not brought to our notice in that case which might have been brought to our notice, and which, if they had been brought to our notice, would have affected our decision in that case. Those Acts of Parliament and the different sections have been elaborately brought before our notice now, and speaking for myself I certainly say that they would not have altered the view that I took in the West Ham case, and as they would not have altered the view which I took in the West Ham case, holding as I do that the works in this case stand in the same position as the sewers there, I say at once that they do not alter the view I take of this case as governed by the West Ham case.

I should like to make one observation with regard to rating generally, because I understand that these cases are likely to go to the House of Lords, and because it does appear to me that there are different cases on this subject which are more or less conflicting. The governing case with regard to the rating of hereditaments is no doubt the case of Jones v. The Mersey Docks, 13 W. R. 1069, 11 H. L. Cas. 443. In that case it was held that every description of property is rateable, but it must be capable of a beneficial occupation. Now, if this was a res nova (and if it were not for the London School Board v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, about which I speak with all respect) I should have doubted if an occupier placed under statutory restrictions, who suffers and must suffer a loss by the occupation of his hereditaments, is the kind of hypothetical tenant that was contemplated by the Parochial Assessment Act. I should have thought that the Parochial Assessment Act contemplated an ordinary tenant from year to year, and not a tenant forced by statute to become an occupier at a loss. I should have thought there must have been a possible beneficial occupation to render any hereditament rateable. Subject to that observation (which I should not have made, having proper respect for the case of London School Board v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, unless I understood that the whole of this matter was going to the House of Lords) I think the appeal in both these cases must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—This is the first case relating to this paricular question which I personally have taken any part in, and I only wish to make a few observations to show the reasons for which I concur in this decision. The last West Ham case came before the court constituted by the Master of the Rolls, and Lopes and Fry, L.JJ., and the Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., have stated their view of what the decision in that case was, and I understand it to be this, that although the Metropolitan Board of Works and their successors, the London County Council, have power to take on lease land for the purpose of making sewers and other drainage works, they have no power whatever to take on lease sewers and drainage works that have been made, "therefore," the Master of the Rolls says in his judgment, "in that case there is no possible hypothetical tenant except the County Council. Then can they be such tenants? I think not, first, because, as I have said they have no power to become tenants of the premises at all." That is explained by what he says rather earlier in his judgment, "I am of opinion that they have no power to take sewers made by other people on lease." Now in that case the sewers had been made by the Metropolitan Board of Works. That is stated in the special case, paragraph 2. "Under the said system the sewers and the pumping station were constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works." The question as to the works, as the Master of the Rolls said, was not brought before the court in that case, and they had only to deal with the sewers, sewers which, as I understand the case, had been made by the Metropolitan Board of Works and taken over by the London County Council. Those sewers, having been constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works and taken over by the London County Council, were sewers of which neither the Metropolitan Board of Works nor the London County Council by the terms of their Act of Parliament were authorized to take a lease. They might have taken the land on lease and have constructed the sewers in them, but they could not take the constructed sewer in the land upon lease, therefore they could not be treated as hypothetical tenants of that of which they could never become tenants at all. That was part of the ratio decidendi of that case, and I cannot see why it does not apply equally to these works. The County Council might have taken land on lease and constructed the works on that land, but they could not have taken a lease of the works when constructed. I am, therefore, of opinion, that this case is governed by the West Ham case.

As to the point raised by Lopes, L.J., that this kind of property, of which the London County Council can have no beneficial occupation, but which they are bound to use at a loss, is not the subject of rating at all, I desire to reserve my opinion, because I do not think it arises in this cases. It seems to me that all property which has or may have an annual value is primâ facie the subject of the Rating Acts, and ought to be rated, not according to the value which it actually possesses, but according to the possible value which it might possess. That, however, may not apply to lands and works in possession of the London County Council, for the reasons which are given in the West Ham case. I prefer, however, to rest my decision upon the reason which I have already referred to, namely, that this case is governed by the West Ham case.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The question was whether notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant, who had not appeared, must be served on him personally or was sufficiently served by being filed.

The action was brought to administer the estate of Thomas Evans, deceased, but the defendant did not enter an appearance to the writ. The usual order was made for accounts and inquiries to be taken and made.

On the 4th of March, 1892, a chamber order was made for the defendant to appear on a date, afterwards fixed for the 15th, before an examiner to be examined; the defendant being ordered to produce at such examination all deeds, documents, and securities in his possession relating to the matters of the inquiry. He failed to attend.

On the 25th of March a second order was made ordering him to attend for examination, at his own expense, on a day appointed—the 11th of April. This order and the notice of the appointment for his examination were served on him personally, but he again failed to attend.

Both orders were indorsed, "If you, the within-named defendant, Thomas Noton, neglect to obey the order, you will be liable to process of execution for the purpose of compelling you to obey the same order."

On the 14th of April the plaintiff gave notice of motion for a writ of attachment to issue against the defendant for non-compliance with the orders. This notice was not served personally on the defendant, but was filed at the Central Office at the Royal Courts of Justice.

The motion having come on for hearing, and the defendant not appearing, Kekewich, J., gave leave to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant, who was arrested on the 2nd of November, and committed to the custody of the Governor of Holloway Prison.

Application was then made to Kekewich, J., for his release from prison, on the ground that there had been an irregularity in the serving of the notice of motion for the writ of attachment, that it was not sufficient to file it at the Central Office, but that it ought to have been served on the defendant personally.

Kekewich, J., considered that, if there had been any irregularity, it did not render the order void, and that he had a discretion in the matter, and declined to order the defendant's release.

(a.) Reported by ARTHUR LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant appealed.

C. H. Lindon, for the appellant.—The defendant should be released, inasmuch as the notice of motion for his attachment was not duly served; filing is not sufficient; it should have been personally served. [BOWEN, L.J.—Does not ord. 44, r. 2, govern the matter?] It may, and it is in the appellant's favour; but I put it on another ground, that of ord. 68, r. 1, that this is a "criminal proceeding," the procedure in which is not affected by the rules, or at least a quasi-criminal proceeding: Davis v. Galmoye, 37 W. R. 227, 39 Ch. D. 322. [BOWEN, L.J.—That it was not a criminal proceeding was the very ground of the court entertaining the appeal there. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—What crime does a man commit who does not come to be examined?] A misdemeanour: In re Maria Annie Davies, 37 W. R. 57, 21 Q. B. D., at p. 238; In re Pollard, L. R. 2 P. C. 106, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4. The notice of motion ought to have been served personally, inasmuch as this, though not such a criminal proceeding as to prevent an appeal being brought, is of the nature of a criminal proceeding. [LINDLEY, L.J.—But against that there are the two authorities of In re Morris, Morris v. Fowler, 38 W. R. 522, 44 Ch. D. 151, and In re A Solicitor, 28 W. R. 529, 14 Ch. D. 152.] A writ of attachment for contempt is not like a writ of execution or any civil proceeding. [LINDLEY, L.J.—If it is criminal there is no appeal. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The old rule nisi had to be served personally; now that rules nisi are abolished, why should not the notice of motion which takes the place be served personally?] That is exactly the appellant's contention. [LINDLEY, L.J.—You contend that Browning v. Sabin, 5 Ch. D. 511, 25 W. R. Dig. 185, In re Morris, and In re A Solicitor were all cases in which attachment would have formerly issued ex parte as a matter of course under the old system, but that the case we have to deal with is not one of such cases?] Yes. [LINDLEY, L.J.—And so you say that personal service is necessary, or, at any rate, that the party to be attached should have the intention to apply for his attachment brought to his actual knowledge?] Having actual knowledge would not obviate the necessity of personal service: Mander v. Falcke, 40 W. R. 31, [1891] 3 Ch. 488. The incidents of committal attach to the present case. Again, attachment did not, and does not, apply to the case of a stranger, but only committal (In re Bell's Estate, Foster v. Bell, 18 W. R. 369, L. R. 9 Eq. 172), which leads to the same result; the defendant had not appeared, and therefore was a stranger. [LINDLEY, L.J.—That is a strong thing to say.] Notice was not served in accordance with the rules, which, especially in the case of the liberty of the subject, should be strictly followed: Nelson v. Worssam, W. N., 1890, p. 216, followed in Mander v. Falcke. A person who has not appeared can only be called a party in a colloquial sense, not properly.

He referred to Daniel's Chan. Prac., 5th ed., p. 804; Oswald on Contempt, p. 164; Callow v. Young, 55 L. J. N. S. 543, 35 W. R. Dig. 11; and Treherne v. Dale, 33 W. R. 97, 27 Ch. D. 66.

Ingpen, for the respondent.—The rules, generally, are so particular in their directions, and inasmuch as they do not state that personal service is necessary in the case of attachment, whereas they do say it is necessary in some cases, it is not to be presumed to be necessary. Besides, the court has discretion not to release the defendant till he has purged his contempt, even if there has been some irregularity. [BOWEN, L.J.—The discretion must come in where all the proceedings have been regular, so as to give the court jurisdiction to adjudicate in the contempt.] A person who has been served has notice, and it is provided that filing shall be good service; actual notice in fact is not necessary.

He cited In re Morris, Morris v. Fowler.

Lindon, in reply.—In all the cases except In re Morris, some attempt was made to effect personal service, either through the solicitor or by leaving the notice at the house. That case is the first in which filing merely was held to be sufficient.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case has been very ably argued by Mr. Lindon, but he has not persuaded me to think that the appeal for which he contends ought to be allowed. The defendant, who is the appellant, is a solicitor. The plaintiff, who is, I suppose a cestui que trust or something of that kind, brings this action against the defendant for an account. The defendant does not appear to the writ; and it is argued upon that non-appearance, that he is not a defendant, not a party to the proceedings, because he has not appeared; but that argument does not seem to me to be a good one: it seems to me that a person who is, as the appellant here was, served with the writ becomes thereby a party to the action.

Leaving that point, a motion was then made in the action which resulted in the order of the 25th of March, whereby the defendant was ordered to attend, at his own expense, before an examiner to be examined, and a certain date was fixed for his examination. It is said that that order was not obtained on notice. It is true it was not obtained on notice served personally, but it was on notice served in the mode provided by rule 4 of order 67 in the case of persons who have not appeared—that is, by filing the notice at the Central Office. The order, together with notice of the appointment for his attendance, was served on the defendant personally. He, however, did nothing; he did not attend, and an order was made for the issue of a writ of attachment. The notice of motion for the writ to issue was not served upon the defendant personally, but was served in the mode provided in the case of persons who do not appear, by filing, as required by ord. 67, r. 4, in cases "where personal service is not requisite."

Before the Judicature Acts writs of attachment could be obtained in the Court of Chancery without the order of a judge in the case of breach of a definite order, without more; they issued in such a case as a matter of course. This was altered by the Judicature Act, which made two changes. One was that a writ of attachment cannot issue without leave of the court—a great protection to a party. The other was that the person against whom the writ is to issue must have notice—that is by ord. 44, r. 2, which is as follows: "No writ of attachment shall be issued without the leave of the court or a judge, to be applied for on notice to the party against whom the attachment is to be issued." The rule does not say there is to be "personal service" of the notice; it says nothing about any mode of service, and it is left for the court to see from the rules how notice is to be given. Kekewich, J., was informed, when the order was applied for, of the facts of the defendant not appearing and the notice of motion being served by filing at the Central Office, and he allowed the attachment to go. And from that decision the present appeal is brought. We are asked to say that the order for the writ to issue was made by Kekewich, J., without jurisdiction, practically. If the matter were res integra, I think there would be much to say in favour of the view that personal service of the notice of motion in such a case is necessary; it is a strong thing to say that, even with the leave of the court, a man may be sent to prison without personal service or substituted service of notice of the application, to send him there. But the practice is settled against that view, and in accordance with the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Morris, Morris v. Fowler, and it ought not to be disturbed.

I have assumed that this is a case in which an appeal lies. I should say this is not a criminal matter. I concur in what was said by Lopes, L.J., and by Cotton, L.J., in O'Shea v. O'Shea, 38 W. R. 374, 15 P. D. 59, as to there being nothing that can be called a criminal proceeding in the case of an application for attachment against a defendant for disobedience to an order of the court made in some civil proceeding. I should say this is a civil matter. The case of In re Freston, 31 W. R. 804, 11 Q. B. D. 545, seems to say otherwise, and so does Harvey v. Harvey, 26 Ch. D. 644, 32 W. R. Dig. 10. Those cases would have to be considered if it were necessary to decide the point. But I assume that it is not a "criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47 of the Judicature Act, and that an appeal will lie. The appeal, however, must be dismisseed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I also will assume that an appeal lies in this case. That being so, the true view of the rules, in my opinion, is that the appellant is wrong. The distinction between committal and attachment and the practice upon them are, I think, correctly stated by Chitty, J., in Harvey v. Harvey, which forms Appendix A to Mr. Oswald's Book on Contempt of Court, and in the memorandum of Mr. Lavie. The question is, how far change has been made by ord. 44, r. 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. taking the present as a motion for attachment and not for committal. It was to compel the defendant to do something which was for the purposes of the suit, to compel him to attend before an examiner for examination, and accordingly it belongs to the class of cases to which attachment and not committal is applicable; it was to effect something in furtherance of the objects of the suit, and therefore falls within what Cotton, L.J., says in O'Shea v. O'Shea and Chitty, J., in Harvey v. Harvey.

As to ord. 44, r. 2, that rule does not in terms require personal service, and I cannot help thinking that in a matter dealing with the liberty of the subject it would state that personal service was necessary, if it were so. I myself should much prefer that personal service should be required in such cases, or such notice as the court might direct. Ord. 67, r. 4, states that where the defendant has not appeared notice is to be filed; that has been done, and so notice has been given so as to satisfy ord. 44, r. 2. The established practice of the Court of Chancery and the case of In re Morris tend to show that the view I take is within the meaning, as it is within the letter, of the rule. Under the rules the judge has power to say that, though the rule has been satisfied, yet "under the circumstances I require further notice." I might have done that myself in this case. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have very few words to add. First, was the application to Kekewich, J., for attachment or committal? In my opinion it was attachment, not committal, and was for enforcement of a civil order. Before the Judicature Act such an attachment would have been obtained without further application to the judge, and as a matter of course, on proof of the order and of the breach of it. The second question is, Is this a criminal matter? I think not. Again, have the requirements of the rules been followed? Have ord. 67, r. 4, and ord. 44, r. 2, been complied with? I can find no rule requiring personal service, and ord. 67, r. 4, applies to an order for attachment, and it has been followed. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

A solicitor had acted in non-contentious business transactions for a client, including the sale of a freehold property, and paid his client the balance appearing to be due by an account which he rendered. The account, which was in the handwriting of the solicitor's clerk, was headed with the solicitor's name, but was not otherwise signed by him. One of the items in the account to the credit of the solicitor was, "By agreed costs, £80," and the account showed a balance due to the client, for which sum there was at the bottom of the account a receipt signed by the client. The solicitor afterwards, in obedience to an order of the court, delivered various bills of costs relating to the business, which bills the client sought to have taxed.

Held, (1) that signature by the party to be charged was sufficient under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, s. 8, sub-section 2, and that the client would have, under that section, been bound by his signature on the face of the account, if the account had sufficiently contained the terms of an agreement as to costs; (2) that there had been no sufficiently definite agreement as to costs; (3) that there had been no payment in respect of the bills of costs delivered; and that, consequently, the bills must be taxed.

Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, distinguished.

A Mr. H. D. Frape, solicitor, of Brighton, had acted professionally for a Mr. Perrett, a blacksmith of the same place for ten years in various non-contentious matters, including certain mortgage transactions in which certain other clients of Mr. Frape were mortgagees. A settlement of accounts relating to principal moneys, interest, advances on account of purchase-money, costs, &c., took place between Mr. Frape and Mr. Perrett on the 23rd of February, 1892, when the document to which these proceedings related was signed by Mr. Perrett under the following circumstances. Mr. Frape had a few days previously completed for him the sale of a small freehold property already mortgaged to other of his clients, and was in receipt of the purchase-money. Perrett asked if he could at once settle his account with Mr. Frape. After some discussion the items of the payments for mortgage, principal moneys, &c., were taken down by Mr. Frape's clerk in the form of a draft account. With regard to these items there was no dispute. For agreed costs Mr. Frape undertook to accept £80, to which Perrett agreed. A form of account was then drawn up, headed Mr. Frederick Perrett, senior, in account with H. D. Frape. On one side appeared the items of account due on the part of Perrett to Frape, amounting to the total sum of £334 13s. 10d. On the other the sums due from Mr. Frape to Perrett in respect of the said purchase, amounting to £457 18s. 4d.

The £334 13s. 10d. was on the same page deducted from the £457 18s. 4d., leaving a balance to Perrett of £123 4s. 6d.

The account then continued on the same side:—

	£123	4	6
By "agreed costs" ...	80	0	0
Balance due to Mr. Perrett	£43	4	6

Below was written:—"Received this 23rd day of February, 1892, of Mr. H. D. Frape, the sum of £43 4s. 6d. in settlement of the above account, to which I hereby agree.—F. PERRETT."

On the 25th of April, 1892, Perrett issued a summons in the Queen's Bench Division for delivery by the solicitor of his bill of costs, and an order by consent was made on the 5th of May, 1892. In pursuance of this order ten bills of costs were delivered. On the 13th of July, 1892, a summons to tax the bills was issued in the Chancery Division, and assigned to North, J. North, J.'s chief clerk held, under In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro, 24 W. R. 1017, 1 Q. B. D. 724, which was a case under the Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), s. 4, that as the agreement was not signed by the solicitor it did not bind him, and was consequently invalid. He accordingly directed the accounts to be taxed, to which the solicitor objected. Finally the matter was referred to the judge, and the discussion was adjourned into court.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the applicant.—These bills ought to be taxed. There is no binding agreement between solicitor and client: In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro. This case was decided under the Solicitors Act, 1870; but the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, makes no difference. It only permits an agent to sign for a principal. The agreement is not signed by the solicitor, and the fact that the account is headed with his name will not suffice to bind him. It is, in fact, only a verbal agreement, and as such is bad, for under both Acts there must be a written agreement: In re West, King, & Adams, Ex parte Clough, 40 W. R. 644. It is impossible to say in respect of what the £80 was considered to be paid. There was no delivery of bills prior to payment, and there cannot be any payment without delivery. This has been decided in In re Street, L. R. 10 Eq. 165, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 130, a decision followed by Chitty, J., in In re Stogdon, 56 L. J. Ch. 420, 35 W. R. Dig. 60. Again, if there is taken to have been an agreement, it is too vague, and parol evidence is not admissible to explain it. Even if there has been delivery and payment, yet special circumstances will justify an order for taxation. Further, we have had the bills delivered with Mr. Frape's consent, and we are, therefore, entitled to have them taxed. The matter, in short, is a res judicata.

C. J. Peile, for the respondent.—These bills are not impeached as unreasonable. If the agreement, then, is binding on both parties the bills cannot be taxed: In re Palmer, 38 W. R. 673, 45 Ch. D. 291. [NORTH, J., referred to the question of signature.] Under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, this is a good agreement. In In re Palmer the signature by the client alone was sufficient. In any case, however, the document is sufficiently signed to bind Mr. Frape by the fact that his name appears at the top of the agreement: Evans v. Hoare, 40 W. R. 442, [1892] 1 Q. B. 593. In deciding that case Cave, J., observes, "Whether the name occurs in the body of the memorandum, or at the beginning or at the end, if it is intended for a signature there is a memorandum of the agreement within the meaning of the statute." It is clear this is an agreement as to the costs, and parol evidence is admissible to show what those costs are: Macdonald v. Longbottom, 7 W. R. 507, 1 Ell. & Ell. 977. [NORTH, J.—The agreement does not say all costs which have been agreed to at £80.] When solicitor and client do agree, costs must refer to all costs between them. This is an application to tax a paid bill. The application is not in proper form, nor have any special circumstances been shown: Hitchcock v. Stretton, 40 W. R. 555, and Stirling, J.'s remarks therein, and Ex parte Hemming, 28 L. T. 144, 5 W. R. Dig. 141, were also referred to. In re Street was decided on the special circumstances of the case.

T. L. Wilkinson was not called on.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion there must be a taxation of all the bills. The facts arise thus: Mr. Frape acted as solicitor for Mr. Perrett in several matters with respect to a certain property. Various things were done with respect to that, and ultimately it was sold, and the purchase-money came into Mr. Frape's hands. Then an account was prepared by Mr. Frape, or rather by his clerk on his behalf, showing what balance there was to be paid over to Mr. Perrett. It does not refer in any way to the property in question or to any property. It is headed as being "Mr. Frederick Perrett, senior, in account with H. D. Frape." It shows on one side Mr. Frape's receipts—cheque on account of deposits. It refers to certain receipts. First of all, deposit on signing contract £50. Then balance of purchase-money £429 as per account, less certain amounts paid, making a total of £457 odd, to be accounted for by Mr. Frape. Then on the other side he sets out various payments made, including a sum to the client himself, making a total of £334 13s. 10d. Then, deducting that from the moneys received, it leaves a balance in Mr. Frape's hands of £123 4s. 6d. Then the only remaining items are these, "By agreed costs, £80." Deducting that from the £123 4s. 6d. leaves a balance of £43 4s. 6d., besides which is written "Balance due to Mr. Perrett." Then comes a memorandum at the foot, "Received this 23rd day of February, 1892, of Mr. H. D. Frape the sum of £43 4s. 6d. in settlement of above account, to which I hereby agree," and then on the stamp is Mr. Perrett's name.

The application now is for the taxation of ten bills which have been delivered by Mr. Frape to Mr. Perrett in pursuance of an order of the Queen's Bench Division. The answer is that there cannot be any such taxation now that the amount has been the subject of agreement between the parties and settled by the retention by the solicitor of the £80 and the signature of Mr. Perrett on this account.

Now, the first two points which have been raised relate to the question whether there is a binding agreement or not, which is a valid settlement between Mr. Perrett and Mr. Frape. That turns upon the 8th section of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. That provides that, "with respect to any business to which the foregoing provisions of this Act relate," within which it is admitted the present business comes, "whether any general order under this Act is in operation or not, it shall be competent for a solicitor to make an agreement with his client, and for a client to make an agreement with his solicitor before or after or in the course of the transaction of any such business, for the remuneration of the solicitor to such amount and in such manner as the solicitor and the client think fit, either by a gross sum or by commission or percentage or by salary or otherwise." It is said that this was an agreement between the client and solicitor made after the business had been transacted for the remuneration of the solicitor by the lump sum of £80. Now, the first question is whether there is or is not an agreement here independent of any question of signature. The second question arises with respect to the signature. This memorandum is signed by Mr. Perrett alone, as I have mentioned, and not by the solicitor, and the 2nd sub-section of the 8th section says, "The agreement," that means such agreement as the first part of that section contemplated, "shall be in writing signed by the person to be bound thereby, or by his agent in that behalf." The person against whom it is sought to be enforced, who is said to be bound thereby, is Mr. Perrett, and it is beyond all doubt signed by him. The question is whether that is sufficient, or whether it is necessary, to be an agreement within the Act, that it should be signed by the solicitor also. In my opinion it is not necessary. In the case of In re Lewis, Ex parte Munro it was held that the agreement in writing under the Solicitors Act in force at that time—namely, the statute of 1870, section 4—implied signature by both parties, because the document could not be said to be an agreement in writing between the parties unless not only the terms of the agreement, but the signatures of the parties, were contained in it. In the present case I have to deal, not with the Act of 1870, but of 1881, and there the language is different. Sub-section 2 provides that "the agreement shall be in writing, signed by the person to be bound thereby, or by his agent in that behalf." In my opinion those words are quite inconsistent with the necessity of the agreement being signed by both parties. The phrase adopted is one that is very familiar in the Statute of Frauds, and one knows well enough what is meant by signature "by the party to be charged therewith," as distinguished from signature by all parties to the agreement or document in question.

Then it is said that the only real meaning of the 2nd sub-section of this Act is that it allows a person to be bound thereby if it is signed not by him but by an agent on his behalf, and it only has the effect of supplementing the Act of 1870, which provides that the agreement shall be by both parties, by saying that in the case of an agreement under the Act of 1881 it must be signed by both parties, subject to the qualification that the signature by the person to be bound may be by an agent instead of the principal. In my opinion that is not the meaning of this sub-section. It deals not only with the case of agent signing for a person, but a case of persons signing themselves, and says the agreement shall be signed by the person to be bound thereby, as well as that it may also be signed by his agent on his behalf. In my opinion, therefore, under this section there is sufficient signature to the agreement to make the agreement binding upon Mr. Perrett, although it has not been signed by the solicitor.

Then the other question with respect to the agreement is this. We have got rid altogether of the question of signature, and the other question is whether, independently of the signature, the agreement in writing is proved from this memorandum. In my opinion there is no defect in the signature. But is there any defect in the terms of the agreement? In my opinion the agreement in writing must show what the material terms are, and you cannot refer to any other document not incorporated with the document signed, nor any parol evidence for the purpose of showing what these terms are. The terms of agreement must be found within the agreement itself, including in the agreement itself any other written document sufficiently incorporated. Now what is the agreement here? The agreement is that £80 is to be deducted in respect of what? Agreed costs. There is nothing to show on the face of the writing what the agreed costs are. It is quite true that the moneys received by the solicitor came from the proceeds of the sale of certain property, but there is nothing here referring to the property itself in any way. There were, as known at that time, certain proceedings in respect of which the solicitor had acted for the client. It was not known to the parties at that time in what bills those would be included, whether one or more. That would depend very much upon the way in which the solicitor, in making out his bills, chose to make them out. They have been made out, and properly made out, by the solicitor in ten different bills. Those bills, Mr. Peile tells me, are divisible in this way: they all relate to one property; but the first three bills relate to previous costs which had been incurred by the client to the solicitor, in respect of the property, but not in any way relating to the sale of the property, which was afterwards carried out and which produced the money. The remaining seven bills are said to have referred more or less to the disposition of this property, which ultimately produced the sum which came to the solicitor's hands.

Now the statement is that £80 is deducted in respect of the agreed costs, but there is nothing whatever to show what the agreed costs are. If it had been said it was in respect of all the costs the solicitor had against the client that would be a different matter. But it may be that they related to the costs relating to the transaction of the sale of this property, and did not refer to other costs. But I am only suggesting one mode in which they might be divided. The flaw in the alleged agreement, in my opinion, consists in this, that it is in respect of agreed costs and there is nothing to show on the face of the agreement what are the costs which were the subject of the agreement between the parties. It is suggested that they apply to all the costs. If so it would have been very easy indeed to express the agreement in that way, but where the reference merely is to agreed costs, that does not show what the costs are which have been agreed at £80, and you have, therefore, to go outside the agreement to identify what those costs are. It was suggested by Mr. Peile that where there was a written contract referring to, say, a house, you must always be able to produce evidence to show what that house is. I agree. If in this case the reference had been for instance to "my bills of costs, which have been made out against you" there might have been evidence to identify the bills of costs which had been made out as those referred to in the agreement. But here the reference is not to costs due from one person to another, or the claim of the one against the other in respect of costs, but it is "my costs which have been the subject of agreement." Therefore, it is necessary to refer to some evidence not contained in this document itself to find what the agreement between the parties actually has been. In my opinion, therefore, the agreement fails, not for want of signature, but for want of definiteness in stating the important matter of what the agreement was and to what costs the agreement did relate—whether to some or all.

It is said that the fact that bills have since been delivered identifies what they were. It is not so in any way. It has been open to Mr. Frape afterwards to deliver such bills as he thought fit, and the fact that the person to whom he delivered them was to be bound by the handing over of such of his bills as he thought fit to deliver, does not seem to me to be a matter that could be of the slightest weight.

Then there is a third point taken. It is said that, assuming there is no agreement within the statute, still the bill has been paid, and there can be no order for taxation of the bill after payment in the absence of special circumstances, which have not been adduced here—which have not been opened here before me. I have not seen the evidence, and it is not necessary to go into it. Before I go to that, there is one point I should mention with respect to the agreement. Mr. Peile says that here it is signed by both parties because the name of the solicitor appears in the head of the account, and also in the memorandum at the foot of it; and therefore it is signed by him, and for that he refers to a case of Evans v. Hoare. I do not find anything in this document before me that I think amounts to a signature by the solicitor, or that was intended as a signature by him, and I find in Evans v. Hoare Cave, J., lays down the law in this way: "I am of opinion that the principle to be derived from the decisions is this. In the first place, there must be a memorandum of a contract, not merely a memorandum of a proposal; and, secondly, there must be in the memorandum somewhere or other, the name of the party to be charged, signed by him or by his authorized agent. Whether the name occurs in the body of the memorandum or at the beginning or at the end, if it is intended for a signature, there is a memorandum of the agreement within the meaning of the statute." Accepting that and applying it, Is there here the name of the solicitor intended for a signature? In my opinion there is not; therefore that case does not affect the question.

Then, coming to the third point, it is said that his bill has been paid, and the cases of Ex parte Hemming and Hitchcock v. Stretton were relied upon for that purpose. Now what happened here was this. No bills whatever were delivered before this account was settled. They were applied for afterwards. The solicitor would not deliver them, and the order was obtained in the Queen's Bench Division directing delivery. They have been delivered, and are, as I have said, ten in number. Now, it is said that, these bills having been delivered by the order of the court, it must be taken that there has been delivery of a bill. The cases of In re Street and In re Stogdon seem to me both to be confirmed by the observations of the judges in the case of In re West, King, & Adams, Ex parte Clough. It is said that the case of Ex parte Hemming and the decision of Stirling, J., in Hitchcock v. Stretton laid down some different law. In my opinion those cases cannot get rid of the obligation imposed upon me by the decisions in In re Street and In re Stogdon. Moreover, there is a great distinction between Ex parte Hemming and Hitchcock v. Stretton and the present case. In Hitchcock v. Stretton Stirling, J., proceeds upon In re Street and In re Stogdon, and says that, in his opinion, the case before him is not inconsistent with the authority of In re Street; therefore he is not dissenting from that decision. His lordship says: "It seems to me that the explanation given by the learned judge of the case Ex parte Hemming comes to this, that although if no bill of costs is delivered at all, then there is no payment within the meaning of the 41st section of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843, yet if a bill is delivered after a payment previously made, then the court may look at the whole circumstances and come to the conclusion that the payment which has been made is referable to the bill which is subsequently delivered, and in that case, unless the court finds special circumstances such as would justify the taxation of a bill under section 41, it is not a matter of course that the bill should be taxed." In the present case what I find is this. There was a payment of £80. It was in respect of something; I do not know what, because the agreement does not show what the bills are which are agreed at the sum of £80. It is impossible, therefore, for me to say that this payment of £80 was a payment made in respect of all the bills or of any of the bills in particular, and therefore the ratio decidendi of Hitchcock v. Stretton does not, in my opinion, apply to this case. To say that this payment of £80 was made in respect of these ten bills subsequently delivered would be an assumption, in my opinion, entirely at variance with the fact; and I have not the least doubt the intention of the parties at this time was to have a settlement without any bill being delivered, and to avoid the necessity of delivering bills; and to say that the payment was made in reference to bills to be delivered would, I am satisfied, be drawing an inference or coming to a conclusion entirely at variance with the facts of the case.

Under these circumstances the conclusion I come to is that there must be a taxation of these bills.

In re INGHAM.
JONES v. INGHAM. (a.)

Mortgage—Priority—Executors—Negligence of one of legal mortgagee's executors—Subsequent equitable mortgage—Recovery of title deeds.

A mortgagee of leasehold property died, having by his will appointed his widow and his son executrix and executor, and he left all his estate to his widow for her life, with remainder to his son, and also gave to them, as joint tenants, his trust and mortgage estates. The widow and son duly proved the will. The widow took possession of the title deeds, and pressed for repayment of the mortgage debt. The mortgagor replied that he could only pay by raising a fresh loan, and that for that purpose he should require the title deeds. The widow sent the deeds to the mortgagor, who, being unable to borrow the money, purported to return them in a paper parcel. The widow died, and shortly afterwards the mortgagor also died. The son found only the mortgage deed in the parcel, the other deeds being missing; and it then appeared that the mortgagor had, in the lifetime of the widow, but without giving any notice of the existing mortgage, mortgaged the leasehold property to a bank, and had deposited the title deeds with them, but he had never paid off any part of either of the mortgages.

The son, who denied that he had any knowledge of the deeds having been sent to the mortgagor, claimed to be entitled to his security in priority to the bank, and asked that the bank should be ordered to deliver up the deeds to him as owner of the legal estate.

Held, that, whatever might have been the rights of the bank as against the widow, the son had not been guilty of fraud or of any such negligence as would postpone him to the bank; that he was entitled to priority, and that the deeds should be delivered to him.

The acts of one of several executors cannot bind their testator's estate so as to preclude other persons interested in that estate from relying on their legal title, unless the legal owner himself, or some predecessor of his in title, has personally either been guilty of misconduct or conferred on the mortgagor an apparent authority to deal with the mortgaged property as if it were unincumbered.

Further consideration.

(a.) Reported by W. A. G. WOODS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a creditor's action for the administration of the estate of Thomas Ingham, deceased. The estate was insolvent, and the usual judgment had been given. Two creditors, Thomas William Pedley, the surviving executor of John Pedley, deceased, and the National Bank of Wales, carried in claims against the estate; they each claimed to be entitled to securities for their debts on a portion of the testator's estate, which was insufficient to pay both in full, and there was a dispute between them as to their priorities. It was agreed that Stirling, J., should decide all the questions which had arisen between the parties (including their respective rights to the title deeds of the property), and they consented to be bound in like manner as if an action had been brought by one against the other, and the defendant in such action had delivered a counter-claim.

The circumstances which gave rise to the dispute were these. By two several indentures, dated respectively the 9th of March, 1872, and 30th of August, 1872, two distinct leasehold properties were assigned to the said Thomas Ingham.

In 1879 Ingham borrowed £650 of John Pedley, and to secure repayment of that sum executed in Pedley's favour a legal mortgage dated the 29th of September, 1879, of both leasehold properties, and handed over to Pedley, as such mortgagee, the two deeds of assignment. About the same time Ingham borrowed of Pedley a further sum of £150, the repayment of which was secured by three promissory notes for £50 each

On the 3rd of September, 1880, Pedley died. By his will, dated the 3rd of July, 1875, Pedley appointed his wife, Ann Pedley, and Thomas William Pedley (one of the present claimants) his executrix and executor; he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to Ann Pedley for life, with remainder to T. W. Pedley; and he devised and bequeathed all estates vested in him as trustee or mortgagee to Ann Pedley and T. W. Pedley as joint tenants upon the usual trusts. Ann Pedley and T. W. Pedley proved the will.

The assignments of 1872 and the mortgage of 1879 were after the death of J. Pedley taken possession of by Ann Pedley, and remained in her custody down to the year 1884. Mrs. Pedley employed one Aaron Tunnicliffe to collect for her the income which she was entitled to receive under her husband's will, including the interest on the mortgage debt of £650 and the three promissory notes for £50 each. In 1884, according to the evidence of Tunnicliffe, he, by the direction of Mrs. Pedley, pressed Ingham for payment of the £800 so due, and in answer to an application Ingham wrote to Tunnicliffe a letter dated the 10th of January, 1884, to the effect that he had done all in his power to borrow the money, but had failed, as people were investing their money in shares in ships, and that if Mrs. Pedley must have the money, he could only get it through a building club, but in order to do so he should have to get the deeds, so as to have other deeds made from them by the club. Mrs. Pedley agreed to this course, and on the 6th of June, 1884, Tunnicliffe obtained the deeds from her and made them up into a parcel, and sent them to Ingham by post.

It was not clear what subsequently took place, but Ingham never paid off the £650, or any part of the same.

On the 4th of March, 1890, Mrs. Pedley died, and on the 4th of September, 1890, Ingham died.

After Mrs. Pedley's death the mortgage deed of the 29th of September, 1879, was found by T. W. Pedley amongst her papers wrapped up in a piece of brown paper, but the two assignments of 1872 were missing. It appeared after Ingham's death that, on the 5th of May, 1885, Ingham had handed over to the National Bank of Wales one of those deeds, executing at the same time what purported to be a legal mortgage of the property comprised in the deed by way of security to the bank for £200, and that on the 19th of August, 1887, he had deposited the other deed with the same bank by way of equitable security for £300. Both these sums of £200 and £300 remained due to the bank. T. W. Pedley deposed that he had no knowledge of the deeds having been sent to Ingham in the way above mentioned, and there was no evidence to the contrary, nor was there any evidence as to when the mortgage deed had been returned to Mrs. Pedley.

Hastings, Q.C., and Warrington, for T. W. Pedley.—Pedley is a first mortgagee, having the legal estate, and can only be postponed by fraud or such gross negligence as amounts to fraud: Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174; Martinez v. Cooper, 2 Russ. 198. There is a reasonable excuse for his not having the title deeds. The cases of Perry-Herrick v. Attwood, 6 W. R. 204, 2 De G. & J. 21, and Briggs v. Jones, L. R. 10 Eq. 92, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 84, in which the legal mortgagee himself parted with the deeds to enable the mortgagor to raise money for his own purposes, and not to pay off the mortgage debt, do not apply. It must be assumed that Ingham assured Mrs. Pedley that the deeds were in the parcel returned to her, and that the mortgage to the bank was effected subsequently: Hunt v. Elmes, 9 W. R. 362, 2 De G. F. & J. 578, 28 Beav. 631; Ratcliffe v. Barnard, 19 W. R. 764, L. R. 6 Ch. 652. The authorities are all referred to in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482. It may be that the bank are entitled as against Mrs. Pedley's life estate, but T. W. Pedley has done nothing, and he is not affected by her acts. [STIRLING, J., referred to Fonblanque on Equity, 5th ed., p. 166.]

Buckley, Q.C., and Knowles Corrie, for the bank.—The court will postpone the prior legal estate to the bank's subsequent equitable estate, for the bank is within class (b) referred to in the judgment (p. 494) in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp: "Where the owner of the legal estate has constituted the mortgagor his agent with authority to raise money, and the estate thus created has by the fraud or misconduct of the agent been represented as being the first estate." The cases draw a distinction between fraud and authority given to raise money, and turn upon the purpose for which the deeds were handed over. We rely upon Perry Herrick v. Attwood and Briggs v. Jones. Our case depends, not upon negligence, but on the authority given to Ingham. There is no evidence that any parcel was returned. As to the argument that Mrs. Pedley's acts do not affect T. W. Pedley, they were co-executors, and as executor she was competent to bind the estate. The presumption, as there is no evidence to the contrary, is that Mrs. Pedley, in the transactions in question, acted, not as tenant for life, but as executrix, and dealt with the bank, not personally, but through her agent. [STIRLING, J., asked if there were any authority that one of two executors could bind the estate otherwise than in reference to the estate—i.e., either by sale or pledge made in favour of a person dealing with the executor on the faith of his executorial authority, and referred to M'Leod v. Drummond, 14 Ves. 353, 17 Ves. 152, 170.] One of two executors can bind the estate in respect of anything done by him as executor. The court will not, on the application of one executor, set aside a security given to a bonâ fide holder for value without notice through the action of a co-executor. The acts of one co-executor are the acts of all: Williams on Executors and Administrators, 8th ed., 950; Simpson v. Gutteridge, 1 Mad. 609, 616. [STIRLING, J., referred to Lepard v. Vernon, 2 V. & B. 51.] In that case the court was asked to assist in equity so as to defeat other creditors, but here we are asking for assistance against the estate, and not against creditors. Mrs. Pedley as executrix had power to dispose of the property, and as she employed a fraudulent agent the estate must take the consequences of Ingham's act. We cannot be ordered to give up the deeds in our possession: Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—Mrs. Pedley intrusted the deeds to Ingham to enable him to raise money to pay off her mortgage. It is immaterial whether she acted as tenant for life or as executrix. If she acted as tenant for life her acts could not affect our title, which is not derived through her. In the cases cited the dealings were with executors, and the purchaser was, in the absence of proof of collusion, held to be protected. The bank dealt with the mortgagor as the owner of the property, and took their title from him, and cannot, therefore, set up any question of executorship: Sneesby v. Thorne, 3 W. R. 438, 605, 7 De G. M. & G. 399. Even if she acted as executrix her acts would have amounted to a devastavit, for which her co-executor would not be liable: Williams on Executors and Administrators, 8th ed., 1827, 1828. As to the deeds this court can administer legal relief, and so has power to order them to be delivered up to us: Heath v. Crealock, 23 W. R. 95, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 22; Cooper v. Vesey, 30 W. R. 148, 648, 20 Ch. D. 611, at pp. 624 and 631; Manners v. Mew, 29 Ch. D. 725, 33 W. R. Dig. 144.

Nov. 12.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued:—The first question is whether T. W. Pedley or the bank is entitled to priority. Now the legal title to the property is vested in T. W. Pedley as surviving executor and devisee and legatee of mortgage estates of John Pedley, and he relies on his legal title. He contends that he has been guilty neither of fraud nor of any such negligence as would postpone him to a subsequent equitable mortgage: Evans v. Bicknell; Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp. I think this contention is well founded. Fraud is not imputed to him, and there is no evidence of any negligence on his part; Ann Pedley was co-executrix and co-trustee with himself. She was also sole beneficiary during her life, and under these circumstances no blame can attach to him for leaving the deeds in her custody.

It is, however, contended on behalf of the bank that Ann Pedley returned the deeds to Ingham for the express purpose of raising money on them, and that she could not set up the mortgage of 1879 against the bank, which lent money in reliance on the deeds: Perry-Herrick v. Attwood and Briggs v. Jones; and it is further said that, as she was executrix of John Pedley, her acts bind his estate, and consequently T. W. Pedley in his capacity of beneficiary under the will. An attempt was made to distinguish the present case from those of Perry-Herrick v. Attwood and Briggs v. Jones, but though the facts differ somewhat, I am not satisfied that the principle of those cases would not apply so as to preclude Ann Pedley from setting up the mortgage of 1879, so far as she had a beneficial interest in it, against the bank; but no authority was cited for the proposition that her acts bind John Pedley's estate so as to preclude other persons interested in that estate, or T. W. Pedley in particular, from relying on the legal title now vested in T. W. Pedley. No doubt one of several executors has at law large powers of binding the testator's estate by his acts; but it is not contended that anything was done by Ann Pedley to affect her title at law.

All that is asked on behalf of the bank is that effect should be given to an equity in its favour. There are, no doubt, cases in which effect is given in equity to rights arising from the acts of a single executor. For example, I take it that the court will, as a general rule, enforce an equitable security on part of the assets of a testator created by one of several executors in favour of a mortgagee for value dealing with him in good faith: see Macleod v. Drummond. Here the bank did not deal with Ann Pedley; and there are on the other hand cases, such as Lepard v. Vernon and Sneesby v. Thorne, in which the court has refused its assistance to persons seeking to enforce in equity rights claimed by virtue of what has been done by a single executor, contrary to the wishes of the co-executor. No case has been cited in which a court of equity has interfered against the legal title under circumstances similar to the present, except where the legal owner has been guilty of misconduct, or has conferred an apparent authority to deal with the mortgaged property as if it were unincumbered. The equity to which effect was given in Perry-Herrick v. Attwood and Briggs v. Jones arose out of the personal acts of the legal mortgagee, and it seems to me that the authorities, all, or nearly all, of which are cited and commented on in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, are adverse in principle to interference against the legal title, except where the owner himself, or some predecessor of his in title, has personally either been guilty of misconduct or conferred such apparent authority as I have mentioned. T. W. Pedley has himself been guilty of no misconduct. He did not either in appearance or in fact authorize Thomas Ingham to deal with the property as unincumbered; and he does not derive his title from or through Ann Pedley; his title, whether as executor or trustee or beneficiary, is co-ordinate with hers. I think, therefore, that he is entitled to priority over the bank.

The order will contain a declaration of such priority, and T. W. Pedley will be admitted to prove against the estate for the amount of his debt after deducting the value of his security. The bank will be admitted to prove against the estate for the full amount of its debt.

I am further to decide whether the bank is entitled as against T. W. Pedley to retain possession of the deeds of 1872. Now it is laid down by James, L.J., in Heath v. Crealock that a court of equity never takes away from a purchaser for value without notice anything which he has honestly acquired; and if my jurisdiction were equitable merely, I could not deprive the bank of the deeds on the faith of which its money was honestly lent to Thomas Ingham. But since the Judicature Acts this court has had power to decide on legal as well as equitable claims; and Cooper v. Vesey is a case in which a mortgagee was ordered to deliver up the title deeds at the instance of a legal owner. T. W. Pedley, as surviving executor of John Pedley, and as legal owner of the mortgaged property, possesses a title to the deeds, to the assertion of which the bank, as it seems to me, has no answer at law. I must therefore make an order that the bank deliver up the deeds to T. W. Pedley. As regards the costs of these proceedings, both parties will be at liberty to add theirs to their respective debts, but there will be no other order.

PONTIFEX v. FARNHAM. (a.)

Solicitor—Client—Solicitors Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 28), s. 4—Agreement in writing between solicitor and client as to payment in full without taxation.

A solicitor wrote to a client on whose behalf he had done work and incurred expenses, saying, "If you are not prepared to settle the whole amount, I must ask at least for £100 on account." Receiving no answer he wrote again, threatening proceedings unless the client "was prepared to send a cheque for the whole amount." Subsequently the client paid £100 on account, and, in consequence of communications made to him by a third party, wrote: "I am off to Scotland, and will send you a cheque for the whole amount on my return."

Held, that the letters did not disclose any agreement between solicitor and client within section 4 of the Solicitors Act, 1870, so as to deprive the client of his right to taxation.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mathew, J., in chambers, holding that certain letters constituted an agreement between solicitor and client within section 4 of the Solicitors Act, 1870, by which the defendant, the client, had bound himself to pay the whole amount of the plaintiff's, the solicitor's, bill of costs without taxation. In the first of the letters in which it was alleged the agreement was contained (dated the 1st of July) the plaintiff wrote, "If you are not prepared to settle the whole amount, I must ask at least for £100 on account." That letter was not answered, and on the 12th of July he wrote again threatening legal proceedings unless the defendant "was prepared to send a cheque for the full amount." That letter was not answered, but the defendant paid £100 on account, and subsequently, not in answer to any letter written to him by the plaintiff, but in consequence of a letter written by the plaintiff to a third party and communicated to him, he wrote on the 6th of August, "I am off to Scotland, and will send you a cheque for the whole amount on my return." The plaintiff sued upon his bill for work and labour done, and on a summons to refer the bill to taxation contended that the defendant, by the agreement which the letters disclosed, had deprived himself of the right to taxation. This view was upheld by Mathew, J., who dismissed the summons.

POLLOCK, B.—In this case an appeal has been brought from a decision of Mathew, J., that the bill which formed the subject-matter of the action was not subject to taxation, on the ground that the case comes within section 4 of the Solicitors Act, 1870. By that section it is provided that "an attorney or solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of business done or to be done by such attorney or solicitor, whether as an attorney or solicitor or as an advocate or conveyancer, either by a gross sum, or by commission or percentage, or by salary or otherwise, and either at the same or at a greater or at a less rate as or than the rate at which he would otherwise be entitled to be remunerated." The section intended to take out of the ordinary provisions of the statute the case in which client and solicitor have made an agreement in writing by which the solicitor is to receive in respect of his costs a sum greater than, or different from, that to which, under the ordinary provisions of the law, he would after taxation be entitled. This is a case of some little importance, and I know from my own experience in chambers that other cases may be governed by it. My own inclination is much the same as that of Mathew, J., it seems to be a considerable hardship that the solicitor must have an actual agreement in writing to escape taxation, but I cannot help thinking that Mathew, J., had not the decisions before him, and was misled in consequence. He thought there was a good contract with a new consideration, but looking at the correspondence I cannot think that view is a correct one. In the first letter, dated the 1st of July, 1892, the plaintiff writes to the defendant, "If you are not prepared to settle the whole amount, I must ask at least for £100 on account." It cannot be said that it was brought to the mind of the client there that his payment was to be without taxation. But no answer is sent to that letter, and on the 12th of July another letter is sent threatening legal proceedings "unless you are prepared to send us a cheque for the whole amount." Then comes the letter written to the third party, which is answered by the defendant on the 6th of August. He says, "I am off to Scotland, and will send you a cheque for the whole amount on my return." Apart from the Solicitors Act that would be a good agreement, but is it an agreement in writing within section 4? I cannot think that we can hold that the case comes within the section, which would appear to be clearly contrary to the spirit of the decisions and to the dictates of sound sense apart from authority. It was said that the defendant agreed to pay these costs in full, and that he paid money on account, but that question was dealt with in In re Fernandez, W. N., 1878, p. 57. The client means to admit that the work was done, but not to forego his right to taxation.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. The main question is whether there is disclosed in the correspondence an agreement within section 4 of the Act of 1870. I am unable to say that there is. I do not decide that the signatures of the plaintiff and his client must be on the same piece of paper, it may be that you can obtain a complete agreement on two pieces of paper, but you must have a complete agreement signed by both parties, and I cannot regard the letters of the 12th of July and the 6th of August as constituting such an agreement. The letter of the 6th of August is not an answer to the letter of the 12th of July, but to a different letter altogether, the defendant having received an extract from a letter of plaintiff to another person altogether. I think the solicitor has failed to make out an agreement within section 4, nor has there been an account stated. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and the bill must go before a master to be taxed.

Appeal allowed.

BUCKLEY v. CRAWFORD.
TOWNEND (Claimant). (a.)

Attachment—Jurisdiction—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), ss. 4, 5—"Default in payment of a sum of money"—Order to pay money in pursuance of undertaking—Contempt of court.

An execution creditor gave, in interpleader proceedings, an undertaking to make good any deficiency on sale, which was embodied in an order made directing the sheriff to sell the goods seized. There was a deficiency on the sale, and the master made an order directing the amount to be paid by the execution creditor to the claimant. This order not being obeyed, an order was made by a judge attaching the execution creditor and committing him for contempt of court; but there was no proof of means to pay.

Held, that the case was one of "default in the payment of a sum of money" which had become due as a debt, and was within section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and that there was, therefore, no jurisdiction to make the order for attachment.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Bruce, J., at chambers, directing a writ of attachment to issue against him.

The plaintiff, Buckley, had recovered judgment against the defendant, Crawford, and issued a writ of execution under which the defendant's goods were seized. The claimant, Townend, claimed the goods under a bill of sale, and upon interpleader his claim was allowed.

The plaintiff, in order to obtain control of the sale of the goods, gave, in the course of the interpleader proceedings, an undertaking which was embodied in the master's order directing the sheriff to sell, the order concluding "the plaintiff undertaking to make good any deficiency on sale."

An actual deficiency was made on the sale of £139 0s. 10d., and an order was made by the master directing the plaintiff to pay the amount within four days.

The plaintiff failing to comply with the order, a summons for attachment was taken out by the claimant, upon which Bruce, J., made the order appealed against. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had means to pay, which was also denied by his affidavit.

C. C. Scott (E. C. Robinson with him), for the appellant.—The order was made without jurisdiction, as it seeks to compel payment of a sum of money by imprisonment, and by section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), it is provided that, "with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall be imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money." By the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 103, and the Lord Chancellor's Orders of the 1st of January, 1884, and the 4th of March, 1885, made in pursuance of that section, the order could only be made by a judge in bankruptcy, and, this case not being within any exception, it could only be made upon proof of means. This is clearly a case of a debt within the Act: Hewitson v. Sherwin, 18 W. R. 802, L. R. 10 Eq. 53; and there is no provision under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 42, rr. 3, 4, 6, and 24, for recovering such a debt by attachment. The undertaking was crystallized into the order, and the obligation was thereby merged.

He cited also Esdaile v. Viner, 28 W. R. 281, 13 Ch. D. 421; De Lossy v. De Lossy, 38 W. R. 511, 15 P. D. 115; Reg. v. Pratt, 18 W. R. 626, L. R. 5 Q. B. 176; Dillon v. Cunningham, L. R. 8 Ex. 23, 21 W. R. Dig. 90; Jackson v. Mawby, 24 W. R. 92, 1 Ch. D. 86.

Oswald, for the respondent.—The judge had jurisdiction to make this order; this was an undertaking given to the court, and it is none the less so because it is for the payment of a sum of money. It can, therefore, be enforced in the same way as the breach of an injunction under ord. 42, r. 7. If the plaintiff had given no undertaking he would not have obtained the management of the sale, and the court has a right to treat a breach of that undertaking as a contempt of court and punish it by attachment. The cases cited are distinguishable from the present case, and the object of the Debtors Act was to prevent committal for ordinary debts: Bates v. Bates, 37 W. R. 230, 14 P. D. 17.

He also cited Preston v. Etherington, 36 W. R. 49, 37 Ch. D. 104.

Scott, in reply.

Nov. 21.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case we are of opinion that there was no jurisdiction to make this order. Our reasons for coming to that conclusion will be given more fully by my brother Wills.

WILLS, J.—In this case an application was made for an order to commit the plaintiff in the action for disobedience to an order which had been made directing him to pay a sum of money to the claimant in the interpleader. This was a simple order to pay money, but the claimant seeks to treat the disobedience to it as a contempt of court, on the ground that it was made in pursuance of an undertaking which had been given by the plaintiff to pay the money.

There is, however, no difference between an order to pay a sum of money in pursuance of an undertaking and any other order to pay a sum of money. It is true that the undertaking is the original ground of the liability, but an order for attachment is never granted except for disobedience of any order to do or to abstain from doing some specific thing.

Now in this case the only order that could be made in pursuance of the undertaking is an order to pay the money. The words of the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, show that under such circumstances, if the case does not fall within any of the exceptions therein mentioned, imprisonment cannot be inflicted for default in payment, for the money becomes due as a debt, and there is abundant authority which supports this proposition.

In the case of Reg. v. Pratt an order had been made by quarter sessions for payment of costs, and it was there held that the case came within the second exception in the 4th section of the Debtors Act, 1869, inasmuch as the order could be enforced by a justice by warrant of distress, and in default by commitment, and the exception in the section said, "Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace," and the person ordered to pay the costs was not protected from imprisonment. Lush, J., in giving judgment, said: "The words in the enacting part, default in payment of a 'sum of money,' are advisedly used instead of 'debt' in order to include cases which might not properly have been called cases of debt, such as costs on a judgment of nonsuit, or costs on a verdict for the defendant, or damages in an action of tort, or costs under a rule of court. The enacting part therefore uses the words 'sum of money,' and this clearly applies to and includes costs; and the same expression in the second exception must also equally apply to costs."

Now I think it is quite clear from this that Lush, J., held that an order for the payment of costs was primâ facie within the Act, and that, had it not been within an exception, the Act would have applied to it.

In Hewitson v. Sherwin it was held by James, V.C., that a sum of money payable for costs under an order of the court was a debt within the meaning of the Act. And in Dillon v. Cunningham the Court of Exchequer held that an order for payment, as distinguished from an order for commitment, might be made without proof of means, and it was said by Kelly, C.B., in giving judgment that it was quite clear that the Act was intended to be of general operation, and to apply to every description of persons; and that the object was that there should be no imprisonment except for wilful default.

In Jackson v. Mawby a defendant was committed for contempt of court in not filing an answer. After his committal he filed his answer, but did not pay the costs incident to the contempt, and Hall. V.C., held that the court had no power under the Debtors Act, to keep him in prison for non-payment of the costs.

Again, in Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338, Jessel, M.R., in the course of an elaborate discussion of the meaning and effect of the Act, expressed his opinion that the power of imprisonment in the excepted cases reserved by the Act was punitive, and could only be exercised for the punishment of a dishonest debtor.

In the present case it is not shown that the debtor was dishonest, and in my opinion, therefore, the case falls within the words and the policy of the Act, which was passed for the express purpose of getting rid of the indefinite, and often lifelong, imprisonment to which debtors were liable under the old law. A case was cited to the learned judge at chambers in which Charles, J., had made an order for committal against a man named Harvey. But my brother Charles informs me that in that case he was satisfied that Harvey had the money, and he therefore treated the case as one of dishonesty and of wilful default.

For the reasons I have given I am of opinion that there was no jurisdiction to make this order for attachment, and that it must be set aside.

FOSTER v. OWEN. (a.)

Mine — Working discontinued — Mine abandoned — Securely fencing side entrance—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), s. 13.

After the passing of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, a copper mine was abandoned and the working thereof discontinued. There was a side entrance into the mine, which was, for the purposes of the arguments and judgment, assumed not to be dangerous. The only fence round or about the side entrance was a stone wall erected many years previously to the mine being abandoned. The wall enclosed an area of about ten acres, and within this area the mine and side entrance were situated.

Held, that the side entrance was not securely fenced within the meaning of section 13 of the Act.

This was a case stated by justices of the county of Merioneth at the request of the Attorney-General and the appellant Foster, an inspector of metalliferous mines.

The question was whether a side entrance to an abandoned copper mine, of which the respondent Owen was owner, was securely fenced within the meaning of section 13 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872. It was assumed for the purposes of the arguments and judgment that the side entrance was not dangerous. The mine had been abandoned and the working discontinued since the passing of the Act. The side entrance into the mine was driven from the surface into the side of a hill. The only fence was a stone wall erected many years previously to the mine being abandoned. The stone wall enclosed an area of about ten acres, and within this area the mine and side entrance were situated. With the exception of this wall no fence of any description existed around or about the side entrance. There was no thoroughfare through the enclosed area, and the only persons entitled to access to the enclosed area were the respondent and his tenants. An information had been preferred by the appellant against the respondent under section 13 of the Act for failing to cause the side entrance to the mine to be kept securely fenced.

The justices dismissed the information, being of opinion that the side entrance was securely fenced by the wall above described.

By section 13 of the Act it is enacted that "where any mine to which this Act applies is abandoned or the working thereof discontinued, at whatever time such abandonment or discontinuance occurred, the owner thereof, and every other person interested in the minerals of the mine, shall cause the top of the shaft and any side entrance from the surface to be and to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents."

Sutton, for the appellant.—I assume that the side entrance is not dangerous, still there must be fencing round the side entrance itself. The wall is not sufficient. Proviso (2) of section 13 of the Act shows that it is not sufficient that mines abandoned since 1872 should be enclosed in this way. The inspectors would have to walk all round the wall to see if it were properly kept.

Griffith Jones, for the respondent.—The section says nothing about the mouth of the side entrance. Under section 47 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), now repealed (see Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, 50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), a general rule as to fencing was made. No such rule has been made under section 37 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which is similar to section 47 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872. It is a question of fact, and the magistrates have found that the side entrance is securely fenced.

MATHEW, J. — I think the magistrates ought to have convicted. The question is whether the side entrance is protected as required by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 77, s. 13. [The learned judge read the section.] The section directs that at the time of abandonment the owner shall cause the top and the side entrance to be securely fenced. In this case the mine was abandoned since 1872, therefore the Act applies to this mine. The side entrance is within an enclosure of nine or ten acres surrounded by a fence. It is not suggested that that fence is for any such purpose as is contemplated by the statute. The magistrates held that the fact that this wall is around the space of nine or ten acres is sufficient to show that the side entrance is securely fenced within the section. Cattle might find their way into this space. The statute has not been complied with. It is not sufficient that there is a wall which will prevent accidents. The case must go back to the magistrates with an intimation that the side entrance is not securely fenced within the meaning of the Act.

BRUCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute applies to all circumstances, whether the mines are on level ground or not. We are not concluded by the finding of the magistrates.

Case remitted to the magistrates.

From Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) — Jan. 24.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ROBERTSON. (a.)

Inland revenue—Succession duty—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15, 20, 38.

By a marriage settlement a sum of money was settled upon trustees upon trust to pay the income to the wife during her life, and after her death to pay the income to the husband, if he should survive her, during his life, with remainder, in default of issue, to the wife absolutely. The husband died leaving the wife surviving him, and there was no issue.

Held, that, on the death of the husband, the widow became entitled in possession to a succession, and that succession duty was payable on the amount of the fund, less the value of her life interest therein.

Appeal from the judgment of a divisional court on the hearing of an information by the Attorney-General claiming succession duty.

The information stated that by an indenture of the 30th of November, 1872, made in contemplation of a marriage between Alexander T. A. Sherriff and Annie Robertson, Henry Robertson, the father of the intended wife, settled a capital sum of £10,000 upon trust to pay the income thereof to the wife during her life, and after her death to pay the income to the husband, if he should survive her, during his life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for the issue of the marriage, and in default of issue upon trust for the said wife, her executors, administrators, and assigns. The marriage was duly solemnized. Mr. Sherriff died on the 8th of February, 1880, leaving Mrs. Sherriff surviving him. There was no issue of the marriage. Mrs. Sherriff died on the 24th of July, 1889, having by her will appointed the defendant and another, her executors, and they duly proved the will. The other executor died in 1891. The information further stated that Mrs. Sherriff, on the death of her husband, became absolutely entitled to the settled trust fund, and it was accordingly transferred to her by the trustees of the settlement, and was part of her estate at her death, and the defendant administered the same accordingly.

The Attorney-General claimed a declaration that upon the death of Mr. Sherriff succession duty became payable on the capital sum of £10,000, less the value at the time of the husband's death of Mrs. Sherriff's life interest under the settlement, and that the defendant, as executor of Mrs. Sherriff, was personally accountable to her Majesty for such duty.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Probate duty at 3 per cent. and legacy duty at 3 per cent. had been paid upon the amount of the fund.

By the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 2: "Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred on or to confer on the person entitled by reason of such disposition or devolution a 'succession,' and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled."

By section 15: "Where the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests, then the duty thereon shall be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place."

By section 20: "The duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, or any person in his right or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof; except that if there be any prior charge, estate, or interest not created by the successor himself upon or in the succession, by reason whereof the successor shall not be presently entitled to the full enjoyment and value thereof, the duty in respect of the increased value accruing upon the determination of such charge, estate, or interest shall, if not previously paid, compounded for, or commuted, be paid at the time of such determination."

By section 38: "Where any successor upon taking a succession shall be bound to relinquish or be deprived of any other property, the commissioners shall, upon the computation of the assessable value of his succession, make such allowance to him as may be just in respect of the value of such property."

The Divisional Court (Wright and Collins, JJ.) gave judgment for the Crown.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellant.—No succession at all took place on the death of the husband. During his life Mrs. Sherriff had a life interest in the fund, and also the ultimate remainder. After his death she still had her life interest and the ultimate remainder; for, both estates being equitable, there was no merger. The only thing that happened on his death was, that thereby, the possibility of his coming into possession after her death ceased. He never enjoyed any interest in the property; and therefore it is clear that in fact there was no succession. If property is settled on A. for life, with remainder to B. for life, with ultimate remainder to C., and B. dies first, there is no succession to C. on B.'s death; for A.'s life estate still stands between C. and the property. There can be no succession so long as an intervening life estate exists; for the word "interval" in section 2 cannot be held to cover an intervening life estate. Here the widow's own life estate intervened between herself and the property. Therefore, there could be no succession during her life. If Mrs. Sherriff can be said to have succeeded to anything on the death of her husband, what she succeeded to was a reversion.

But section 20 says that the duty imposed by the Act shall become payable when the successor becomes "entitled in possession to his succession." Here the reversion did not come into possession during Mrs. Sherriff's life, and therefore, according to section 20, duty did not become payable till after her death. And probate duty and legacy duty having been paid on this fund, it is exempt from succession duty. Moreover, it is obvious that the trustees of the settlement were not necessarily bound to pay duty immediately on the husband's death. Mrs. Sherriff might have wished to leave the fund in their hands for a time. And the true view seems to be that a successor cannot be said to be entitled to possession until duty has been paid. Again, admitting that Mrs. Sherriff succeeded to the reversion in her lifetime, the last part of section 15 is applicable. Her succession to the reversion was accelerated by the extinction of a prior interest—viz., her husband's life estate. Therefore, according to that section the duty became payable at the time when it would have become payable if no such acceleration had taken place—that is to say, not till after the death of both of them.

Sir John Rigby, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with him), for the Crown.—This statute ought to be construed according to the ordinary use of terms, and not according to the strict construction of language adopted by conveyancers: see Lord Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, per Lord Campbell, C. The technical rules of equity as to merger and reversion must be disregarded, and the substance of the matter must be looked at. The real substance of this disposition was that, if the wife survived her husband, and there were no children, all the property was to be hers at his death, and that in the meantime she was to have the income. The fact that the husband was to have a life estate, if he survived her, does not affect the matter for the present purpose; for that event did not happen. And the fact that the husband never enjoyed any interest in the property is immaterial. It is not necessary, in order to constitute a succession to the wife, that she should take from him; it is only necessary that she should take by occasion of his death. Did she take anything in possession on the death of her husband? She became then and there absolutely entitled in possession to the whole property. Before his death she was only entitled to the income, she could not deal with a penny of the capital; after his death she was absolutely entitled to the capital to do whatever she liked with it. This was clearly a case of succession, and succession duty was payable on the husband's death subject to an allowance under section 38 in respect of the wife's life interest. The fact that she had the reversion already must be ignored. Wilcox v. Smith, 5 W. R. 667, 4 Drew. 40, and numerous other authorities, show that in cases such as this the reversion always is ignored. Section 15 does not apply to this case. There was here no acceleration within the meaning of that section, which deals with the case where "the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests." This must be construed to mean an acceleration by something outside the intention of the settlement, e.g., a voluntary surrender or disclaimer. Here nothing happened except what was contemplated by the settlement. The wife took her succession at the time when, and in the manner in which, the settlement contemplated that she should take it in the events which happened.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., in reply.—It is a mistake in substance to ignore the fact that she had the reversion already. The case may be tested thus:—If she had sold her life interest during her husband's life, the purchaser would have been in possession for the term of her life, and if then her husband had died, she would in that case certainly have succeeded to the remainder only.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Notwithstanding the ingenious argument on the part of the appellant, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. We are called upon to interpret and apply the Succession Duty Act. The first point to determine is when the Act applies, and to what. It does not apply to anything which happens until a succession falls. And it has been already determined that it ought to be applied to the real facts of a case, and not according to the description of facts given by conveyancers. We must, therefore, in this case look to the moment of the death of the husband, and see what effect the death had with regard to the wife, what the law at that moment gave her in consequence thereof. What the law gave her in consequence of her husband's death was the difference between what the law gave her just before his death and what the law gave her just after his death. By what the law gave her, I mean what the settlement gave her according to law. Now what had she by the settlement the moment before her husband's death? She had a life interest in the £10,000, that is to say, she was entitled to the income of the £10,000 during her life, but she had no power to deal in any way with the capital sum itself. What had she by the settlement the moment after her husband's death? The right to the enjoyment of the £10,000 to do what she liked with it. What she acquired, then, by her husband's death was the difference between the value of her life interest without any power of dealing with the capital sum and the value of having the capital sum absolutely as her own. That difference was the thing to which she succeeded. Was that thing an interest in remainder? An interest in remainder means an interest in property the enjoyment of which is in somebody else for a time, but will afterwards come to the person in question. But no one else had the enjoyment of this difference in value before the husband's death. This was not the case of a postponed enjoyment, it was a right to immediate possession. The wife was the only person who ever acquired this interest, and she acquired it by virtue of the settlement in immediate possession on the death of her husband.

Then there is another rule which we must apply in the interpretation of this Act. In looking to see what the law gives to a person who is a successor under the Act, we must treat the question as if nothing had been done by that person in the way of dealing with the property. We must strike out of consideration all such acts done by him. If this lady had sold her interest under the settlement during her husband's lifetime, that would have had no effect on the rights of the Crown. Those rights are to be considered as if she had done nothing; and if she did nothing she would be entitled on the death of her husband to the immediate possession of the whole property. Now the difference in value between what she then became entitled to and the life interest which she had before, was a substantial benefit, a tangible advantage; and she acquired it by reason of her husband's death and the application of the settlement to that death. I am of opinion that that is a succession within section 2 of the Succession Duty Act on which succession duty is payable.

If that is so, was not the duty, by virtue of section 20, immediately payable? The exception in that section does not apply; for there was no prior interest in this succession: she was the only person who had any interest in that. The section says that the duty shall be paid at the time when the successor shall become entitled in possession to his succession. I cannot assent to the proposition that she does not become entitled in possession until the duty is paid. The duty is not due before she gets into possession. The meaning is that the two things happen together: she becomes entitled in possession and the duty becomes payable at the same time. The fact that the trustees were bound to reserve the duty payable to the Crown does not affect the fact that on the death of the husband she became entitled to immediate possession. Under section 2 she became entitled to the succession, and by section 20 the Crown became entitled to duty at that time. Do any other sections of the Act apply? I think that section 38 applies in terms. Duty must be paid on what she succeeded to subject to the mode of valuation pointed out by that section. As to section 15, I am unable to see that there was any acceleration in this case. What the wife got she got by the settlement, and the time of her getting it was determined by the settlement, and by it alone. Neither was there any surrender or extinction of any prior interest. No right at all existed to this difference in value, to which the wife succeeded, until the moment of the husband's death. I am of opinion that nothing was accelerated and nothing extinguished. The judgment must be affirmed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The Solicitor-General has converted me, though at first I did not think he was right. There seems to me to be some ambiguity about the use of the word "succession" in this Act. It is not a reversion, that is to say, an interest in property, the enjoyment of which is postponed. It is defined in section 1 as being property itself, it denotes "any property chargeable with duty under this Act." Section 2 speaks of a succession being conferred by certain dispositions or devolutions of property. And by sections 5 and 7 the word includes an increase of benefit or of beneficial interest accruing on the death of any person. We must look at the facts to which the statute has to be applied. [His lordship stated the facts.] What had this lady got before her husband's death? Her life interest and her reversionary interest subject to her husband's life estate. What she had not got was the power to dispose of the sum of £10,000 as a sum in possession. By the death of her husband she lost her life interest and her reversionary interest, and she got the power to dispose of the capital sum absolutely as she wished. That is a succession within the Act. I think that the difficulty as to section 15 has been got rid of by the Solicitor-General. That section applies where the title to any succession has been accelerated. Here the title to succession was not accelerated; it was the possession which was accelerated.

LOPES, L.J.—The critical time was the moment of the death of the husband. If the wife survived her husband she was to have the property absolutely. Before his death she had the income, but she could not deal with the capital. After his death she had a beneficial interest in the capital. Therefore upon his death she became entitled, according to the settlement, to something to which she was not entitled before. I think this case comes within section 2 of the Succession Duty Act. At first I thought that the concluding part of section 15 presented a difficulty, but the Solicitor-General has changed my opinion. I think there is no acceleration within that section when the succession comes at the moment when it was intended to come by the settlement. The section seems to refer to the case where acceleration is caused by something outside the settlement.

By the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, it is provided that "Registered societies shall be entitled to the following privileges": Section 15, sub-section 7: "Upon the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any officer of a society having in his possession, by virtue of his office, any money or property belonging to the society, or if any execution, attachment, or other process be issued or action or diligence raised against such officer or against his property, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or trustee in bankruptcy or insolvency, or the sheriff or other person executing such process, or the party using such action or diligence respectively, shall, upon demand in writing of the trustees of the society, or any two of them, or any person authorized, by the society or by the committee of management of the same, to make such demand, pay such money and deliver over such property to the trustees of the society in preference to any other debts or claims against the estate of such officer."

The treasurer of a friendly society, who carried on business as a publican, became bankrupt. He was at the time indebted to the society in the sum of £100 6s. 7d., which he had received by virtue of his office. The money did not exist in any specific or traceable form, but his property realized in the bankruptcy some £290. Upon a claim by the trustees of the friendly society to be paid in preference to the other creditors,

Held (affirming the Divisional Court), that it was not the intention of the above section of the Act of 1875 to repeal then existing privileges of friendly societies; that its application was not restricted to specific moneys, or to such as could be specifically traced; that the bankrupt had in his possession, by virtue of his office, £100 6s. 7d. belonging to the society; and that the trustees of the society were entitled, therefore, to be paid that sum in preference to any other claim upon the bankrupt's estate.

Appeal from the Divisional Court.

The bankrupt, Miller, who also carried on business as a publican, was treasurer of a friendly society. As such he received subscriptions from members and payments on behalf of the society. At the time of his bankruptcy he was indebted to the society in respect of moneys so received to the extent of £100 6s. 7d., which he ought to have paid over. None of this money, however, could be specifically traced or earmarked, and the total amount standing to his credit at the bank was £13. The bankrupt absconded, and his property realized in the hands of the trustee some £290. Immediately after the receiving order had been made, a claim under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, was made by the trustees of the society upon the official receiver. The official receiver applied to the court for directions, and the county court judge held, allowing the official receiver's objection to the claim, that there was no proof that the bankrupt had in his possession by virtue of his office £100 6s. 7d., the sum claimed. The trustees of the society appealed, and the Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) reversed the decision of the county court judge, and the official receiver now appealed from that decision.

Sir C. Russell, A.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The language of section 15, sub-section 7 is different from that of the Act of 1855, which provides that any "debt" due from the officer to the society shall be preferential. Under the present Act the money or property is only to be handed over in preference to the claims of other creditors when it is the specific money or property in the specific possession of the bankrupt or is traceable. It is not because the court might think that a mistake had been made by the Legislature in dropping out the words of the former statute that it ought to be prepared to amplify this unless it will clearly bear the larger construction. The money must be in the bankrupt's possession just as the property must be "in his possession." The Act does not include property which may be turned into money. The section was required in 1875 to make the law clear as to money and property which could be followed: In re Hallett, 28 W. R. 732, 13 Ch. D. 696.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and F. Mellor, for the respondents, cited Ex parte Edmonds, In re Atkins, 30 W. R. 432, and Crowther v. Elgood, 35 W. R. 369, 34 Ch. D., judgment of Cotton, L.J., at p. 695.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the treasurer of a friendly society has been made a bankrupt, and had, at the time of his bankruptcy, some money in his possession. There were also book debts owing to him, and other property which would produce money in collection, and all of which in the hands of his trustee would be distributable among the creditors. That being the state of things, the trustees of the benefit society, whose treasurer he was, and in respect of which he had received subscriptions which he had not paid over, claimed to be entitled to sums amount-to £100 6s. 7d. to be paid to them in preference to the other creditors. Now, whether they were so or not depends upon the construction of sub-section 7 of section 15 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. The trustees of the society say that gives them the right to be paid in preference out of any money of the bankrupt's in the bankrupt's trustee's hands; but it was said against that, on the other side, that they have no such privilege under the section, because they cannot say that the bankrupt officer had in his possession money of the society at the time of the bankruptcy according to the true interpretation of the section.

The Attorney-General admitted that if his contention was right the whole course of legislation was altered in 1875 in respect of these privileges after they had existed by legislation since 1793. The question, therefore, is, Do the words of the sub-section oblige the court to say that the Legislature had intended to make this startling alteration? If they do not oblige this court to come to such a conclusion, then the proper course for this court to adopt is to construe the section so as not to alter the long course of legislation. But when we come to think of this, it seems impossible to suppose that the Legislature did not intend to continue these privileges, unless, indeed they have not done so by inadvertence. These friendly societies have the money of poor people, often their entire savings, and if their money is to be treated in the hands of their officer as his money for the purpose of giving him credit, then poor people who had no control over it might be ruined. That would be a startling proposition to my mind at the present moment, when friendly societies are crashing, in many cases through the misconduct of some of their officers. I believe, however, that the course I have indicated is the right judicial course to take with regard to every Act of Parliament.

Now does this sub-section clearly take away the privileges which the friendly societies have enjoyed? There are other considerations which make the matter pretty clear, but if the section stood alone, and had been enacted for the first time, I should say that it did not. The sub-section speaks of any money "belonging" to the society. That is not a technical term, it is not "which is the property of the society," but is the largest term which the Legislature could use. The section goes on to deal with bankruptcy and the rights of the sheriff, and then it says that, upon demand in writing of the trustees of the society, the trustees in bankruptcy shall "pay" the money and "deliver over" the property of the society, thus clearly distinguishing the two things, and showing, to my mind, that property does not include money.

If it had been necessary to identify the actual money or property deposited I cannot think the terms used would have been "pay such money and deliver over such property": they ought to have been "deliver over such money and property." But then, further, you come to this: the section says, "in preference to any other debts." Now that is an English idiom, and the word "other" couples the two things together and shows that the payment of money is of the same kind as any other debt. And in the same way the property is to be delivered over in preference to any other claim; that is, something in actual existence, it must be claimed and delivered over in preference to the claim of delivery of some other property. Therefore the section shows that in given cases it is treated as money in the ordinary sense, and thus, if the bankrupt had money at the time of his bankruptcy, it is not to be said that it was not the very same which he received, and when you are treating of a bankrupt's estate, then everything he has which will be money in the hands of the trustee is money. There is this further consideration: the object of section 15 is expressed to be to give "the following privileges"; it follows, therefore, that sub-section 7 is a privilege. If, therefore, it means that the bankrupt's trustee is to hand over property which, without the section, he would be obliged to hand over by ordinary law, then the section would give no privilege at all. Therefore, in my opinion, the section means property beyond what can be affected by the ordinary law, and the only way in which this construction can be carried out is to apply it to money which is not specific money; and I think it is, perhaps, as clear as legislation generally is.

This larger interpretation was given to the section by Bacon, V.C., in 1872, and in Ex parte Edmonds, In re Atkins, and since that decision it must have been acted upon in hundreds of cases and never challenged. If, therefore, it is reasonably capable of the larger construction, that decision ought not to be upset. Moreover, since that decision was given, two statutes dealing with priorities—the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the Preferential Payments Act, 1888—have been passed, and in neither case was any step taken to disturb it. That is not fatal it is true, but it is an observation, and I feel strongly, for my own part, that the decision was right. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal by the Crown from the decision of the Divisional Court (Hawkins and Wills, JJ.), reported 40 W. R. 671, [1892] 2 Q. B. 289.

The defendants, the present respondents, were the executors under the will of a testator who died on the 3rd of June, 1883. The testator bequeathed to the defendants, his executors, six pictures—four of which were by Gainsborough, one by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and one by Hoare—as heirlooms, to go with the settled estate. In the valuation for probate duty, the picture by Hoare was by mistake omitted, and the other pictures were valued by a skilled valuer at £1,194 10s. Before probate was granted the Controller of Probate and Legacy Duties sent to the executors these questions:—"Is the value put upon the furniture such as would be accepted on a sale? And are any paintings or articles of virtu included? If so, please give particulars. Should a sale take place during the course of administration and a larger sum be realized additional duty will be payable." The following answer was given:—"The paintings and articles of virtu and most valuable portions of the furniture are made heirlooms, and will in the ordinary course not be saleable till the eldest son, now four or five years old, attains twenty-one. If the executors had been directed to sell them, they would have sold them on the value put upon them in the valuation for probate if more had not been offered." After the receipt of this answer the Controller raised no further question; the probate duty was paid on the basis of that valuation, and probate was granted on the 15th of August, 1883. Shortly afterwards the executors assented to the bequest of the pictures as heirlooms, and delivered them to the trustees, by whom they were handed over to the tenant for life of the settled estate.

The testator's estate was fully administered and wound up, and the administration was closed in March, 1886. Since then the defendants had not as executors had any part of the estate in their hands or under their control, nor had they in any way acted as executors. In 1888 leave was granted by the court under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to the tenant for life to sell certain of the pictures, and in the following September and January the six pictures were sold, and realized a sum of £14,500, of which £500 was for the omitted picture by Hoare.

In May, 1889, an account was delivered to the commissioners (by the solicitor to the tenant for life and to the defendants) of the income arising from this sum, and duty thereon was in course of payment by instalments. The commissioners thereupon brought the discrepancy in value thus disclosed to the notice of the defendants, and required them to deliver a further affidavit, stamped to cover the full value of the pictures. This the defendants, the executors, having fully wound up the estate and closed up the administration, declined to do.

An information was accordingly filed by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown, for the purpose of enforcing payment of further duty upon the affidavit for probate, under section 32 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1881.

The Divisional Court held that the defendants, the executors, were not, at the time of the discovery of the extra value of the pictures, "persons acting in the administration of the estate," and that the Crown was not entitled to recover further duty from them: 40 W. R. 671, [1892] 2 Q. B. 289.

Section 32 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 Vict. c. 12), provides that, "if at any time it shall be discovered that the personal estate and effects of the deceased were, at the time of the grant of probate or letters of administration, of greater value than the value mentioned in the certificate . . . the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects shall, within six months after the discovery, deliver a further affidavit with an account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue duly stamped for the amount which, with the duty (if any) previously paid on an affidavit in respect of such estate and effects, shall be sufficient to cover the duty chargeable according to the true value thereof."

The Crown appealed.

Sir Charles Russell, A.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—The words "the person acting in the administration of such estate," &c., in section 32 of the Act of 1881 are intended to cover both an executor and an administrator, and they are equivalent to "legal personal representative." They would therefore include the executor of the executor of the original testator. An executor or administrator is answerable to the extent of the assets for any unsatisfied liability. The word "acting" means anyone who is bound to act.

They referred to sections 38, 40, 41, 43, and 51 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184 (the former Probate Duty Act), and sections 26, 30, 32, 35, and 37 of the Act of 1881, and to Jervis v. Wolferstan, L. R. 18 Eq. 18; 22 W. R. Dig. 251.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the respondents.—Various expressions are used in the Act of 1881. In section 27 the expression is "the person applying for the probate." In sections 32, 35, and 37 the expression is "the person acting in the administration of such estate." Section 42 uses the words "person acting in the execution of the will." Section 31 recognizes the fact that there is a period after which the administration must be recognized as closed; that section limits the period allowed for a return of overpaid duty in respect of debts to three years after the grant of probate, but there is nothing in that section to prevent an executor being allowed a return of overpaid duty in respect of other things at any time during the administration of the estate. We contend that the expression "the person acting in the administration of such estate" in section 32, implies that the administration is still going on, and that it has reference to an estate which is being administered. The Crown is protected against hasty administrations by section 37. In the Scotch Act (48 Geo. 3, c. 149, s. 38) the expression used is the "person intromitting with or assuming the management of," which shows that it has reference to an estate which is being administered. If the Legislature intended to throw a personal liability for all time on executors, it should in section 32 have used the words "legal personal representative" instead of "person acting in the administration of the estate"; it is, however, unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended to make a personal representative who has no assets in his hands liable to the Crown for the default perhaps of a previous representative of the estate.

Vaughan Hawkins, in reply.—I withdraw the contention that section 32 applies to an executor of an executor. Section 35, I admit, shows that the liability does not go beyond the original executor; the words mean, the person who acts under the probate or letters of administration dealt with in the section; the same is true of section 43 of the former Act. I contend that the words "person acting" in these sections mean, without reference to any particular period of time, the person who acts. I admit that under section 37 the Crown cannot call for explanations within the three years' limit from an executor of a deceased executor; if the original executor dies within the three years' limit, it is so much the worse for the Crown.

January 14.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following written judgment of the court:—The point to be determined is, What is the true meaning of the phrase "the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects" in section 32 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881? Does it mean the person who has acted by applying for and obtaining probate or letters of administration, or the person who is acting in the administration of the estate at the time the question arises as to the payment of further duty? By 48 Geo. 3, c. 149, s. 38, executors and others intromitting in Scotland with the effects of deceased persons were to exhibit an inventory thereof in the commissary court there, duly stamped, and if at any subsequent period a discovery should be made of any other effects belonging to the deceased, an additional inventory or inventories were to be made, verified by an affidavit by "any person or persons intromitting with or assuming the management of such effects," and in default a penalty was imposed. By 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, prior Acts were repealed, and the duties therein prescribed were imposed upon probate of wills and letters of administration in England and upon confirmations of testaments, testamentary or dative, and inventories to be exhibited in the commissary courts in Scotland. By section 41 of that Act it was enacted that "where any person on applying for the probate of a will or letters of administration" should have estimated the estate and effects of the deceased to be less than the same should afterwards prove to be, and should in consequence have paid too little duty, it should be lawful for the commissioners of stamps, on delivery to them of an affidavit of the value of the estate, to cause the probate or letters of administration to be duly stamped on payment of the full duty, and a further sum or penalty payable by law for stamping deeds after execution; and there was a proviso that the penalty might be remitted if the application was made within six months after the true value of the estate was ascertained and there had been no intention to deceive. By section 43 it was enacted that where too little duty should have been paid in consequence of mistake or misapprehension, "if any executor or administrator, acting under such probate or letters of administration," should not within six months after the passing of the Act or after discovery of the mistake or misapprehension, apply to the commissioner of stamps to make up the duty which ought to have been paid, he should forfeit £100, together with 10 per cent. upon the deficiency.

Now, pausing here, what is the meaning of the terms "any person applying for the probate of a will or letters of administration" and "any executor or administrator acting under such probate or letters of administration"? They appear to cover—first, the case of the person who was applying for the probate and letters of administration; and, secondly, the case of the person who, having obtained them, was then acting as executor or administrator under them. It was pointed out by Wills, J., in his judgment in the court below that, if the words "acting under such probate or letters of administration" were to have no meaning attached to them, he did not see why they were inserted, for the words "executor or administrator" would carry all that was desired, and in this we agree. The terms of the Scotch Act (48 Geo. 3, c. 149) appear to be synonymous with the words "an executor acting under such probate." The words are not "any person who has intromitted or has assumed the management of such estate," but intromitting with or assuming the management," which we read "is intromitting with or is assuming" such management. In our judgment these sections limited the liabilities therein imposed to those executors or administrators who were in fact acting when the liability arose, and the liabilities did not attach to those who, having once been executors or administrators, had ceased to act, having fully administered the estate of their deceased. In the year 1842, by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 82, the probate duty in Ireland, theretofore imposed by other statutes, was assimilated to that payable in Great Britain.

Such being the state of the law prior to 1881, we now come to the Act upon which the present question arises—viz., 44 Vict. c. 12. It will be noticed that sections 27, 28, and 29 use the same phrase as section 41 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184—viz., "the person applying for the probate or letters of administration." In section 31 the phrase is, "if at any time after the grant . . . and during the administration." In sections 32, 35, and 37 the last phrase is omitted, and there is inserted, "the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects." This is equivalent to the phrase "an executor or administrator acting under such probate or letters of administration." In section 43 it is "the person acting in the execution of the will." Neither the Attorney-General nor Mr. Vaughan Hawkins was able to give any intelligible reason for these alterations of language, though one would suppose, if the Act had been carefully drawn, that some such reason would have become apparent. In these circumstances what does section 32 mean? The Crown argues that the true meaning is that the executor or administrator who has applied for and obtained the probate or letters of administration is the person to file the affidavit and personally pay for the extra stamp, no matter whether he has long since ceased to act, having fully administered the estate, and has no assets whereout to recoup himself. The defendants' reading is, that the executor or administrator who is acting at the time the mistake is discovered is the person to file the affidavit and pay, for he personally would be able to recoup himself out of the estate he is administering; and that the section does not apply to an executor or administrator who has ceased to act, having fully administered the estate. There is obviously this result if the last reading be correct—viz., that at times the Crown may be unable to obtain the duty which it was entitled to, but we can find nothing in the Act of 1881 to show any intention to alter the liability of an executor or administrator to that which theretofore existed, and we may add that it would appear from Mr. Hanson's book that the practice of Somerset House has been only to look to the executor or administrator whilst the estate was being administered. In the next place, if the Crown's contention is right, it leads to what is a manifest absurdity—viz., that the executor of an executor might be personally liable for an accidental omission of his testator which took place whilst that executor was administering the estate of his testator, the mistake not being discovered until after the death of the first executor.

Mr. Vaughan Hawkins in reply, finding he could not maintain this proposition, abandoned it, and he then said that section 32 applied only to the personal liability of the executor who had made the mistake. By this means he hoped to surmount the difficulty, but we can find in the section no such limitation of liability if the words "the person acting in the administration of such estate" are read as applying to a person who had once acted by taking out probate or letters of administration. An executor, it must be remembered, is not usually liable to pay out of his own assets for the acts of his testator, and yet upon the Crown's construction of the section he may be. We are fully alive to the difficulty presented by section 37. It is pointed out, and with truth, that the words in this section 32 and in section 37 are the same, and it is said that if section 32 be read as the defendants contend, then the Crown may be deprived of the three years within which it may require explanations under section 37. This is so, but we answer that when once the Crown abandoned its claim to look to the executor of an executor it abandoned its indefeasible right to the three years under section 37, for an executor might well die within three years, and it had to be admitted that then the Crown's right was at an end.

In the result we read the words in section 32 as meaning the person who is acting in the administration of the estate when the mistake is discovered, and if there is no such person, the estate having been fully administered, the Crown is without remedy. It must not be forgotten that this is a taxing Act imposing pecuniary burdens, and it is well settled that all charges upon the subject, must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language. This certainly is not so in the present case, and no one can say that it is. In our judgment this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

FOWLER v. BROAD'S PATENT NIGHT LIGHT CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Debentures charging uncalled capital—Debenture-holder's action—Official receiver—Duty to make call—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 92, 95, 98, 102—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, ss. 12, 13—Companies Winding-up Rules, 1890, r. 92.

When an order has been made for the winding up of a company by the court, the power of the company and its directors to make calls is ipso facto at an end, and the only power to make calls is in the liquidator in the winding up. Consequently, an application after the winding up, asking that a company, by the official receiver, should make a call on shareholders for the amount unpaid on their shares, and that a receiver appointed in a debenture-holder's action should get in the amounts due on the shares, must be intituled in the winding up, as well as in the debenture-holder's action.

The above-named company was incorporated in 1890 as a company limited by shares for the purpose of purchasing as a going concern the business belonging to James Broad and G. C. Fowler. There were never more than seven shareholders of the company—namely, Fowler, Broad, and T. G. Driver, who had each subscribed for one £1 founder's share, and 1,000 £1 ordinary shares, the remaining four shareholders having subscribed for one ordinary share.

The company had issued mortgage debentures which charged the undertaking and all the property of the company whatsoever, including its uncalled capital for the time being. All the debentures were in the hands of Fowler and Broad.

On the 2nd of December, 1891, Fowler commenced an action against the company and Broad, on behalf of himself and the other holders of first mortgage debentures in the defendant company, for an account to have the debentures enforced by sale, and for a receiver.

On the 23rd of January, 1892, an order was made by North, J., for the usual accounts and inquiries, and that the property comprised in the first debentures (other than the uncalled capital of the company) should be sold, and an inquiry what steps ought to be taken as to realizing and getting in the uncalled capital of the company if and so far as the same was comprised in and charged by the said debentures.

On the 4th of December, 1891, a petition was presented by an unsecured creditor, and on the 16th of January, 1892, an order was made for winding up the company, but leave was given to the plaintiff in the debenture-holder's action to proceed with his action, notwithstanding the winding-up order.

A receiver and manager had been appointed in the debenture-holder's action.

The official receiver challenged the validity of the debentures on various grounds, but an agreement of compromise was executed on the 24th of June, 1892, between the official receiver and Fowler and Broad, whereby it was agreed that a sum should be paid to the official receiver to be applied first in payment of the costs of the winding up and of the liquidator of and incidental to the debenture-holder's action, and the preferential debts of the company; and next in payment to the creditors other than the debenture-holders of sums equal to 10s. in the pound on the amount of their debts provable in the winding up, and that on such payment being made the official receiver would not commence, take, or prosecute any proceedings for disputing the validity of the debentures.

Fowler now took out a summons, intituled in the debenture-holder's action alone, that the defendant company by the official receiver might make a call upon all the persons appearing in the share register to be members of the company, of 19s. on each share, and that the receiver in the action should get in and receive the amounts due in respect of the shares (other than the shares held by Fowler and Broad) on the allotment thereof and in respect of such call from (and, if necessary, take proceedings for the purpose in the name of the company against) all the shareholders except Fowler and Broad, and that the amount of the sums due and to become due in respect of the shares held by Fowler and Broad should be set off against the sums owing on the debentures.

J. G. Wood, for the summons, referred to The Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 44 L. J. Ch. 683, 23 W. R. Dig. 45.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, said he objected to any order being made on the official receiver.—The liquidator cannot be asked to make the call as a mere ministerial act. The powers conferred on the official liquidator are confined to the powers conferred by section 95 of the Companies Act, 1862. The making of a call must be done by a resolution of the directors, and cannot be done by merely affixing the seal of the company.

He cited Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534.

J. G. Wood in reply.—Every power which the company has vests in the liquidator, who has power "to do all acts and to execute, in the name and on behalf of the company, all deeds, receipts, and other documents, and for that purpose to use, when necessary, the company's seal" (Companies Act, 1862, s. 95). The liquidator is now asked to carry out the contract of the company, which is to be specifically performed by a call being made. I ask for nothing in the winding up. Whatever the company ought to have done when it was a going concern at the instance of the debenture-holders ought now to be done in the debenture-holder's action, and the liquidator must give effect to it. The official receiver has all the powers which were vested in the directors, and can make a call in the same way as they could have done, without settling a list and without any leave from the court.

At the conclusion of the argument VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., said he had no doubt that the applicant was substantially entitled to what was asked for, but he would like to consider the form of the order.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I have no jurisdiction to make the order asked for in the debenture-holder's action, though ultimately the applicant is entitled to the order he asks for—namely, to have the call made and to have the assistance of the official receiver in making it. I cannot make the order in the action. On a winding-up order being made, the power of making calls is confined to the powers conferred by statute of making calls. The powers of the directors to make calls then come ipso facto to an end, and the only power is in the official receiver, as liquidator in the winding up. The application must be amended by intituling it both in the winding up and in the action, and the official receiver must take proper steps for making and enforcing the call as asked by the summons. The receiver in the action will be at liberty to bring such actions or take such proceedings as may be necessary for getting in such call (except in respect of the shares of Fowler and Broad), and the other amounts mentioned in the summons, on the applicant giving an indemnity, to be settled in chambers if necessary, against all costs which the official receiver may incur or become liable for in respect of the incidental proceedings in the winding up or otherwise.

Appeal from chambers.

The action was tried before Lawrance, J., at the Guildhall, on the 15th and 16th of November, 1892, and lasted for upwards of four hours on the first day and for over five hours on the second day of the trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

The plaintiffs carried in their bill of costs for taxation; it included an item of ten guineas for a refresher fee to the plaintiffs' leading counsel, which was disallowed by the master. The plaintiffs objected to this disallowance, and the master refused to alter his taxation on the following grounds: "As the five hours in this case did not expire on the first day and the case was concluded on the second day, it is clear according to the express wording of rule 48 as explained by Wills, J., in Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Co., 39 W. R. 716, [1891] 2 Q. B. 300, that the plaintiffs' counsel are not entitled to refreshers. It is true that in The Courier, 40 W. R. 336, [1891] P. 355, Sir Charles Butt appeared to take a different view, but of the two judgments I infinitely prefer that of Wills, J., by which I consider myself bound (even if I disagreed with it, which I do not), and always act upon it. In truth the question of refreshers does not arise in this case, as on the first day the case did not last five hours, and no question of refresher arises until the day after that on which the five hours expire."

The plaintiffs appealed, and Mathew, J., in chambers, referred the question to the court.

Ord. 65, r. 27 (48), provides as follows:—"As to refresher fees when any cause or matter is to be tried or heard upon vivâ voce evidence in open court, if the trial shall extend over more than one day, and shall occupy either on the first day only, or partly on the first and partly on a subsequent day or days, more than five hours, without being concluded, the taxing officer may allow, for every clear day subsequent to that on which the five hours shall have expired, the following fees:—To the leading counsel, from five to ten guineas, &c. The like allowances may be made where the evidence in chief is not taken vivâ voce, if the trial on hearing shall be substantially prolonged beyond such period of five hours, to be so computed as aforesaid, by the cross-examination of witnesses whose affidavits or depositions have been used."

Trevor White, for the plaintiffs.—The decision of the master was wrong. The meaning of the sub-rule is that counsel must give a clear day of five hours for the fee on his brief; when the five hours have expired another clear day begins—not necessarily a new day of the week—and in respect of this new period after the five hours he is entitled to be allowed a refresher fee on taxation. The Courier was decided after the decision in Walker v. Crystal Palace District Gas Co., and is inconsistent with it; other decisions in my favour, since the Rules of 1883, are Gibbs v. Barrow, 30 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 538, and Collins v. Worley, 60 L. T. N. S. 748, 37 W. R. Dig. 58; and in Boswell v. Coaks, 36 W. R. 209, 36 Ch. D. 444, North, J., appears to take a similar view. This construction is borne out by the second paragraph of the sub-rule.

Wildey Wright, for the defendants.—The construction of the rule is clear; no refresher fee can be allowed except for time occupied on a day of the week subsequent to that on which the first five hours have expired. [COLLINS, J.—Does not "clear day" mean a new period clear of the first five hours?] "Clear day" means a distinct day of the week, so that if three hours are occupied on a Monday and two on the Tuesday, no part of Tuesday can be a clear day. The words in the second paragraph cannot control the clear words of the first paragraph.

DAY, J.—I quite agree with what the late Sir Charles Butt said in The Courier with reference to that case—that it was not altogether free from difficulty. I think this case presents a great deal of difficulty, and I am by no means satisfied that we have arrived at the right construction of this sub-rule. But any other construction would lead to so much inconvenience and injustice, and would be so inconsistent with the practice of the profession, that I think we are justified in adopting the subtle, yet sound, construction which has been suggested by my brother Collins. I have considered that suggestion, which I think avoids the mischief of the construction which was put upon the sub-rule in Walker v. Crystal Palace District Gas Co., and I shall adopt it. The sub-rule is peculiar in its language, but it seems to me that it does not exclude the right to a refresher where a case is prolonged on the second day of the hearing over and above the first five hours. Its object was to prevent the allowance of refreshers where a case began late on one day and ran into an hour or two on the second day; it makes an attempt to regulate the length of the working day in estimating the number of days occupied by a case.

If this is not a sound construction, the sub-rule for the regulation of refresher fees is a very inconvenient one, and not, as I think, in accordance with sound reason. It provides that "when any cause or matter is to be tried or heard upon vivâ voce evidence in open court the trial shall extend over more than one day, and shall occupy"—here the length of the first day is regulated—"either on the first day only, or partly on the first and partly on a subsequent day or days, more than five hours without being concluded"—that means, in my view, that the first day is, for the purposes of this sub-rule, to be considered as a period of at least five hours, and the five hours may be made out partly on the first and partly on the second day of the week, but until the first five hours run out there is to be no question of refresher fees—when they have run out "the taxing officer may allow for every clear day subsequent to that on which the five hours shall have expired the following fees." What is meant by "clear day"? I think it means such a clear day as is referred to in the preceding words—namely, another day clear and distinct from the five hours. After they have expired there must be some time occupied, but not necessarily on a different day of the week. If you have to borrow from one day to the other to make up the five hours, the second day must not begin to be reckoned until the five hours have been made up. Thus, if a case lasts for three hours on Monday and for two hours on Tuesday—that is five hours altogether—when those hours have expired another day begins—a clear day, clear from the five hours; it is then that time can be reckoned for a refresher fee. That is the view which Sir Charles Butt took in The Courier, and, as he points out, on any other construction it is difficult to give a meaning to the subsequent provision of the same sub-rule: "the like allowance may be made when the evidence in chief is not taken vivâ voce if the trial or hearing shall be substantially prolonged beyond such period of five hours, to be so computed as aforesaid, by the cross-examination of witnesses whose affidavits or depositions have been used." The construction put upon the sub-rule in Walker v. The Crystal Palace District Gas Co. is not easily reconcileable with that provision.

For these reasons I think the decision of the master was wrong, and must be reversed.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the sub-rule is difficult to construe in such a way as to give the effect to it which we must suppose to have been intended by its framers. But the part of the rule which it is easy to understand helps us to understand the part which is not so clear. It is clear that there must be five hours to start with—that time, is considered to represent one full day's work. After that time has expired it would seem to follow that the right to refresher fees for work done afterwards should begin; it would seem to follow that after the five hours were made up, refresher fees should be allowed for work done on each subsequent day of the week. If the five hours are completed on the first day and counsel are occupied for some hours more upon that day it may be taken to have been the intention that they should throw that extra time in, as it were, for the brief fee. In making a claim for a refresher fee in respect of that extra time no clear day subsequent to the expiration of the five hours can be pointed to, and it may be that the rule is intended to exclude such extra time on the first day. But the five hours may be made up (as in this case) out of the first and second days together, and on the second day there may be some hours' work over and above the five hours; then counsel is able to point to a clear day on which he has done work without counting the five hours. If it had been necessary to count any of the five hours there would be no clear day, because some of the hours have to be borrowed from the preceding day; but if he can show so many hours' work on the second day of the week clear of the five hours he is not bound to draw upon the five hours in order to justify his claim for a refresher fee for work done on that second day; that work is, in my opinion, done on a clear day within the meaning of the sub-rule. That construction is made possible by the second part of the rule, which deals with cases where the evidence in chief is on paper and the cross-examination is vivâ voce. There is no reason why the measure of time should not be the same in both parts of the sub-rule, and I think that the words "such period of five hours to be so computed as aforesaid" give an intimation that the framers of the sub-rule thought that they had provided in both parts of it for the same period of time after which the allowance of refresher fees might begin. It is true that Denman and Wills, JJ., decided otherwise, but Sir Charles Butt differed from that view in The Courier, and Grantham, J., in Gibbs v. Barrow, after consulting with another judge, and Chitty, J., in Collins v. Worley decided in the sense of our present decision. It appears, therefore, that the weight of authority, as well as of common sense, is in favour of our view.

County court—Practice—Costs—Action commenced in High Court and transferred to county court—Less than £20 recovered—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 65, 116.

Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides, with respect to any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court, that "if, in an action founded on contract, the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than twenty pounds, he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action."

Held, that the above provision applies to actions commenced in the High Court and transferred to a county court under section 65 *of the same Act; and that, therefore, where a plaintiff in such an action has recovered less than £20 at the trial in the county court, that court has no power to allow him any costs.

Harris v. Judge, ante, p. 9, [1892] 2 Q. B. 565, commented on and followed.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the City of London Court upholding the refusal by the registrar of that court to tax the plaintiff's costs of the action.

The action was brought in the High Court, the plaintiff claiming £27 10s. for goods sold and delivered. By an order made under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the action was transferred before trial, to the City of London Court. The defendant pleaded a set-off of £8 2s. for goods sold and delivered. The case was by consent of both parties tried before the registrar, who found that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on his claim and the defendant on his set-off. He accordingly entered judgment for the plaintiff for £19 8s. The plaintiff carried in a bill of costs for taxation, but the registrar was of opinion that he had no power to tax it by reason of the provisions of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The judge of the City of London Court, upon appeal, upheld the decision of the registrar. The plaintiff then appealed to this court.

The County Courts Act, 1888, provides as follows: Section 65. "Where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed one hundred pounds, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded one hundred pounds, is reduced, by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise, to a sum not exceeding one hundred pounds, it shall be lawful for either party to the action at any time, if the whole or part of the demand of the plaintiff be contested, to apply to a judge of the High Court at chambers to order such action to be tried in any court in which the action might have been commenced, or in any court convenient thereto, . . . and the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein; and the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the county courts, and the costs of the order and all proceedings previously thereto shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the Supreme Court."

Section 116. "With respect to any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court, the following provisions shall apply:

"(1) If in an action founded on contract the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than twenty pounds he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action; and if he shall recover a sum of twenty pounds or upwards, but less than fifty pounds, he shall not be entitled to any more costs than he would have been entitled to if the action had been brought in a county court."

Sub-section 2 makes provision as to the costs of actions founded on tort, and the section continues: "Unless in any such action, whether founded on contract or on tort, a judge of the High Court certifies that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court, or unless the High Court, or a judge thereof at chambers, shall by order allow costs."

Hume Williams (Herdman with him), for the plaintiff.—The decision of the county court judge was wrong. As soon as this case was transferred to the county court it became a county court action for all purposes, and the costs are to be taxed upon the county court scale. That is laid down by section 65, which is the section dealing with transferred actions and their costs. Section 116 only applies to actions which remain in the High Court and are tried there. That that is so, is clear from the language of the proviso, which gives power to "a judge of the High Court" to certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court. It has been held by the Court of Appeal in Harris v. Judge, ante, p. 9, [1892] 2 Q. B. 565, that a judge of the High Court cannot give this certificate in the case of a transferred action, and a county court judge cannot do so. Therefore, if section 116 applies to transferred actions, the plaintiff has no power of obtaining such a certificate entitling him to costs. The corresponding section (section 5) of the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), gives a similar power to certify to "the judge," and that power was exercised in transferred actions by the judge of the county court where the case was tried: Taylor v. Cass, 17 W. R. 860, L. R. 4 C. P. 614. The Legislature, when, by section 116 of the Act of 1888, they confined the exercise of this power to "a judge of the High Court," gave in compensation to the county court by section 65 the sole control over the costs of transferred actions.

Haldinstein, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case it appears to me that the contention of the appellant is wrong, and that the decision of the judge of the City of London Court was correct. Whatever may have been the practice before the year 1888, I am of opinion that since the passing of the County Courts Act of that year there is no jurisdiction in the county court judge to allow costs in such a case as this. That is the point before us, and it is all we have to decide.

The case of Taylor v. Cass, which was cited to us, although it seems to me to be an unsatisfactory decision, is an authority for the statement made by counsel for the appellant, that a county court judge before whom a remitted action was tried exercised the power given under the earlier Act to grant a certificate entitling the plaintiff to costs, and if we were dealing with a case under the earlier Act I should yield to that decision. But the more recent enactment is inconsistent with the decision in Taylor v. Cass, and I need not further discuss that case; it has been removed by the effect of the County Courts Act, 1888.

That Act must be construed according to its literal sense, unless some monstrous result arises from so construing it. The plain words of an Act of Parliament must be followed, and if consequences arise which were unexpected, it must be left to the Legislature to correct the effect of the Act. But in the present case I do not see that the enactment is an unwise one, and I am quite sure that it is very plain. The provisions of section 116 are to apply "with respect to any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court"; that is precisely the case here: the section continues, "if in any action founded on contract the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than twenty pounds he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action." It is impossible to doubt what that means. Here the plaintiff has brought in the High Court an action which could have been commenced in the county court, and he has recovered less than twenty pounds. Therefore this is a case in which his costs are taken away by the Legislature in plain, unambiguous words.

Then it is said that there are words in the section which show that that was not the intention of the statute—"unless in any such action, whether founded on contract or on tort, a judge of the High Court certifies that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court." It appears from those words that the only person who can interfere with the universality of this enactment, which absolutely takes away costs in certain cases, is "a judge of the High Court." The section does not merely say "a judge"; so that there can be no doubts, and no such practice can arise as to the exercise of this power by the judge of the county court as appears to have arisen under the earlier Act. This certificate can only be given by a judge of the High Court, and it is therefore impossible for the county court judge to allow costs in a case which comes within section 116.

It was said, again, that this statute has received judicial construction from the Court of Appeal, by which we are bound. But the case of Harris v. Judge, so far from giving countenance to the contention of the appellant, is in favour of the respondent. That was an action remitted to a county court in which the plaintiffs recovered more than £20, though less than £50. It was sought to obtain, after the trial in the county court, an order to tax the costs upon the High Court scale, and the Lords Justices held that there was no jurisdiction to make such an order. They all concurred in holding that the Act of 1888 applies to such an action, and that if a plaintiff brings such an action in the High Court he does so at the peril of being deprived of his costs. It is said that that is a hardship; but it seems to me that the view taken by the Legislature is that a suitor cannot be prevented from bringing his action in the High Court, but that he must run the risk, if he fails to recover £20 in an action founded on contract, of losing all costs whatever. I can see nothing inexpedient in that view. Not only are we deciding according to the express words of the statute, but our decision is supported by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case to which I have referred.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to decide is whether this case is governed by section 65 or by section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Section 65 applies only to actions founded on contract brought in the High Court, but it includes certain actions founded on contract which could not have been commenced in a county court; it gives power to order the transfer of such actions to the county court, and it deals with the costs of such actions—"the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the county courts." That is a general provision, and I do not apprehend that there is anything to prevent the Legislature from introducing exceptions with respect to actions which would otherwise fall within section 65. They have done so by section 116, which relates to actions founded upon contract and also to actions founded upon tort, but only to actions which could have been commenced in a county court; that section, therefore, only deals with a part of the subject-matter which is dealt with by section 65.

For saying that section 116 applies to actions which have been remitted from the High Court to the county court we have the authority of the Court of Appeal in Harris v. Judge, for all the judges who decided that case were agreed that it applies. The judgment of Lindley, L.J., is not quite so clear as to this, as are the judgments of the other two Lords Justices, who are very express on the point. But that that was the view of Lindley, L.J., is manifest, because he held that the plaintiff in that case, who had brought his action in the High Court, and whose action had been remitted to the county court, could not have his costs upon the High Court scale when he had recovered more than £20, but less than £50. Lindley, L.J., therefore, as well as the other Lords Justices, held that section 116 applied, and also that a judge of the High Court had no jurisdiction to grant a certificate under that section. The other Lords Justices are express upon the question, and Kay, L.J., at the close of his judgment puts it in the strongest possible language. He says:—"Section 65 empowers a judge at chambers to transfer any actions in which not more than £100 is claimed to a county court, and provides that when the order is made, 'the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein.' The costs subsequent to the transfer are to be on the county court scale, 'and the costs of the order and all proceedings previously thereto shall be allowed' on the High Court scale. After such transfer therefrom the judge of the High Court has no further jurisdiction in the action. And as to costs, if less than £50 is recovered, in my opinion, section 116 applies, and not section 65, and only county court costs can be given as to any part of the action." Therefore the Lord Justice expresses a strong conviction that section 65 is qualified by section 116, and that section 116 applies to all actions which might have been commenced in a county court when they have been commenced in the High Court and transferred to a county court. If section 116 applies, it is clear that if the plaintiff recovers less than £20 he cannot get any costs unless he brings himself within the proviso. Lindley, L.J., in Harris v. Judge says:—"In a transferred action the rules contained in section 116 must, in my opinion, be applied by the judge of the county court to which the action has been transferred." I should have a difficulty in following that, and the other Lords Justices express no such view. But that question does not arise here, for the plaintiff does not rely on any certificate under the proviso in section 116, but asserts that he is entitled to his costs without any such certificate. I think it is clear, and in accordance with the decision in Harris v. Judge, that in the absence of such a certificate—which the plaintiff has not obtained, and, perhaps, could not obtain—he is not entitled to have his costs taxed by the registrar, and that the county court judge was right in so holding.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF MISKIN HIGHER. (a.)

Licensing law — Renewal — Grounds of objection — "Disorderly character"—Evidence—Justices' discretion—Licensing Acts, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42; and 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.

Upon an application for the renewal of a licence, the notice of objection pursuant to section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, stated three grounds of objection, one of which was, "That your house is of a disorderly character." Upon the hearing of the application the justices admitted evidence of three convictions against previous holders of the licence, but it was admitted that the applicant bore a good character.

Held, that the evidence was properly admitted, inasmuch as it was not necessary that evidence directed to the disorderly character of a licensed house, should be confined to such matters only as affected the personal character of the applicant by showing that he himself had contributed to the disorderly character of the house.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to justices to hear and determine.

The facts are shortly as follows: An application was made to the justices of Miskin Higher by a man named Pitman, the licensed occupier of the Angel Inn at Aberdare, for a renewal of his licence. Previous to the general annual licensing meeting he had received notice of opposition from the superintendent of police for the district in the following terms: "That I shall at the next general licensing meeting object to the renewal to you of the licence to sell intoxicating liquors at your house, 'The Angel Inn,' upon the following grounds: That a house licensed for the sale of such liquors is not required in the neighbourhood in which your house is situate. That your house is of a disorderly character. That your house is not structurally adapted for the business carried on there."

At the general annual licensing meeting on the 23rd of August, 1892, the application was adjourned as objected to, until the adjourned licensing meeting on the 27th of September, and notice was served on the applicant requiring him to attend personally. On the hearing of the case evidence was tendered in support of the objection to the effect that in 1880, 1890, and 1891 previous holders of the licence had been convicted of permitting drunkenness and of keeping the house open on Sunday. This evidence was objected to by the solicitor to the applicant, as no notice had been received that such ground would be relied upon, but the justices admitted the evidence. Evidence was also given as to the structural defects, but that ground was ultimately withdrawn, and it was admitted that the applicant was of good character. The justices decided to refuse the renewal of the licence, the chairman stating that they did so on the ground of the previous convictions. A rule nisi was then obtained for a mandamus to the justices to rehear the application.

By section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), it is provided that "where a licensed person applies for the renewal of his licence the following provisions shall have effect":—Sub-section 2. "The justices shall not entertain any objection to the renewal of such licence, or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of such licence has been served on such holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting: provided that the licensing justices may, notwithstanding that no notice has been given, on an objection being made, adjourn the granting of any licence to a future day, and require the attendance of the holder of the licence on such day, when the case will be heard, and the objection considered, as if the notice hereinbefore prescribed had been given." "Subject as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore."

By section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), it is provided that ". . . a notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of a licence under section 42 of the principal Act shall not be valid unless it states in general terms the grounds on which the renewal of such licence is to be opposed."

J. V. Austin, for the justices, showed cause.—First, if the applicant is properly before the court on any objection whatever the justices have jurisdiction to exercise their discretion judicially upon any ground, even although it is not specified in the notice of objection. The sections nowhere say that the only grounds on which the justices shall act are those specified: see per Lush, L.J., in Ex parte Martin, 40

J. P., at p. 133. The 42nd section leaves the justices' discretion unfettered when the provisions of the section have been complied with, and when the objection is not personal to the applicant notice is not necessary: Sharp v. Wakefield, 39 W. R. 561, [1891] A. C., per Lord Hannen, at p. 188. Secondly, the previous convictions were evidence of the disorderly character of the "house," which was one of the grounds specified in the notice of objection, and the only way in which you can arrive at what "is" the character of the house is by reference to its history.

J. Paterson, in support of the rule.—As to the second point, evidence of conviction of previous holders of the licence could not be relevant against the present applicant. The disorderly character contemplated by the objection must mean the character of the man, not of the house: bricks and mortar could not be disorderly. But even if it were relevant such evidence would not make the house of a disorderly character; every technical irregularity renders a landlord liable to conviction. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—But the Act of 1872 enacted that it should be a ground of objection that the house was of a disorderly character, which seems to show that the Legislature were not of your view.] That must mean in strictness the character of the occupier. [WILLS, J.—But by the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, it is a ground of objection to an applicant for the first time.] Even if this were a house within that Act, and the applicant was found to be of good character, no conviction of a former holder of the licence would be admissible in evidence: Reg. v. Justices of Merthyr Tydvil, 14 Q. B. D., per Lord Coleridge, C.J., at p. 587, 33 W. R. Dig. 122. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—My remarks there applied to a different part of the section.]

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It is an application for a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine, and their answer is that they have done so. It is said that the application was not heard upon proper grounds or upon proper evidence. I don't agree. I think the justices have acted within their powers.

Now the applicant was a man of good character. The notice of objection stated that "the house is of a disorderly character." The evidence given in support of that was three convictions, all of which might have taken place without personal discredit to the applicant, but were such as, in the minds of the justices, showed that the house was disorderly. Mr. Paterson says that bricks and mortar cannot be "disorderly"; but in one sense I do not agree with him, and Parliament apparently does not do so either, because Parliament, in the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, s. 8, sub-section (2), says that the licence may be refused to a new applicant because the "house" is "disorderly." That is a parliamentary phrase, and in the Act it is distinguished from the character of the applicant, and the objection is, therefore, a perfectly fair one.

Then it is said, even supposing it is so, the evidence here is not receivable, because it has nothing to do with the personal character of the applicant. True; but it applies to the house, and I have already observed that the house and the character of the applicant are distinguished by the Legislature. Again, it is said that the evidence was insufficient. That is, of course, a question of fact for the justices. There are cases in which one conviction would suffice; there are others in which very many would not.

The larger question has been practically settled in the House of Lords, and it is not for other tribunals to fritter away their decision; but I give my judgment upon the ground that the justices had jurisdiction.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the short result of Sharp v. Wakefield as to this is that the justices are at liberty to go into other relevant grounds which may suggest themselves, but when the objection is not personal to the applicant it is not necessary to give notice. But here I think that does not apply, because they did act upon the ground specified in the notice of objection. The question is, therefore, whether they had any evidence of it. It is no doubt a good objection if it is not specified, but Mr. Paterson says that it means no more than that the applicant has contributed to the disorderly character of the house. I cannot agree, for I think the policy of the Act was to mean a good deal more. In the Wine and Beerhouse Act of 1869 expressions are used which show what really is meant. Under that Act a certificate is granted for a year, and it is made an objection to a new applicant that the "house" is of a disorderly character (section 8, sub-section (2)). I think the policy of the Act was intended to insure good order. Everyone knows what a well-conducted house means; it is in one sense a solecism, but it is a common expression applicable to what is done in the house, and I think the Legislature deliberately intended, no matter whose hands the house was in, that if the house had a certain character stamped upon it, the justices might consider it. I think the evidence was perfectly legitimate, and if I had to decide the question of character, about the first question I should ask would be, whether there had been any previous convictions. I think that Parliament intended that that state of things should not be got rid of, by merely transferring the business.

FELLOWS v. OWNERS OF THE VESSEL "LORD STANLEY." (a.)

County court—Practice—Liverpool Court of Passage—Admiralty jurisdiction—Rule empowering registrar to give summary judgment—Invalidity—Prohibition—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 10, 12, 23, 25, 35—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), ss. 1, 6.

Under section 6 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act, 1869, the assessor of the Court of Passage, Liverpool, has power to make general rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the admiralty jurisdiction of that court.

Held, that a rule conferring on the registrar of the court a power of summary judgment similar to that exercised under order 14 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, was invalid.

Motion for a prohibition to prohibit the enforcement of an order made by the deputy registrar of the Liverpool Court of Passage, referred to the court by the judge in chambers.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was an admiralty action in rem brought in the Court of Passage, Liverpool, to recover a sum of money alleged to be due to the plaintiffs for services rendered by them as seamen on the vessel Lord Stanley.

The action was defended by the mortgagee in possession of the vessel.

The plaintiffs took out a summons in the Court of Passage, calling on the defendant to show cause why the plaintiffs should not sign final judgment in the action.

The defendant objected that there was no jurisdiction in the Court of Passage to make a summary order for judgment, but the deputy registrar overruled the objection and made an order giving the plaintiffs leave to sign final judgment for the amount claimed and costs. The deputy registrar acted under an order for "regulating and amending the practice and procedure" of the Court of Passage made on the 10th of February, 1882, by the assessor and presiding judge of the court. That order was as follows:—"Whereas it is desirable in admiralty actions in rem or in personam brought in the said Court of Passage to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money, with or without interest, upon a contract, express or implied (as, for instance, for wages, necessaries, towage, or payment of a liquidated amount of money), and the writ of summons has been specially indorsed with the particulars of the amounts sought to be recovered after giving credit for any payment or set-off, the plaintiff shall be at liberty where the defendant appears to a writ of summon so indorsed, or where a third person, by leave of the court, intervenes in any such action, to apply for leave to enter up judgment or decree, and to issue execution thereupon as hereinafter mentioned; I do order that when an appearance has been entered to a writ of summons so specially indorsed as aforesaid, the plaintiff may, on affidavit made by himself or by any other person who can swear positively to the debt or cause of action, verifying the cause of action and stating in his belief that there is no defence to the action, call on the defendant or such third person to show cause before the assessor or registrar why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to enter up judgment or decree for the amount so indorsed, together with interest, if any, and costs. A copy of the affidavit shall accompany the summons or notice of motion. The assessor or registrar may thereupon, unless the defendant or such third person as aforesaid, by affidavit or otherwise, satisfy the assessor or registrar that he has a good defence to the action on the merits, or disclose such facts as may be deemed sufficient to entitle him to defend, make an order empowering the plaintiff to enter up judgment or decree accordingly, and to proceed to execution thereupon as in ordinary cases in admiralty actions in the said court."

J. D. Crawford, in support of the writ.—Admiralty jurisdiction was conferred on the Court of Passage by section 25 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, which gave it the same powers in admiralty as were conferred on county courts which have admiralty jurisdiction. Section 13 of that Act provides that admiralty causes in county courts are to be heard by the judge, and (section 10) are to be tried in the same way as civil causes. This order as to procedure made by the assessor, conferring jurisdiction on the registrar, is contrary to these provisions. Section 6 of the amending Act of 1869 (which Act is to be read as one with the Act of 1868) gives the assessor power to make rules and orders regulating the practice and procedure of the Court of Passage, but it was only intended that the assessor should have the same power of making rules as county court judges had by section 35 of the Act of 1868. This order gives, in effect, the procedure of order 14 to the Court of Passage, but county courts have no such procedure, and it was the intention of these statutes to deal with the Court of Passage on the same basis as county courts.

He referred to The Ganges, 5 P. D. 247, 29 W. R. Dig. 61; Speers v. Daggers, 1 Cababé & Ellis, 503.

Dr. Commins, for the plaintiffs.—The writ should be refused. This is not a question of jurisdiction, but of procedure, and the order is a valid order.

Pickford (Joseph Walton, Q.C., and W. F. Taylor with him), on behalf of the Mayor and Corporation of Liverpool, opposed the motion for the writ.—The assessor of the Court of Passage had power to make this rule. The power to make rules given to him by section 6 of the Act of 1869 is the same as that given to the judges of the High Court. The latter have in certain cases delegated their jurisdiction to masters, and so in this case the assessor has delegated his jurisdiction to the registrar. The assessor has power to make rules and regulations dealing with the practice and procedure of his court. The use of the word procedure shows that something wider than practice in the ordinary sense of the word was intended, and it would include such a rule as this one, for the power to proceed summarily is a procedure.

He referred to In re Mills, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24; Ind v. Emmerson, 36 W. R. 243, 12 App. Cas. 300.

Crawford replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The question to be determined in this case is whether the judge of the Court of Passage, Liverpool, had power to make a rule of practice which, in effect, applies order 14 to the practice of the Passage Court. The argument that he had such power depends on a number of statutes and on rules which have been made by the judges dealing with practice and procedure. It might be hard to say that the subject-matter of this rule is not covered by the word procedure; but I do not decide the question on that ground. The case turns on the construction of two Acts of Parliament, the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, and the amending Act of 1869, which are to be read together as one Act. By the Act of 1868 it is enacted that admiralty cases in county courts and in the Liverpool Court of Passage shall be heard and determined by the judge, and by the judge alone, in like manner as civil cases are heard and determined in county courts. By section 35 general orders are to be made for the purpose of regulating the practice and procedure of the admiralty jurisdiction of county courts and by section 6 of the Act of 1869 the assessor of the Court of Passage is empowered to make rules and orders as to the procedure and practice of that court. Taking into consideration the fact that the two Acts are to be read together as one Act, it cannot be doubted that the judge of the Court of Passage had the same power to make rules as a county court judge, and I do not think it can be contended that, this jurisdiction having been conferred on a particular set of courts, of which the court in question is one, those courts had the power of altering their jurisdiction and proceeding in a manner contrary to the definite enactment of the statutes. But it is said that there is a difference as to the judge of the Court of Passage, because by the later statute he has apparently the power to make rules without the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, and that therefore he can proceed in a way in which no other county court judge can. I am not prepared to say that that may not be the case, but in my opinion that does not signify, because the question is whether, reading the two Acts together, a power is given to the assessor of the Court of Passage which it is impossible to argue is conferred on county court judges. The Acts are to be read as one Act, giving for the first time a statutory jurisdiction, and ordering in plain terms that statutory jurisdiction to be exercised in a particular way, and I do not see how they can be read as giving power to repeal a part of the Act itself and to exercise the jurisdiction in a different way.

Now that would probably be sufficient to decide this case—namely, that the jurisdiction for this purpose is statutory; that the judge has powers which are statutory powers; that he is to exercise them according to the statute, and that there is in this Act of Parliament nothing to show that he has power to repeal the very Act which confers the jurisdiction upon him, and to exercise that jurisdiction in a way totally contrary to that Act. It has been pointed out, if this power exists in the judge of the Passage Court, it exists without the limitations which have been thought necessary to the exercise of the powers in every other case. No other county court has got it. No set of rules framed by the county court judges contain this power, and, further, in the cases of the superior courts the power to apply order 14 has been limited by a variety of safeguards which do not exist in this Act. The rules have to be laid before Parliament and are liable to be annulled. But there is no such provision here with regard to the judge of the Passage Court, so that, if the power contended for exists, the assessor of the Passage Court might make a rule of this sort without appeal and without its being annulled or altered or varied by any authority except his own.

It appears to me, apart from the conclusions to be drawn from the plain words of the Act of Parliament, that such a conclusion as that, which must be the result of the argument on the other side, is a very strong argument in support of the conclusion at which I have arrived from the words themselves. I am aware that where words of a statute are clear, we must interpret them according to their natural meaning, whatever the consequences may be; but it is a strong argument in favour of the reasonable conclusion to show that a conclusion that is unreasonable would follow from a construction that is not in accordance with the plain words of the Act. I am, therefore, of opinion that this prohibition should go.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add. It seems to me that Mr. Pickford is right in saying that, as far as the expression "practice and procedure" is concerned, it is sufficient to cover, at all events, one part of the subject-matter of this rule, namely, the application of what is commonly called order 14; whether it is sufficient to cover the other part, namely, the transference of jurisdiction from the judge of the Passage Court to the registrar, may be more open to question I think, because it does not seem to me that the relative positions of the judge of the Passage Court and the registrar of the Passage Court are at all analogous to the relations which subsist between the judges of the High Court and the masters. As I had occasion to point out in a similar case—Speers v. Daggers—the assessor of the Passage Court occupies a somewhat anomalous position, and is not like a judge of the High Court. He is only a statutory assessor who has the right to preside at trials and to give judgment there. He has no jurisdiction in chambers, nor indeed any jurisdiction except that conferred by certain Acts of Parliament. Under them there is no appeal from the registrar to the assessor. Therefore the analogy relied on in support of the power to transfer the jurisdiction is incomplete. But I do not think that it is necessary to decide that question, and I would rather leave it to be further considered should a similar question arise on a future occasion. It seems to me that the answer to Mr. Pickford's argument is what the Lord Chief Justice has pointed out, namely, that in section 10, section 13, and section 23 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, the jurisdiction to deal with admiralty matters is in terms cast upon the judge, and there is the very significant fact that section 23 provides that "the court may order, and the registrar, on such order, may seal and issue process."

I think that this rule which the learned assessor has made amounts to a repeal of part of the very Act under, and for the purposes of, which the rule was made. The power to make the rules is confined to making rules under the Act, and I think a rule which repeals so important a part of the Act as I have indicated, and takes away the jurisdiction of the assessor and casts it upon the registrar is a repeal pro tanto of the Acts of 1868 and 1869.

I therefore come without hesitation on this part of the case to the same conclusion as has been already arrived at by the Lord Chief Justice, and I think this prohibition must go.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — Jan. 30.

Ex parte TAYLOR & SONS. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Judgment creditors — Appointment of receiver of equitable interest—Secured creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 45, 168.

In July, 1891, judgment was obtained by the applicants in an action for £316, under which execution was issued against the debtor's goods with no effect. In January, 1892, the debtor became entitled under the will of his mother to a share in the residuary real and personal estate of the testatrix; and in March, 1892, the applicants obtained an order in the action appointing a receiver in respect of such share. In May, 1892, the debtor was adjudged bankrupt. On motion by the applicants for a declaration that they were secured creditors in respect of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under his mother's will, by virtue of the order appointing the receiver by way of equitable execution of the said share,

Held, that the order obtained by the applicants did not constitute them secured creditors of the debtor, and that the application for a declaration to that effect must, therefore, be refused.

Application for a declaration that certain creditors of the debtor were secured creditors.

On the 25th of July, 1891, the applicants, Messrs. Daniel Taylor & Sons, recovered judgment against the debtor in an action in the Queen's Bench Division for £316 15s. for goods sold and delivered, and £7 10s. costs. Under this judgment the applicants issued a writ of fi. fa. against the goods of the debtor, but were unable to recover anything.

In January, 1892, the debtor became entitled, under the will of his mother, to a share in the residuary real and personal estate of the testatrix; and on the 31st of March, 1892, the applicants obtained in the action an order appointing one Edward Cecil Moore receiver of the moneys receivable in respect of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under the will of his mother. The order further provided that such receiver should have liberty, if he should think proper, out of the moneys to be received by him, to keep down the interest on any prior incumbrances, and be allowed such payments in passing his accounts, and that "such receiver shall, on the 30th day of June next, and at such further and other times as may be ordered by the master, leave and pass such accounts, and shall, on the 30th day of July next, and at such further and other times as may be hereafter ordered by the master, pay the balance or balances appearing due on the accounts so left, or such part thereof, as shall be certified as proper to be so paid, such sums to be paid in or towards satisfaction of what shall for the time being be due in respect of the judgment signed on the 25th day of July, 1891, for the sum of £316 15s. debt, and £7 10s. for costs, making together the sum of £324 5s."

The estate of the debtor's mother consisted of land and other property, and the executors, in pursuance of the trusts of the will for sale and conversion, got in the estate, and were now in a position to distribute to the beneficiaries and persons claiming through them.

On the 16th of May, 1892, a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition upon which he was adjudicated bankrupt.

No payment had yet been made by the executors either to the receiver appointed in the action or to the trustee in the bankruptcy, and application was in consequence now made to the court by Messrs. Taylor & Sons, the applicants asking by their notice of motion for a declaration that they were secured creditors of the debtor in respect of the share to which the debtor was entitled in the residuary estate under the will of his mother, by virtue of the order appointing the receiver by way of equitable execution of the said share.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Micklem, for the applicants.—The real question is the proper construction to be put on the order appointing the receiver. Section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, clearly contemplates a procedure such as this, and that in the case of an equitable interest execution is to be by appointment of a receiver. There is no means of getting at an equitable interest except in that way. In the case of In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington & Co., 37 W. R. 130, 22 Q. B. D. 187, the receiver was merely a receiver against goods, and the decision really only dealt with the particular order in that case. It cannot be intended that no process shall be available against a debtor's equitable interest. What was said in the later case of Levasseur v. Mason, 39 W. R. 596, [1891] 2 Q. B. 73, gets rid of any general effect of the decision in In re Dickenson. The applicants are clearly, secured creditors in respect of the bankrupt's interest under his mother's will by virtue of the order which they obtained.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The case of In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington & Co. is an authority that a receivership order does not give a mortgage, charge, or lien, and does not make a creditor a secured creditor. That view was also taken by Cave, J., in the case of In re Tillett, Ex parte Kingscote, 6 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 70; and your lordship expressed the same opinion in the recent case of In re Hastings, Ex parte Brown, 9 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 234. The order which the applicants obtained does not make them secured creditors; and, in any event, it is not a process of execution which has been completed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is an application by Messrs. Daniel Taylor & Sons for a declaration that they are secured creditors of the debtor in respect of the share to which the debtor is entitled in the residuary estate under the will of his mother, by virtue of an order appointing a receiver by way of equitable execution of the said share. I am of opinion that Messrs. Taylor & Sons are not entitled to the order for which they ask. Mr. Reed argued this case principally with reference to section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. His contention was that equitable execution of the character which one has in this case was execution within the meaning of section 45; and then he said that the execution had been completed and that under those circumstances he was under the terms of section 45 entitled to the benefit of the execution. In my opinion the position of Messrs. Taylor & Sons in this case is not that of creditors who have issued execution within the meaning of section 45. I think that section 45 only applies to the cases which are specified in it, and this case is not one of those cases. Under those circumstances I pass by section 45 because I think it has no application.

That being so the only remaining question is whether Messrs. Taylor & Sons are secured creditors. The person who drafted the notice of motion in this case seems to have apprehended very clearly the true question to be decided. In my opinion Messrs. Taylor & Sons are not secured creditors. Section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that after the making of a receiving order no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings. But this section shall not affect "the power of any secured creditor to realize or otherwise deal with his security in the same manner as he would have been entitled to realize or deal with it if this section had not been passed." The result of that is that if a creditor is not a secured creditor he is debarred by section 9 from taking advantage of any legal process against the debtor, and section 10 expressly provides for the stay of any such process. Therefore I have only to ascertain what is the definition of a secured creditor, and to see whether Messrs. Taylor & Sons bring themselves within it. The definition of secured creditor is in section 168, which says "secured creditor" means "a person holding a mortgage, charge, or lien on the property of the debtor, or any part thereof, as a security for a debt due to him from the debtor." I am of opinion that the result of what happened in this case has not been to make Messrs. Taylor & Sons secured creditors within the definition. I think that the case of In re Dickenson, Ex parte Charrington & Co., although it is in some respects a decision on the particular order which was brought before the court in that case, yet it does decide some matters generally with regard to the effect of an order appointing a receiver obtained by a judgment creditor for the purpose of what is called an equitable execution. And it seems to me it does plainly decide that such an order obtaining a receiver against goods does not make the person who has obtained it a secured creditor. In the case of In re Tillett, Ex parte Kingscote, Cave,

J., seems to have taken the same view. It is said that I ought not to deal with the case of In re Dickenson as having decided that a person who has obtained such an order is not a secured creditor within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, because the later case of Levasseur v. Mason has in effect decided that the decision in In re Dickenson was not a decision deciding any such general proposition, but was merely a decision as to the effect of a particular and somewhat imperfect order. But I do not so understand the judgments in Levasseur v. Mason. I am very far from saying that there are not expressions in the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., which do look as if he were speaking of judgment creditors who obtain the order for a receiver as having obtained by the order rights with regard to the goods which made them secured creditors. But he in no part of his judgment really decides anything of the sort. On the contrary, the case of In re Dickenson is cited to him, and he in no way expresses disapproval of it. Then when I read the other judgments of the court it seems to me they take the view of the effect of an order such as this, which is entirely consistent with the view taken in In re Dickenson. The receivership order does not alter the property in the goods, and it does not give the person who obtains the order any lien on the goods. Under those circumstances I must refuse the present application, with costs.

Application dismissed.

Solicitor — Remuneration — "Attendances"—Discretion of taxing master—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, Schedule 2.

Under Schedule 2 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, prescribing a charge of 10s. for an "ordinary" attendance, and giving the taxing master power in "extraordinary cases" to increase or diminish that charge "if for any special reasons he shall think fit," it is a question for the discretion of the taxing master whether or not a case is "extraordinary" as being more simple or more difficult than a normal fair average case. In extraordinary cases, where the taxing master increases or diminishes the "ordinary" charge, he must have special reasons for so doing, but he is not bound to state his special reasons till he formally answers the objections to his taxation.

Decision of North, J., ante, p. 37, affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J., reported ante, p. 37, where the facts are considered to be set out sufficiently for the purposes of the present report.

The solicitors appealed against so much of the decision as dealt with their first objection—that of "attendances."

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the appellants.—The answer of the taxing master shows that he took a wrong basis for his taxation; he took 6s. 8d. instead of 10s. as the proper charge for an ordinary attendance. He must state his special reasons, which he did not do.

J. G. Butcher, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think we need hear the respondents in this case. This is an appeal from a decision of North, J., upholding the master in the taxation of a bill of costs, to which objections had been taken in the ordinary course. The appeal raises, or is intended to raise, a question of some little importance upon that part of Schedule 2 of the General Order relating to the remuneration of solicitors, which runs thus—under the head of "Attendances": —"In ordinary cases, 10s.; in extraordinary cases the taxing master may increase or diminish the above charge if for any special reasons he shall think fit." In this particular case the solicitors have carried in bills, and the taxing master has either disallowed or reduced a great number of charges of 10s. for attendances. The solicitors have carried in objections to forty-three items, and they have very properly grouped them together, and their objection runs thus: "The attendances represented by the items the subject of this objection were ordinary attendances in an ordinary case, for each of which attendances the solicitors are entitled to charge 10s. under Schedule 2"—which I have just read—"and it is submitted that, this not being an extraordinary case within the meaning of the same schedule, a taxing master has no discretionary power to increase or diminish the authorized charge. It is further submitted that in no case can a taxing master diminish the authorized charge for an attendance without special reasons. It is also submitted that as solicitors were formerly entitled to 6s. 8d. an hour, they were now entitled to 10s. an hour."

Now the taxing master has put in an answer to those objections, and I will read the first half page. He says, "This objection" (that is, the one I have referred to) "comprises a large number of items of the same class—i.e., 'attendances'—for each of which the solicitor has made a charge of 10s. at least. Many of these items I have in my discretion diminished. It is contended by the objectors that I have no discretionary power either to increase or diminish the 10s. items in question, on the ground that they are not of an extraordinary nature within the meaning of the General Order. I am not sure I precisely understand what is here meant by 'extraordinary.' In the present case many of the attendances were of an extraordinarily simple character, as will be found on reference to the items themselves."

Then there are some further observations which I will not read. Sir Horace Davey, I think, read them, and they are fresh in our recollection.

Now the points which are important are these. First of all, what is meant by an "ordinary" attendance, and who is to decide when an attendance is "ordinary" or "extraordinary"? I take it that "extraordinary" means in the schedule everything which is not ordinary. An attendance may be such as to deserve a payment of more than 10s., and if the taxing master thinks so he can allow it. An attendance may be such that it may not deserve 10s. In that case the taxing master need not allow it, but he is to allow 10s. for an ordinary attendance if it is in his judgment properly necessary, about which I will say something presently. I do not know how to define "ordinary attendance" except by repeating the word "ordinary," or by adopting the paraphrase put upon it by North, J., a normal fair average case.

Now, it has been contended by Sir Horace Davey that the taxing master has taken the wrong standard, and has applied the rule that 6s. 8d., and not 10s., ought to be allowed for ordinary attendances. If that had been made out I think the taxing master would have misconstrued the rule, and would have been wrong. I do not think it is made out. When you look at the bill of costs it appears to me that what he has done is this. He has looked at each item and considered, first of all, whether it is a case in which an attendance ought to be charged for at all. It does not follow that because there has been an attendance 10s. is to be had for it. A great deal of business may be done by attendances, for the purpose of getting 10s., which ought to be done in some other way, so as to avoid so large a charge. The taxing master has a discretion. He is not bound to 10s. because there has been an attendance and something has been done. That is not what he is bound to do. He is bound to protect people against unnecessary attendances, and that is no easy matter. I am satisfied that the taxing master has not done that which it was contended he had done—namely, adopted a 6s. 8d. instead of a 10s. rule—but what he has done is what he ought to have done. He has looked at each attendance and considered whether it was proper to have an attendance at all, and sometimes he has struck them out altogether; and what is very curious is that a great many of these are not objected to. But when he has not done that, he has considered the nature of the thing, and he has come to this conclusion, that, if the work done at an attendance was so trifling that it might well be done in some other way, he has not disallowed it altogether, but he has struck off 3s. 4d., or 6s. 8d. sometimes, and has reduced it; he is quite right, and if there was an attendance, and the work was done properly at an attendance, but still the work was so slight that 10s. is an absurd charge, he has not allowed it; but what he has done is precisely what he ought to have done: he has considered each attendance separately by itself, and he has not done that which it was urged he had done. So, therefore, it appears to me he has not gone wrong.

Then it was said there must be special reasons, and he must state them. Reasons of course he must have; reasons for departing from the rule must exist, but he is not bound to state the special reasons every time he marks off 3s. 4d. or 6s. 8d. He must state his reasons some time or other, and the time for stating his reasons is when he formally answers the objections which are made to the taxation. Then he has got to state his reasons. He must have them at the time, and he must state them then. That he has done.

It appears to me the true conclusion, therefore, is this: That the master has not gone wrong on the principle, but that he has done that which he is entitled to do and ought to do. That being the case, it is unnecessary to discuss any particular item. I will merely refer to item forty-three, on which Sir Horace Davey made a point, and on which some attendance is struck out. It illustrates no principle, and therefore I do not care to discuss it. I do not know whether the master was right or wrong. We do not go into such matters as that. We sit here simply to see whether he has taxed the bill upon the right principle. I do not know anything about item forty-three. It does not illustrate a principle. I think, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs in the usual way.

LOPES, L.J.—Whether an attendance is to be placed on the one side or on the other side of an "ordinary" case, that is, by being more simple or more difficult than an "ordinary" case, is a question for the discretion of the master, and I am of opinion that if he exercises that discretion properly without violating any principle his decision is final and cannot be reviewed by this court. He has to consider the particular circumstances of each case and to exercise his judgment thereon. Now, it is said by Sir Horace Davey—and if he could have made it out no doubt he would have been entitled to succeed upon this application—that the master has acted on a wrong principle, namely, that in defiance of this schedule, and that part of it which relates to attendances and which says that in ordinary cases 10s. is to be charged, he has taken 6s. 8d. as the proper charge for an ordinary case. In my opinion he has not acted upon that principle. The learned judge in the court below so thought, and we have reason also to think that the master has not acted on that principle in any respect. Then it is provided that the taxing master may increase or diminish the above charge if for any special reasons he shall think fit. Now, it is said that he ought to have stated his special reason for either increasing or diminishing the charge, and, as I understand it, that he ought to have stated it at the time. But I cannot read that in the rule, nor do I think it can be so. It is quite enough, in my opinion, if, when the objection is taken, he states his special reason in his answer.

With regard generally to these attendances, one can quite imagine that attendances may be charged by certain people where no attendance was at all necessary, where, for instance, a letter or a message would have answered all the purpose of an attendance, and in such a case the master, I take it, would be quite right in striking out the charge for that attendance from the bill of costs altogether. I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Company — Shares — Transfer — Refusal to register — Certificate issued under forged transfer — Warranty — Estoppel — Measure of damages — Jurisdiction to order inquiry as to damages under the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 35.

On the 6th of April, 1892, G. bought shares in a company, and received from vendor a transfer and a certificate under the seal of the company signed by two directors and the secretary, certifying that the vendor was the proprietor of the shares. On the same day G. sent the transfer executed by himself, and accompanied by the certificate, to the company's office for registration. The company's clerk refused to accept the documents, saying that he had orders not to do so. G. and his solicitor again tendered the transfer and certificate, which the company's solicitor took, but stated that the company did not undertake to register G. as the owner of the shares. It appeared that the former secretary of the company had made fraudulent transfers, and had, by means of fraud, induced two of the directors to affix the seal of the com- pay to the certificate in question, and that, in consequence of the discovery of the fraud on the 5th of April, the registration of G. had been refused. At a board meeting on the 13th of April, 1892, the consideration of the transfer was ordered to stand for further consideration, and the transfer and certificate were returned to G. On the 31st of May, 1892, G. moved, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, that the register of members of the company might be rectified by inserting his name as the holder of the shares, and that the company might be ordered to pay him the damages occasioned by their refusal to register him as such holder. Between the 6th and the 13th of April the shares went down in value.

Stirling, J., made no order as to rectification, but directed an inquiry as to damages. The chief clerk certified that the amount of damages was the amount G. had paid for the shares on the 6th of April. The company moved to vary the certificate by decreasing the amount to the value of the shares on the 13th of April. Stirling, J., held that the company had refused the transfer on the 6th of April, and that the chief clerk was right in his assessment of the damages. The company appealed.

On the hearing of the appeal the court doubted whether Stirling, J., had jurisdiction to direct an inquiry as to damages under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, where there was no order for rectification, but, with the consent of the parties, agreed to treat the case as within that section.

Held, that the cause of action was not the representation contained in the certificate, but the refusal of the company to register, and that the date of such refusal was the 6th of April.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., on the 8th of November, 1892, refusing to vary the chief clerk's certificate by decreasing the amount of Goode's claim.

Goode, a member of the London Stock Exchange, on the 6th of April, 1892, purchased from Gardner, a jobber, 4,300 shares in the Ottos Kopje Diamond Mines (Limited), at 2s. 6d. a share, the shares being £1 shares with 19s. paid. Gardner handed him a transfer and a certificate sealed with the seal of the company and signed by two of the directors and the secretary, from which it appeared that Gardner was the proprietor of the shares, and Goode paid his purchase-money, £537 10s. He on the same day executed the transfer and sent it by his clerk together with the certificate to the company's office for registration, but the registrar of the company, who was acting temporarily as secretary, refused to accept them, saying that he had received orders not to do so. Goode on the same day went and tendered them personally, but they were again refused. On the 8th of August, 1892, Goode went with his solicitor, Mr. Solomon, to the company's office and again tendered the transfer and certificate with the transfer fee, but the clerk stated that he had instructions not to accept them, and referred Goode and his solicitor to the chairman of the company. They then had an interview with the chairman and two of the other directors and the solicitor of the company. Mr. Solomon tendered the transfer and certificate. The company's solicitor took them on behalf of the company, stating that the company did not undertake to register the applicant as owner of the shares. It appeared that the former secretary of the company had made fraudulent transfers of shares in the company and had falsified the share register, and had by means of fraud induced two of the directors of the company to affix the seal of the company to the certificate upon the faith of which Goode had paid his money. The fraud was discovered by the chairman of the company on the 5th of April, 1892, and in consequence of such discovery the transfer and certificate tendered by Goode were not taken in. On the 13th of April, 1892, a board meeting was held and the consideration of the transfer to Goode was ordered to stand for further investigation as to the frauds in connection with the certificate. The transfer and certificate were then demanded back and the transfer fee withdrawn.

The articles of the company provided:—(Article 17) The directors may refuse to register the transfer of any share not fully paid up in any of the following cases: If the transfer is made by a member who is indebted to the company; if the directors are not satisfied with the responsibility of the transferee; if the transferee shall fail to comply with the request made in pursuance of next article. (Article 18) Before approving or registering any instrument of transfer of any share, the directors may, if they think fit, require the transferee to produce to, and leave at the office of the company for examination the certificate of shares proposed to be transferred. (Article 23) All instruments of transfer shall be deposited with the company, and, if required, reasonable evidence shall be given to prove the title of the transferee, and thereupon the secretary shall register such transferee as a member.

On the 31st of May, 1892, a motion on behalf of Goode was made before Stirling, J., under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, that the register of members of the company might be rectified by inserting the name of the applicant therein as the holder of 4,300 shares, and that the company might be ordered to pay the applicant the damages suffered by him through the refusal of the company to insert his name as shareholder for the shares in question, or in the alternative that the company might be ordered to pay to the applicant the highest market value of the shares since the 6th of April, 1892. Upon the hearing of the motion Stirling, J., made no order as to rectification, but decided that Goode had brought himself within the decision in In re the Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., 16 W. R. 862, L. R. 3 Q. B. 584, inasmuch as the certificate purported to be a certificate that Gardner was the owner of the specified 4,300 shares, the distinctive numbers of which were given; and he directed an inquiry as to what damages had been sustained by the applicant by reason of the inability of the company to register him as the transferee of the said shares, and ordered that the company should, within fourteen days after the filing of the chief clerk's certificate to be made pursuant to the order, pay to the applicant what should be certified to be the amount of such damages. The chief clerk by his certificate, dated the 22nd of July, 1892, certified that the amount of the damages sustained by Goode was £537 10s., the amount paid by him for the shares, together with £8 13s. 8d., interest thereon at five per cent. from the 6th of April, 1892, to the time of payment. The company took out a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate by decreasing the sum of £537 10d. and disallowing the interest.

The question between the parties was whether the damages should be assessed according to the value of the shares on the 6th of April, 1892, when they stood at 2s. 6d., or according to the value on the 13th, when they stood at 2s.

Stirling, J., held that the company had refused to receive the transfer on the 6th of April, and had never gone back from that refusal; that the result was that from that day Goode was unable to sell the shares, which then stood at 2s. 6d., and had lost the money he had paid as from that time; and that the chief clerk was right in assessing the damages according to the value of the shares on that day. He directed that the interest should be computed at 4 per cent. instead of 5 per cent., but in other respects he dismissed the summons with costs.

The company appealed.

Butcher, for the appellants.—The cause of action was the refusal of the company to register Goode. The directors had under their articles and also by the general law a reasonable time to consider whether or not they would register him, and they were not bound to give an immediate decision: Société Générale de Paris v. Walker, 34 W. R. 665, 11 App. Cas. 20, 41. His transfer was only handed in on the 6th, and the time allowed for consideration cannot be taken to have expired before the 13th of April, when the board met, and the damages ought, therefore, to have been assessed according to the value of the shares on that date.

Buckmaster, for the respondent.—The measure of damages is the value of the shares on the 6th of April. Section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, says nothing as to the refusal of the company to register. The concluding words of that section do not apply, as Goode could never have been put on the register. [LINDLEY, L.J.—This is in the nature of an action for damages. Can such a remedy be obtained under section 35 of the Act of 1862 without a previous rectification of the register?] The order of Stirling, J., was made on that footing, and it has not been appealed against. The court has a discretionary power under section 35 as to the damages: In re Railway Time Tables Publishing Co., Sandy's case, 37 W. R. 531, 42 Ch. D. 98, and In re Addlestone Linoleum Co., 36 W. R. 227, 37 Ch. D. 191. [LINDLEY, L.J.—I never heard of damages being given under that section apart from rectification, but we shall not decide the case upon that point.] We are willing to waive any remedy at common law. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Very well. We can treat the matter as an action at common law if the parties consent. Butcher consented.] Goode bought the shares on the faith of the certificate which the company issued to Gardner, and the company thereupon became liable to him upon the warranty implied by such certificate: In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. The measure of the damages is the difference between the price Goode paid for the shares on the faith of the certificate and the actual value of what he purchased, which was nothing at all. The market price of the shares on the day he purchased is, therefore, the measure of damages. The refusal to register was on the 6th of April. We tendered the transfer then and it was refused, and has never been accepted. The directors can only refuse to register a transferee in the cases mentioned in the articles, and within none of them does the present case come. Registration is a purely ministerial act: In re Cawley & Co., Ex parte Hallett, 37 W. R. 692, 42 Ch. D. 209. The directors never exercised or attempted to exercise any discretion.

Butcher, in reply.—The action was not founded on any warranty. This was an innocent misrepresentation. The certificate was not a warranty of title; it merely estops the company from denying Gardner's title to the shares, and consequently Goode's title to be registered as his transferee: Tomkinson v. Balkis Consolidated Co., 39 W. R. 693, [1891] 2 Q. B. 614; Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., 39 W. R. 99, 25 Q. B. D. 512. That was the ground upon which In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. was decided, and also Hart v. The Frontino and Bolivia Gold Mining Co., L. R. 5 Ex. 111, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 57, which followed that case. The cause of action was not breach of warranty or estoppel, but the refusal to register. The transfer and certificate were not refused on the 6th of April. On the 8th, when Goode and his solicitor handed them in, they were accepted subject to what the directors might think fit to do, and they were not really refused until the 13th.

He also referred to Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82, in which the question of warranty was fully dealt with.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We have got at the facts of this case now. It comes before the court in a peculiar way by reason of an order of Stirling, J., which was not appealed from, dated the 31st of May, 1892, directing an inquiry as to what damages had been sustained by the applicants by reason of the inability of the company to register him as the transferee of 4,300 shares in the company. All I will say about that order is that I doubt whether there was jurisdiction to make it, as it appears to me that the only case where damages can be given under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, is where rectification is ordered. I only make that remark to guard against its being supposed that damages can be obtained by a summons under section 35 of the Act of 1862 instead of by an action at law. I pass that by, as no one wants the question raised, and the parties have agreed that the court should treat the case on the wider question, namely, what damages the company ought to pay.

The first contention put forward by Mr. Buckmaster was grounded upon the supposed authority of In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. He said that at the time when Gardner the transferor sold the shares, Gardner was the registered holder of them in the books of the company, and when the plaintiff was induced to buy the shares from Gardner on the faith of the certificates which he produced, the company came under an obligation by way of warranty to indemnify him against any loss he has incurred by buying the shares. I doubt that. I do not think that there is any case which goes to that length. I do not think that an action could be maintained upon the footing of warranty of the truth of the certificate by the company. It seems to me that the case of In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. was decided upon the footing that a company is bound by what is given under its common seal, and is estopped by reason of the certificate from denying the validity of the shares, but in order to give a person who has dealt on the faith of the certificate a right of action against the company there must be a breach of duty towards him by the company—that is to say, a purchaser is entitled to come to the company and show the certificate and transfer, and say, Register me as the holder of the shares, and if the transfer were in order and the company were estopped from denying the validity of the shares, they would be failing in their duty towards him if they did not register him. That is all that that case comes to. That would answer the purpose in the present case from one point of view, but not from another. Supposing that I am right, and that Goode's cause of of action was the improper refusal of the company to register him, the company cannot say in answer to that, that the transferor, Gardner, was wrongly on the register and had no right to transfer. Goode would be in a position to say to the company, "You are estopped from raising that, and you must register me," and if the company refused there would be a breach of duty on their part which would be actionable, and in respect of which they would have to pay damages. That is the ground upon which Goode would succeed in an action at law in recovering damages from the company.

Then comes the question, what damages ought he to recover. They must be ascertained in reference to the time of the refusal to register. When was that? When did the company refuse to take the transfer and to register it? Upon that there are two different views. Mr. Butcher argued that there was no definite refusal until the 13th of April, the date of the first board meeting after the transfer was presented. Mr. Buckmaster, on the other hand, said that the transfer was refused on the 6th, when the transfer was presented, and that what took place afterwards was only an endeavour to persuade the directors to reconsider their decision and accept the transfer. The 6th was fixed upon as the date upon the ground which I will proceed to explain. It is obvious that on the 5th of April the directors had found out that there was something wrong in the books, and they suspected that there was something wrong in the certificate given by the secretary of the company to Gardner, and I think it is plain that, acting upon that suspicion, they gave the person who was acting temporarily as secretary orders not to take in the transfer from Gardner to Goode or any one else, and on the 6th, when Goode took the certificate and transfer to the office of the company, they were twice rejected in the sense that the clerk would not look at them. He said in effect, "I am not going to lay them before the directors, they don't want them," and they were thus rejected, not because the directors wanted time to consider what they would do, but because they had already made up their minds to reject them. I take it that what Mr. Butcher urged upon us is well founded, both in law and good sense, that the directors were entitled to take time to consider the documents presented, however regular they might appear, but they did not want time when they had already made up their minds to reject the transfer. That is really what took place on the 6th, and it appears to be consistent with what took place on the 8th and afterwards. On the 8th Goode and his solicitor went to the directors to try to persuade them to reconsider the matter. They did not then refuse, they never did refuse, but after some consideration the matter was deferred to the 13th, and on the 13th they did not undo what they had already done. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the 6th was the real date on which the transfer was refused. Was it refused with sufficient cause? There is nothing to bring the case within section 35 of this Act The directors did not act under articles 17, 18, and 23. There was no pretence that Gardner was indebted to the company, or that Goode was not a sufficiently responsible person, and the directors did not reject him on that ground. They had already made up their minds that they would not accept him, and on this view, which was the one taken by the learned judge in the court below, I think the finding of the chief clerk was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think it is doubtful whether the application was really a proper one to make under section 35 of the Act of 1862, as the question is not really one of rectification, but of liability for damages apart from rectification; but as the parties have consented that it shall be treated as a settlement of the questions between them, we have to consider broadly whether the plaintiff is, as against the company, entitled to damages such as the law recognizes. I decline to admit the theory that a court of law or of equity has a discretion, when an injury has been done, to assess legal damages as an indemnity. The damages which can be recovered are only those which arise from some breach of duty or of contract: an act of commission or of omission which results in damage. What is the cause of action here? Mr. Buckmaster has said that the cause of action was the representation contained in the certificate, which, when it reached the hands of a transferor, amounted to a warranty to the transferee that the certificate was correct, and that thereupon an action upon an implied warrantry arose against the company, or that in some other way the giving of a certificate or promise by the company involved them in some liability to the person who received it from the transferor. It seems to me that the first step we have to make clear is that the giving of the certificate, although a representation to a possible transferee, does not, as between the company and the transferee, amount to more than a representation by the company to such transferee, which was intended to be shown to him at the time of sale. As between the company and the transferee the mere representation would not, unless it were fraudulent, give rise to a cause of action at common law unless there were either a duty on the part of the company towards the transferee at common law, or a contract at common law, express or implied, to make the representation good. That was the decision in Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337. If the transferee had a right of action upon the certificate, it could only be because there was an implied warranty between the company and him upon which an action for breach of contract could be brought against the company. There was no privity at all between the company and the transferee; neither was there any implied warranty.

It was said that the case of In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. shows that there was a cause of action in the nature either of an implied warranty upon the certificate, or an implied warranty arising out of the estoppel. A certificate is not, like a promissory note, a negotiable investment; it does not transfer a chose in action, it is only a representation of an implied contract. The case of In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. was in truth an attempt, which was successful, to make the company liable in the absence of fraud upon the estoppel created by the certificate, and the way in which the court made the company liable was this:—They said that if the certificate had been intended to have been acted upon, it became a document the truth of which the company could not deny as against the person to whom it was intended to be shown, and, therefore, it precluded them, as against such transferee, from denying the truth of what it contained, and they could not be in any better position than if the statement were true; but that only obliged the company to act towards the transferee as they would have been obliged to act towards him if his title were good. Until, therefore, the company did something which ought not to be done, or omitted to do something which ought to have been done, as between them and the true owner of the shares no cause of action would arise. Estoppel works in this way, that when, in addition to the other facts of the case, you have the incapacity of the company to deny the truth of the statement in the certificate, you must look to all the circumstances and consider whether, assuming the truth of the statements contained in the certificate, an action would not lie against the company. Estoppel works in such a case, but does not create in itself a cause of action.

That is the true view of the case of In re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., and, seeing that no cause of action arises upon the estoppel, the court must look for the cause of action upon the assumption that the company could not dispute the facts stated in the certificate. There must be a refusal by the company to do something that it was bound to do, or a refusal by an officer of the company to do what that officer was bound to do. The refusal relied on by Mr. Buckmaster was the refusal by the acting secretary on the 6th of April to take in or consider the transfer. Did he or did he not then refuse to do that which he ought to have done? I fully agree with what Lindley, L.J., has said, that the company must, as a matter of business, be entitled to some time, if they want it, to consider the documents which are brought to them. I know of no case where it has been held that a man is bound to act upon a document at the moment that it is presented to him, without being allowed time to consider if he wants to do so. I do not think it was intended in In re Cawley & Co. to decide that a company was not entitled to have time to consider a transfer; and in Société Générale de Paris v. Walker Lord Blackburn held that they were so entitled. It does not, however, follow that the directors were entitled to exercise the discretion given them by articles 17, 18, and 23. In a case which fell within those articles it would be hard to deny them an opportunity, before determining what they would do, of seeing the documents, of which they knew nothing; but in the present case the directors were not in that position. They had considered the case the day before, and when the secretary had the documents presented to him on the 6th they did not want time. They had made up their minds already, so that the refusal of the secretary to take the documents was not because the directors wanted time to consider them, but because they had made up their minds not to accept them. It was only on the 8th that the directors really considered the case at all. They ought, if they wanted time, to have accepted the documents on the 6th and then considered them. The cause of action therefore arose on the 6th. It is not a case in which it has turned out that the directors had any right on their side. All they can say is that they were entitled to time to perform what is in one sense a ministerial act—namely, registration—though I should not myself call it a ministerial act, and they only wanted reasonable time. They had considered the matter, and, therefore, did not require time, so that they cannot justify their defence to the claim of the transferee on that ground.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I have nothing to add. It seems to me that the case when worked out rests on a question of fact. It is admitted that the company did refuse, and the question lies between the 6th and the 13th. Did the company refuse on the 6th or the 13th of April? They certainly did not refuse on the 13th. It seems to me that the true inference to be drawn from the facts is, as has been pointed out, that the directors had made up their minds that something was wrong in the certificate granted to Gardner, and that they would refuse to transfer the shares standing in his name, whoever the transferee might be, so that when the transfer came from Mr. Goode the directors had made up their minds not to take it in, and they refused it twice on the same day. They refused to do what I should have thought they ought to have done on the 6th.

Appeal dismissed.

CORN AND ANOTHER (Appellants) v. MATTHEWS AND ANOTHER (Respondents). (a.)

Master and servant—Apprentice—Infant—Stipulation in apprenticeship deed not for benefit of infant—Validity—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 6.

An apprenticeship deed contained a stipulation that the master should not be liable to pay any wages to the apprentice, an infant, so long as his business should be interrupted or impeded by or in consequence of any turn out; and that the apprentice might employ himself in any other manner or with any other person for his own benefit during any such turn out, and for such reasonable time thereafter as might be necessary to enable him to determine such employment.

Held, that this stipulation was unfair to the infant, and rendered the contract as a whole unfair as against him; and that, therefore, the apprenticeship deed was invalid.

Meakin v. Morris, 32 W. R. 661, 12 Q. B. D. 352, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by a stipendiary magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The material facts were as follow:—The appellants were manufacturers of earthenware in Staffordshire; the respondent, Herbert Matthews, was an infant apprentice in the service of the appellants, and the other respondent was his father. The apprentice having absented himself from work, the appellants applied to the magistrate under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90 for an order that the respondents should perform the conditions and agreements contained in the apprenticeship deed.

By the apprenticeship deed, Herbert Matthews, an infant of the age of nineteen years, bound himself apprentice to the appellants to learn that branch of a potter's art or business called potter's printing, and to serve them as an apprentice for five years, excepting the usual holidays and days on which that branch of the business of the appellants should be at a standstill through accident beyond the appellants' control, and subject also to the provision hereinafter contained, and the masters covenanted to teach the apprentice, and to find him fair and reasonable work and to pay him as wages 7s. 3½d. per score dozens of printer's counts. The deed contained the following clause: "Provided always that the said masters shall not be liable or called upon to pay any wages to the said apprentice so long as their business shall or may be interrupted or impeded by or in consequence of any turn out, and the said apprentice is hereby expressly authorized and allowed during any such turn out, and for such reasonable time thereafter as may be necessary to enable him to determine such employment as hereinafter mentioned, to employ himself in any other manner or with any other person for his own benefit, and in case the said apprentice shall elect so to employ himself, the said masters shall not, during the time he so employs himself, be bound to teach and instruct the said apprentice or cause him to be taught and instructed as aforesaid." The father also covenanted that the apprentice should during the term serve the appellants and perform the conditions and agreements contained in the deed.

The magistrate held, upon the authority of Meakin

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

v. Morris, 32 W. R. 661, 12 Q. B. D. 352, that the clause above set out was to the detriment of the infant apprentice and rendered the deed void.

The Divisional Court (Wright and Bruce, JJ.) dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the case was governed by Meakin v. Morris.

Boddam, for the appellants.—The deed must be looked at as a whole to see if it is for the benefit of the infant. There may be one or two stipulations in it not for the benefit of the infant, but if the deed as a whole is for his benefit it is good: Leslie v. Fitzpatrick, 3 Q. B. D. 229, 26 W. R. Dig. 139; De Francesco v. Barnum, 39 W. R. 5, 45 Ch. D. 430. The stipulation here in question is necessary to protect the masters in case of a turn out, as they could not carry on their business in such an event; but the apprentice is still to be taught, and he has the opportunity of getting work elsewhere. An apprenticeship deed is good though there is no covenant to pay the apprentice any wages at all. In Reg. v. Lord, 12 Q. B. 757, there was a clause giving the master power to stop paying wages in case the engine broke down, and also a power to forfeit all wages due but unpaid if the apprentice were guilty of misconduct. That practically imposed a penalty on the apprentice. The decision in Meakin v. Morris, where the apprenticeship deed contained a clause very similar to the one in this case, which the court held invalidated the deed, was wrongly decided and ought to be overruled.

He also referred to Cooper v. Simmons, 10 W. R. 270, 7 H. & N. 707.

Stampa Lambert, for the respondents.—This stipulation makes the deed as a whole unfair towards the infant. Under it the masters may lock out their workmen for any length of time they please, and may compel the apprentice to serve them without paying him any wages. The permission to seek work elsewhere is wholly illusory, as upon the termination of the lock out the apprentice must return to the service. Meakin v. Morris is directly in point, and ought to be followed.

Boddam replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the proposition of law laid down by Fry, L.J., in De Francesco v. Barnum is the true test for deciding these cases. He states the proposition a little larger, perhaps, than it had been necessary to enunciate it in the previous cases, but still it leaves the previous cases untouched as coming within that proposition. The Lord Justice in effect said that the mere fact of some stipulations in an apprenticeship deed being against the infant's benefit does not make the deed void. It is impossible to frame a deed which does not contain some stipulations for the benefit of one contracting party and some for the benefit of the other. But if there is a stipulation in the deed of such a kind as to make the contract, taken as a whole, an unfair one to the infant, then that particular stipulation makes the whole contract void. The stipulation must be so unfair as to make the whole contract as between the infant apprentice and the master unfair to the infant. That brings us to consider whether, when the stipulation complained of relates to the payment of wages, it is so unfair to the infant as to affect the whole contract.

It was held over forty years ago in Reg. v. Lord that where a master had agreed to pay wages to an infant apprentice, but reserved to himself the right under certain circumstances, independent of any act of the infant, to compel the infant to serve without wages, the stipulation was so unfair as to render the whole contract void. So also where a master has agreed to pay wages, but stipulates that when the apprentice absents himself from work all wages due and unpaid shall be forfeited, the stipulation is so unfair as to vitiate the whole contract. We must now consider whether the stipulation in the present case does not make the whole contract unfair to the infant within the rule laid down by Fry, L.J. It having been held nearly nine years ago in Meakin v. Morris that a stipulation similar to the one in the present case rendered the whole contract unfair to the infant, can we say that that decision was wrong? Considering that deeds have been framed upon the faith of that decision, we must be absolutely convinced that the decision was wrong before we ought to overrule it. I cannot help thinking that I should have arrived at the same conclusion. The apprentice does not, as in old days, live with his master, but instead thereof the master agrees to pay him wages. The master then inserts a stipulation in the deed which enables him, if the other workmen offend him, though the apprentice may have had nothing to do with it, to cease paying the apprentice wages, while at the same time holding him to his service and compelling him to work, unless indeed the apprentice can get temporary employment elsewhere until the turn out is at an end, an equivalent of a rather illusory nature. To my mind that seems so unfair a stipulation towards the infant and so much in favour of the masters as to make the whole contract void. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We cannot decide this case in favour of the appellants without overruling the decision of Meakin v. Morris. I am not prepared to overrule that decision. I attach great importance to the fact that the expression "turn out" includes a lock out by the masters. The masters are thus enabled by their own act to bring the stipulation into force. If the expression only included a strike of workmen, the case would not be so strong.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I agree. It has been the law for a great number of years that if there is a stipulation in a contract so much to the detriment of the infant as to render it unfair that the infant should be bound by it, that contract cannot be enforced again the infant. The great distinction between Leslie v. Fitzpatrick and the other cases is that in the former case the contract of service was to be put an end to by the masters upon notice, whereas in the other cases the contract of service was to continue. Bearing that in mind, we find in this case that the apprentice is not to reside with the masters, but is to live at home, and the masters are to pay him wages. Then comes a stipulation that if the masters choose to turn out their men for any length of time they please, the apprentice is bound to go on serving the masters without any wages, unless—and this seems to me a most illusory provision—he can find employment somewhere else. That stipulation seems to me unfair to the infant, and the deed cannot be enforced against him.

Appeal dismissed.

JOBSON v. PALMER. (a.)

Trustee—Part of trust property stolen by his servant—Liability — Case of trustee remunerated for his services.

A trustee, remunerated for his services, employed a servant for the purposes of the trust, carefully selected and with a good character from his last employer, and properly intrusted to him the custody of the trust property, there being no negligence on the part of the trustee. The servant stole part of the property.

Held, that the trustee was not liable for the loss thereby occasioned to the trust estate.

Semble, the fact that a trustee is remunerated for his services does not add to his liability as trustee.

Trial of action.

By a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, dated the 22nd of July, 1889, William Jobson, a watchmaker and jeweller, assigned to Augustus Cufande Palmer, a chartered accountant, as trustee for creditors, his real and personal estate upon trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds of such sale in trust, after payment of the costs, charges, and expenses therein mentioned, and of any sums or allowances which would be entitled to be paid in full in case of bankruptcy, to divide the residue among the scheduled creditors rateably according to the amount of the respective debts owed to them by Jobson. It was not expressly provided by the deed that Palmer should get remuneration as trustee; but the judge held that under the circumstances, and on the construction of the deed, he was entitled to remuneration for his services.

At a meeting of the creditors on the 31st of July, 1889, a resolution was passed directing Palmer to resell the property to Jobson or his friends for a sum sufficient, after payment of costs, &c., and preferential claims, to pay a composition of 15s. in the pound. Palmer accordingly proceeded to sell, and paid the costs, &c., and preferential claims and composition, and handed over to Jobson or accounted for, the greater part of the property, but, under the circumstances mentioned below, not all of it. The circumstances were, as shown by the evidence, that Palmer had for a time, in the exercise of his duty, carried on Jobson's business, that he had done so in the same manner as Jobson himself had done, that he had employed a man named Lewis in the business, and that the employment of an assistant was necessary for the effectual conduct of it, that Palmer had exercised proper precautions in engaging and employing Lewis, who had a good character from his former employer, and that Jobson was himself present at the shop during the period of Lewis's employment, with only occasional absences, and never expressed himself dissatisfied either with the employment of Lewis or with the way in which the business was being conducted. It was afterwards ascertained, however, that Lewis had parted with a watch, part of the property, for sixteen guineas for which he never accounted, and that he had stolen other articles.

In January, 1891, Jobson commenced this action against Palmer, claiming a declaration that Palmer was a trustee for him of the property assigned by the deed, an account of the property and of Palmer's dealings therewith, and that Palmer might be ordered to transfer to him all the property other than that which Palmer had disposed of under the trusts of the deed, or had returned to Jobson, or to pay to Jobson the value thereof.

The principal question argued at the trial, and which calls for a report, was whether the defendant, as a remunerated trustee or bailee, was liable to the plaintiff for the value of the articles stolen by Lewis.

Arthur Powell, for the plaintiff.

Neville, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the defendant.—A trustee who keeps goods as he would if they were his own is not liable if they are stolen: Job v. Job, 26 W. R. 206, 6 Ch. D. 562; and it does not add to his liability if he is paid for his services: Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., pp. 201, 216. The provisional assignee of a bankrupt is not liable for the fraud of an agent if appointed with proper care: Raw v. Cutten, 9 Bing. 96. [As to the case of a director's liability for his agent's fraudulent statements they referred to Weir v. Bell, 26 W. R. 746, 3 Ex. D. 238.] In the absence of negligence a bailee is not liable for goods stolen by his servant: Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413. But the onus is on the bailee of proving that he exercised due care: Mackenzie v. Cox, 9 Car. & P. 632; Reeve v. Palmer, 5 C. B. N. S. 84, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 8. If the defendant is not to be treated as a bailee, but as a trustee, then he is not liable as a trustee for the dishonesty of persons properly employed by him in the ordinary course of business, where he has acted with prudence: Speight v. Gaunt, 32 W. R. 435, 9 App. Cas. 1; and his being paid for his services does not increase his liability.

Arthur Powell, in reply.—Defendant has not discharged the onus of showing that he was not guilty of negligence. A watchmaker must secure his stock against his servants: Clarke v. Earnshaw, Gow. 30. As a bailee for reward defendant has been guilty of gross negligence: Johnston's claim, 19 W. R. 457, L. R. 6 Ch. 212, 217. As a trustee he is liable for the fraudulent act of his agent, though chosen with due care: Bostock v. Floyer, 14 W. R. 120, L. R. 1 Eq. 26. In Speight v. Gaunt the trustee received no remuneration.

ROMER, J.—[After dealing with the other points of the case, which do not call for a report, proceeded as follows:—] As to the sixteen guineas for the watch received by Lewis, which clearly cannot now be recovered, that, in my opinion, obviously was fraudulently appropriated by Lewis to his own use, and the other items are all articles pawned, given away, or otherwise improperly dealt with by Lewis, in fact, clearly stolen by him. The question which arises with regard to these items is whether the defendant is liable for the criminal acts of his servant. On his behalf it is said that the principle laid down (though not for the first time) in Speight v. Gaunt applies, and that he is not liable. But the present case differs from that, in the fact that the defendant was paid for his services. In other respects the cases are similar, for I find as a fact that under the circumstances, and having regard to the nature of the plaintiff's business, which had temporarily to be carried on by the defendant, he, the defendant, was entitled and bound to employ a man to do the work that Lewis was employed for. I find no negligence in the selection of Lewis for the work. He had a good character when employed, and I am satisfied on the evidence that the defendant had no real ground for supposing that Lewis was not in every way qualified to perform or did not in fact properly perform his duties at the plaintiff's shop. Under these circumstances, does the fact that the defendant was paid by the plaintiff for his services prevent the application of the principle of Speight v. Gaunt, and make the defendant liable for the criminal acts of his servant? I think not. The position of the defendant may, I think, be well likened to that of a bailee for reward who has to take care of or do something with the article handed to him—of course, I am speaking of a common bailee for reward, and not of the special cases of an innkeeper and a carrier. Now, such a common bailee is clearly not liable for the tortious acts of his servants causing a loss of the articles, unless there has been negligence on his part. And in the present case, as I have said, the defendant has, in my judgment, discharged the onus of proving that there was no negligence on his part. It is true that Lewis had access to the plaintiff's goods; but that was inevitable, having regard to the nature of the business and to the fact that the goods had to be shown to customers and handed over to them if they bought. I think that the business was being conducted by the defendant in the same manner in which the plaintiff himself conducted it, and that Lewis was employed in the same way in which a servant would ordinarily be employed by the plaintiff himself in his business. It is important also to remember that the plaintiff himself was present at the shop throughout the time of Lewis's services (with only an occasional absence), and I am satisfied that no complaint of any kind was made by him during that time that the business was not being properly conducted, and, moreover, that the business was in fact then carried on in the usual and proper manner, and to his satisfaction. These facts render the case before me quite distinct from the cases of Clarke v. Earnshaw and Johnston's claim, where negligence was found. Moreover, if I regard the defendant, not as a bailee for reward, but as a trustee, I see no sufficient reason for confining the principle laid down in Speight v. Gaunt to the case of an unpaid trustee, though, no doubt, some of the judges who decided Speight v. Gaunt did in their judgments refer to the fact that there the trustee was not paid for his services. I think the principle ought to be applied, in a proper case, even where the trustee is remunerated; and I think the present is such a case. And, indeed, this view is, to a certain extent, supported by authority; for in Raw v. Cutten the court had to consider the liability for his agent's defaults of a provisional assignee who was entitled to be paid for his services, and was in other respects very much in the same position as the defendant here. I may add that that case was clearly decided on general principle, and not on the special circumstance that the provisional assignee was an officer of the court.

In re WEST CUMBERLAND STEEL AND IRON CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Procedure—Secured creditor—Debt—Scotch process—Pending action—Attachment of assets of company in Scotland—Arrestment on the dependence — Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 87, 151.

Alleged creditors of an English company, which was being wound up subject to supervision, took proceedings against the company in the Scotch courts prior to the liquidation, which proceedings had, according to Scotch law, put them in the position of secured creditors, subject only to their obtaining a decree in Scotch courts establishing their debt.

Held, that in these circumstances, the creditors not being able to enforce their security in the winding up, the proceedings in the Scotch court ought to be allowed to continue.

Motion.

Two motions were made in the matter of the above-named company, which was being wound up subject to supervision. On the 29th of February, 1892, letters of arrestment were obtained by Messrs. Hope and by the pursuers in proceedings pending in the Court of Session against the company to attach all moneys and goods in Scotland belonging to the company, in order to ground jurisdiction, upon which letters of arrestment were duly executed on the 18th and 19th of March, 1892; and a summons was obtained by the pursuers against the company containing a warrant to arrest on the dependence of the action, upon which warrant arrestments were again executed upon the 19th and 21st of March, 1892. A sum of £1,104 belonging to the company in the Royal Bank of Scotland was arrested by Hope & Co. Except the last-named sum the company had not, at the date of sealing the letters of arrestment, nor had the company acquired since that date, any property in Scotland. A resolution for voluntary winding up was passed on the 21st of May, 1892. The order for continuing the winding up under supervision of the High Court was made on the 25th of June, 1892.

The liquidator now moved to restrain Hope & Co. from continuing the Scotch proceedings and from attaching or arresting the moneys of the company in the Royal Bank of Scotland. The other motion was by Hope & Co. for leave to continue the Scotch proceedings against the company notwithstanding the winding up.

O. Leigh Clare and Alexander Young, for the liquidator.—The company is an English company, and the contracts now in dispute are English contracts to be performed and completed in England. The question is whether Hope & Co. should be allowed to get priority by reason of the Scotch proceedings. We say that they have no priority, they not having obtained a decree in a Scotch court: Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co. v. Turnbull, 10 Ct. of Sess. Cas., 4th ser., 558.

Haldane, Q.C., and Gatey, for Hope & Co., contended that the letters of arrestment had put them in the position of secured creditors, and that they had obtained a priority: Mitchell v. Scott, 8 Ct. of Sess. Cass., 4th ser., 875.

Clare replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question in this case arises on two motions, the one by J. A. Hope & Co., of Whitehaven, Cumberland, for an order that they, notwithstanding the winding up of the company, may be at liberty to continue and prosecute an action or summons now depending in the Court of Session in Scotland, wherein they are the pursuers and the company the defenders, and that in the event of their being successful they may be at liberty to enforce the attachments or arrestments obtained by them of moneys of the company in the hands of the Royal Bank of Scotland; the other a motion on behalf of the liquidator that Hope & Co. may be restrained from further prosecuting the said action and arrestments. The question, to my mind, which arises on these motions is really a question whether

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Messrs. Hope & Co., by virtue of the proceedings in Scotland, have become secured creditors, for, if the effect of those proceedings has been to make Messrs. Hope & Co. secured creditors, they are, in my opinion, entitled to go on with their action in Scotland, in so far as it is necessary to give effect to the security which they have obtained. It seems to me that the question whether Messrs. Hope & Co. have obtained by their proceedings in Scotland a valid security is a question of Scotch law, while the question whether Messrs. Hope & Co. ought to be allowed to continue this action and arrestment is a question for me to determine under the Companies Act, 1862.

Now, there has been laid before me evidence by distinguished Scotch lawyers as to the Scotch law. In his affidavit Mr. Asher, Q.C., says (par. 4 and 5):—"According to the law of Scotland the latter arrestments operate as attachment in security. In the event of Messrs. J. A. Hope & Co. obtaining a decree in their said action for a sum of money the decree would draw back, in my opinion, to the dates of the arrestment on the dependence, and Messrs. J. A. Hope & Co. would, in my opinion, on obtaining the said decree, have an absolute preference over the funds arrested to the extent of the sum to which they might be found entitled in the action." "I am of opinion that had the winding up of the above-named company been proceeding in Scotland the court would have granted leave to Messrs. J. A. Hope & Co. to continue their said action, so as to afford them an opportunity of establishing that there was a sum due to them for which they had secured a preference by their arrestments": Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co. v. Turnbull. This opinion seems to me to be based on undisputed facts which are set forth in the earlier portion of the affidavit. On the other hand there is an affidavit on behalf of the liquidator by Mr. Robert Campbell, a practising member of the Scotch bar of thirty years' standing, and a member, also, of the English bar. Mr. Campbell states that it is within the power of the Scotch courts to recall and in effect annul arrestments such as those obtained by Messrs. Hope & Co. That this is so is not in dispute. Mr. Campbell goes on to suggest that the warrant for the original arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem was obtained on a misstatement of facts—viz., that the defenders had effects in Scotland, and (paragraph 5) that a person not domiciled in Scotland is not liable to the diligence or process of the Scotch courts unless he has either property in Scotland or comes personally into the country; he impeaches the validity of the warrant for arrestments on the dependence on the same grounds. Now, assuming all this to be true in fact and law, it seems to me that it only affords a ground for the recall of the Scotch process by the Scotch courts, but that unless such process is recalled I am bound to deal with it as validly issued. Mr. Campbell goes on to deal with the case of Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co. v. Turnbull and to distinguish that case, which seems to be an authority against the contention of the liquidator, on the ground that in that case there was no question as to the competency of the action, and on the grounds that in that case a decree or forthcoming had been actually obtained by the creditor. The question of competency, in my opinion, is a question, as I have said, for the Scotch courts and not for me. As for the absence of a decree, I am of opinion from the judgments of the Lords of Session in the case of Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co. v. Turnbull, cited before me in argument, that the obtaining of a decree before the winding up was not essential to the validity of the security of the creditor according to the Scotch law. The Lord President, at the conclusion of his judgment, says:—"I am therefore of opinion that there is nothing in the Act of 1862, or in any of the other companies statutes, which can operate in the way of excluding Mr. Turnbull from the benefits which he has secured by the use of these arrestments, and that the parties here are in the same position in which they would have been in an ordinary sequestration where diligence had been done more than sixty days before its commencement. But it has been further urged that a diligence of this kind must be timeously followed up. It appears to me that it was so in this case. If the creditor had been compelled to proceed with his action in order to obtain a decree, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would have authorized him so to do, for this is a matter clearly within the discretion of the court, and one which, in the circumstances, the interests of justice between the parties would have demanded. On the whole matter, then, I have come to the conclusion that this diligence has given Mr. Turnbull a good preference." So also, Lord Shand, at the conclusion of his judgment, says:—"In this case the creditor has laid a nexus on the funds of the company, and to determine the validity of that nexus I think that he would have been entitled to have proceeded with his action and to have obtained a decree in order to make available any preference which the use of his diligence might have secured to him, and that the court would have granted leave accordingly. It seems to me that the parties here are in the same position as the parties were in the case of Mitchell v. Scott, already referred to, which I think must be held to rule the present case. I therefore agree with your lordship in thinking that Mr. Vair Turnbull is entitled to be ranked preferably on the assets of this company." The head-note in Mitchell v. Scott is as follows:—"Arrestments used on the dependence of an action confer a preference, although the defender be sequestrated before decree is obtained in the action, provided they be followed up without undue delay."

It seems to me from these cases that, according to the Scotch law, an alleged creditor can, by means of the process used by Messrs. Hope, obtain security for a debt which he has not established by the judgment of the court, and that it is open to him to proceed with an action to establish the debt, provided that he does so without undue delay; and that when he has done so the judgment or decree will draw back to the date of the arrestments on the dependence, and that the security obtained by the arrestments will apply to the debt subsequently established. The arrestments in the present case seem to have been executed on the 19th and 21st of March, 1892. The date of the petition is the 23rd of May, 1892, and the date of the resolution for voluntary liquidation the 21st of May, 1892. It seems to me, therefore, that Messrs. Hope are, subject to their obtaining a decree in the Scotch courts establishing their debt, secured creditors. I further think that Messrs. Hope could not enforce their security by proceedings in the winding up, and that, therefore, I ought to allow the action and arrestment in the Scotch court to continue; and I therefore accede to the motion of Messrs. Hope and dismiss the motion of the liquidator, in each case with costs.

JACKSON v. MARGRETT. (a.)

Practice—Appeal from county court—Notice of appeal, service of—Service on London agent of country solicitor—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 59, r. 12.

In appeals from county courts to divisional courts, where the solicitor for the respondent carries on business in the country, it is not sufficient that the notice of appeal should be served by the appellant, within the proper time, upon the London agent of the respondent's country solicitor. Such notice must be served within the proper time upon the respondent's country solicitor.

Powell v. Thomas, 39 W. R. 224, [1891] 1 Q. B. 97, followed.

Appeal by the defendant from a judgment of the learned judge of Cheltenham County Court.

The amount of the judgment being under £20, leave was given to the defendant to appeal, on the condition that he served his notice of appeal within fourteen days.

The preliminary objection was now taken on behalf of the plaintiff, the respondent, that there was no proper notice of appeal served as required by ord. 59, r. 12, which provides—with regard to appeals from county courts or other inferior courts of record of civil jurisdiction to divisional courts—"the notice of motion shall be served and the appeal entered within twenty-one days from the date of the judgment, order, or finding complained of."

In this case notice of appeal had been served within the proper time—that is, within the fourteen days—upon the London agent of the solicitor for the respondent, but such London agent had not sent on the notice to the country solicitor until it was one day too late. That is, no notice of appeal was served either upon the respondent himself or upon his country solicitor until too late, but a proper notice of appeal was served upon the town agent of the country solicitor for the respondent.

Daniel Lee, for the respondent.—The appeal cannot be heard, according to the decision of the court in Powell v. Thomas, 39 W. R. 224, [1891] 1 Q. B. 97, where the court expressed an opinion that in the case of an appeal from a county court, where the solicitor for the respondent carries on business in the country—as in this case—service of the notice of motion on the solicitor's London agent is not sufficient service to satisfy ord. 59, r. 12.

Gwynne James, for the appellant.

THE COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and CAVE, J.) allowed the objection, upon the ground that in such cases service of the notice of appeal upon the London agent of the country solicitor for the respondent is not a sufficient service within the rule, and they dismissed the appeal on that ground, but without costs.

Objection allowed, and appeal dismissed, without costs.

APOTHECARIES' COMPANY v. JONES. (a.)

Apothecaries Act, 1815 (55 Geo. 3, c. 194), s. 20—Unqualified person—"Act or practise"—"Every such offence whether more than one"—Penalty.

The words "act or practise" in the 20th section of the Apothecaries Act, 1815, which provides that, if any person "shall act or practise as an apothecary" without having obtained the certificate required by a previous section, "every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit £20," contemplate an habitual course of conduct on the part of the defendant, and not an isolated act.

Where, therefore, a defendant had given advice and had prescribed and supplied medicine to three separate persons on different occasions on the same day, without a certificate, and was sued for three separate penalties,

Held (affirming the county court judge), that only one offence had been committed in law, and that only one penalty was therefore recoverable.

Appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Digby, Judge of the Derby County Court.

Three separate actions were brought by the appellants at the instance of the Medical Defence Union against the respondent to recover, under the 20th section of the Apothecaries Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 194), three separate penalties of £20, by reason, as was alleged, that he had thrice on the 6th of May, 1892, acted and practised as an apothecary by giving advice and medicine to three persons, respectively named Newman, Eaton, and Page, on separate occasions, without having obtained a proper certificate as required by the Act.

In the first case the learned county court judge gave judgment for the full penalty of £20, but he gave judgment for the defendant in the other two cases, upon the ground that although either cases might have been relied upon to support an action, and all these cases might in either case have been proved as evidence of an infringement of the 20th section by the defendant, nevertheless that the three cases together formed but one offence in law within the true meaning of that section. The plaintiffs appealed.

By section 14 of the Apothecaries Act it is enacted that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to practise as an apothecary without having obtained a certificate as therein provided.

Section 20 provides that if any person, &c., "shall act or practise as an apothecary in any part of England or Wales without having obtained such certificate as apothecary, every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds," and the section also provides that a penalty of £5 shall be imposed upon any person who acts as an assistant to an apothecary in compounding or dispensing medicine without having obtained such certificate.

Houghton, for the appellants.—The county court judge here has failed to give due effect to the word "act," and has dealt with it as equivalent to "practising." It was intended by the insertion of the word "act" as well as "practise" to meet the case which has arisen here, and to impose penalties in respect of individual acts which are separate injuries to the public. If this contention is incorrect the effect will be that persons who systematically evade the Act will be enabled to do so with practical impunity, since if the penalty is not imposed in respect of each "act" it is difficult to see where the line can be drawn between one and more offences. Could it be said, moreover, that when advice and medicine had been given to one person, and therefore a complete offence committed, that there was a consequent immunity in respect of a second? The cases of Crepps v. Durden, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 692, where only one penalty was held to be recoverable for trading on the Lord's-day, and Marriott v. Shaw, Com. 274, and In re Mathews, 10 Mod. 26, where it was decided, under 5 Anne, c. 14, s. 4, that only one penalty could be recovered for killing several hares, are distinguishable because the acts were comprehensive acts. In the Sunday trading case the offence is necessarily limited by the day; here there is no reason for drawing the line at a day. In R. v. Hartley, 31 L. J. M. C. 232, it was held by Mellor, J., that distinct sales of meat on the same day were separate offences; and in Gordon v. Williamson, 40 W. R. 496, [1892] 1 Q. B. 616, where the word "act" was used without "practise," five penalties were imposed for acting as a vestryman on five separate occasions.

The learned counsel, the respondent being unrepresented, also drew attention to the following cases:—Apothecaries' Co. v. Bentley, 1 Car. & P. 538; Milnes v. Bale, 23 W. R. 660, L. R. 10 C. P. 591; Brooke v. Millikin, T. R. 509; Apothecaries' Co. v. Burt, 1 L. M. & P. 405, 5 Ex. 363; Apothecaries' Co. v. Nottingham, 34 L. T. 76, 24 W. R. Dig. 8; Apothecaries' Co. v. Warburton, 3 B. & Ald. 40.

Nov. 11.—The following judgments were delivered:

POLLOCK, B.—This is an appeal from the judge of the Derby County Court, and the appellants sued the respondent, an uncertificated person, in three actions to recover three penalties for three offences, the seeing three different patients contrary to section 20 of the Apothecaries Act. [The learned judge read the section, and continued:—] In the first case it was proved that the respondent gave Newman medicine and pills, and similar evidence was given in the other two cases. The county court judge held that only one offence had been committed under the statute and imposed one penalty of £20, giving judgment for the defendant in those two latter cases. He dealt very fully with the law of the case, and said that the question before him was whether prescribing for the three persons constituted three separate offences or only one. He was of opinion that the words of the statute pointed rather to a continued course of conduct as constituting the offence than an individual act. He found that the three acts proved constituted such continued course of conduct and proved the offence. I should have been content to say nothing more than that I agreed with the judge below but for the number of cases cited in the argument. The remarks in the well-known case Crepps v. Durden might afford good ground for amending the Apothecaries Act, but as it stands it is really identical with the Sunday Trading Act of 29 Car. 2. That being so, it appears to me to be clear that both statutes contemplate habitual conduct, not individual acts, as constituting the offence, and I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

HAWKINS, J.—I also am of opinion that the county court judge was right in the view he took in holding that the advising and prescribing proved against the respondent constituted in law but one offence, for which one penalty only was recoverable, and that consequently the respondent is entitled to our judgment. [The learned judge stated the facts and referred to the sections of the Act, and continued:]

Were there no authorities to assist in forming a judgment upon the case I can hardly suppose that had the penalty been imposed merely for practising as an apothecary it would have been seriously contended that a person could have been convicted of more than one offence, even though in the course of the same day a hundred patients had been prescribed for. It could never have been in the contemplation of the Legislature that each day during which a person illegally practised should be divided into hours or minutes, during each of which the heavy penalty of £20 would be incurred, nor could it have been the intention of the Legislature that each individual act of prescribing should be deemed such separate offence. To practise a calling does not mean to exercise it upon an isolated occasion, but to exercise it frequently, customarily, or habitually, and though it is true each individual act would afford cumulative evidence of practising, yet bare proof of one individual act would not of itself amount to practising. The words of the section, however, are "act or practise." It becomes, therefore, necessary to ascertain the meaning of the word "act" as there used. During the argument I was disposed to think the words "act" and "practise" were used synonymously, and I am not sure that that is not the correct view. Be that as it may, another interpretation may be given to the word equally favourable to the defendant. It may be the word "act" was used in addition to "practise" to meet the case of persons who, without practising habitually as apothecaries, might, nevertheless, occasionally act as such. But here again the Legislature could not have intended, and the language of the section does not force one to such a conclusion, that, whilst a person habitually practising without a certificate could only incur one penalty each day he so practised, a person who did not habitually practise, and therefore was not so grave an offender, should nevertheless be liable to a separate penalty for every act of prescribing, without limit as to number—in other words, that twenty acts of practise in one day would, in the case of a person habitually practising, only constitute one offence, whereas against a much less persistent offender each act might be visited as a separate offence and visited with a separate penalty.

Applying the same considerations to the case of an assistant, it seems impossible to suppose that every act of assistance, the making of every pill or mixture, could be visited with a separate penalty of £5. Good sense revolts at the idea of such a construction of the section. Very few cases are to be found in the books directly touching the point under discussion, and in neither of them is the point actually decided.

In Apothecaries' Co. v. Bentley Lord Tenterden expressed his doubts "whether a fresh penalty attached for every acting as an apothecary towards each different patient, and whether more than one penalty attached for a continual practising as an apothecary, though that party attended different persons or patients." In Apothecaries' Co. v. Burt the question was again mooted, but it was not thought necessary for the court to express any opinion upon it. I must, however, observe as a significant fact that in no reported case since those doubts were expressed has more than one penalty been recovered; probably for the reason that it has been felt that Lord Tenterden's doubts were well founded. The case of Crepps v. Durden is a valuable authority for the respondent. It is true that case was determined upon the authority of another statute, but the grounds of the decision are applicable to the case before us. In Crepps

v. Durden the plaintiff had been convicted in four separate convictions for unlawfully exercising his ordinary calling of a baker by selling rolls on Sunday, the 10th of November, 1776, contrary to the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 7, the words of that statute being "that no tradesman or other person shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their ordinary calling on the Lord's-day." It was assumed that there were several sales by the defendant of rolls on the Sunday mentioned in the convictions, but it was argued that the nature of the offence was such that it could only be committed once on the same day, and that if the plaintiff had continued baking from morning till night it would still be but one offence. The court held that this was so, and in giving judgment Lord Mansfield stated, as the ground for it, that "the offence is exercising his ordinary trade on the Lord's-day; and that without any fractions of a day, hours, or minutes. It is but one entire offence, whether longer or shorter in point of duration: so, whether it consist of one or a number of particular acts, the penalty incurred by this offence is five shillings. There is no idea conveyed by the Act itself that if a tailor sews on the Lord's-day every stitch he takes is a separate offence, or if a shoemaker or carpenter work for different customers at different times on the same day that there are so many separate and distinct offences. There can be but one entire offence on one and the same day." Suppose for a moment the 20th section had stated in so many words that which is clearly the meaning of it, "if any person shall on any day in the week" act or practise, &c., it would have required some ingenuity to distinguish the present case from Crepps v. Durden.

The same reason which guided the court in Crepps v. Durden, viz., that the offence created by the statute can alone be made the subject of conviction, the overt acts done in the commission of that offence are but so many pieces of evidence, had already been acted upon in the cases of Marriott v. Shaw and Reg. v. Matthews in proceedings to recover penalties under the statute 5 Anne, c. 14, s. 4, which forbade the keeping by unqualified persons of dogs and engines for the destruction of game. It was sought to recover a separate penalty for each hare killed, but it was decided that, the offence being the keeping and using of the dogs for the forbidden purpose, only one offence could be committed on the same day, and that the number of hares killed was immaterial. It was said by the court in that case: "If a man not qualified go a-hunting, and kill ever so many hares upon the same day, he would forfeit but one five pounds, for it is but one offence."

This may be further illustrated by taking the case of two men charged each with using a gun to kill game without a licence: if they shot through a whole day from morning to night, each would be guilty of one offence only, and each separate use of the gun by firing a shot would not constitute a separate offence. If it were otherwise, a man who fired ten shots would incur penalties amounting to £100, whilst one who for want of opportunity only fired one shot would only subject himself to a penalty of £5. None of the cases cited required comment beyond that which I have already made.

I do not wish it to be understood that in cases arising under the Act now under consideration the act that an uncertificated person on two separate days prescribed and made up medicine for different persons would necessarily justify a conviction for a separate offence on each day, for it is not difficult to imagine cases in which acts of prescribing and making up medicine on several closely following days might, taken together, afford abundant evidence of practising. No such conclusion could fairly be drawn if the acts of each day had stood alone. Again, even though a patient be attended by a person clearly practising as an apothecary, it does not follow that, because the attendance, prescription for, and supply of medicine to such patient had extended over two whole days or parts of two days, two offences must necessarily have been committed. Take the case of a patient to whom, in a case of urgency, an unqualified person had attended continuously from 10 p.m. on one day to 10 a.m. on the following, under such circumstances I should think one offence only would be committed, for all would be one continuous action.

This view might be further illustrated by supposing a case of night poaching where the offender commenced his offence at 11 p.m. and continued it till 2 or 3 a.m. the next day. It is idle to attempt to lay down a golden rule upon the subject, each case must depend upon the particular circumstances attending it. In the present case I have already said I think one offence only was committed, and I agree in the very sensible and sound judgment of the county court judge. The result is, I think this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

COPELAND v. SINISTER. (a.)

Probate—Administration—Wife's estate—Lapse of time—Grant to next of kin—Concealment—Right of husband to revocation of grant—County court—Appeal—Court of Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), ss. 54-58—Court of Probate Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 95), ss. 10, 11—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 100.

A husband and wife separated in 1863. The wife died in 1881, and the executors of her father's will took out letters of administration of her estate in her maiden name, describing her as a spinster, without notice to the husband, although they knew of the marriage, and that the husband was alive. In 1888 the husband first heard of his wife's death, and, after inquiries, brought an action in the county court for revocation of the grant, and regrant to himself.

The county court judge held that, in the absence of fraud, he was not justified in revoking the grant after so long a lapse of time.

Held, on appeal (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.), that it was not necessary to show fraud, and that the grant must be revoked and a grant made to the husband.

Semble, that the appeal was not under the County Courts Act, 1888, but under the Court of Probate Acts, 1857 and 1858, and that, although section 11 of the Act of 1858 repeals section 54 of the 1857 Act, which confers the jurisdiction on the county courts, and the Act of 1858, whilst giving jurisdiction to the county court, contains no reference to appeals, yet the Acts of 1857 and 1858 must be read together, and the appellate jurisdiction under section 58 of the 1857 Act remains.

Held, that, even if the appeal were not under the Court of Probate Acts, the question of law was sufficiently raised to comply with the requirements of section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal from the decision of his Honour Judge Hughes, Q.C., at Congleton, on October 11, dismissing the plaintiff's action for revocation of a grant of letters of administration.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gad Copeland, the plaintiff and appellant, claimed to have the letters of administration of the goods of Eunice Turnock, deceased, wife of himself, granted to the defendants on the 14th of December, 1881, revoked, and asked for a regrant to himself.

The plaintiff was married to the deceased, Eunice Turnock (a sister of the defendant Joseph Turnock) on August 14, 1858. The parties lived together at Harriseahead until 1863, when, owing to differences, the wife went home to her mother, and did not return to the plaintiff again. There was no issue of the marriage. From 1863 to 1888, the plaintiff resided at Stockport. On the 29th of March, 1881, Mrs. Copeland died, and on December 14, 1881, letters of administration were granted to the two defendants, who were executors of the will of her father, who had died a few months previously. In the affidavit filed by the administrators, and also in the bond, Mrs. Copeland was described by defendants as "Eunice Turnock, a spinster," and she was also buried in her maiden name. It was proved that the defendant Turnock knew of the marriage, and that the plaintiff was living at the death of his wife. The plaintiff did not hear of his wife's death till 1888.

On proof of these facts by the plaintiff the learned county court judge held that, whilst he had jurisdiction to comply with the plaintiff's claim, and the husband had technically the right to the letters of administration, he ought not, in the absence of fraud and under all the circumstances, especially the long separation, to grant the claim, and he dismissed the plaintiff's action without calling on the defendants to give evidence.

At the hearing objection was taken that the court had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the proceedings were entitled "In the Probate Act, 1857." The judge allowed the title to be amended if necessary by referring to the Act of 1858.

Deane, for the plaintiff, in support of the appeal.—The county court judge was wrong in thinking it was necessary for the plaintiff to show fraud. The plaintiff is entitled to the administration to his wife's estate, and is not affected by the acts of other parties without notice. His decision was on a point of law, and section 58 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, gives this court jurisdiction to hear it: Zealley v. Veryard, 14 W. R. 970, L. R. 1 P. & D. 195.

Leslie Probyn, for the respondents.—The court has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal; the judge was not asked to take a note of any question of law in accordance with the provision of the County Court Act, 1888, s. 120, which is the only Act which gives an appeal. There is no appeal under the Court of Probate Act, 1857, because section 54 of that Act, which confers jurisdiction on the county court, was repealed by section 11 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858, and the provisions relating to appeal in the 1857 Act cannot apply to a new jurisdiction conferred on the county courts by the Act of 1858. The judge dealt with a question of fact—fraud or no fraud; his attention was never drawn to the point now raised.

Deane, in reply.—The question of law was raised by the plaint, Was the husband entitled to the grant or not?

JEUNE, P.—I think this is a case which may properly be disposed of at once. It is not necessary in deciding it to say more than that the judge below appears to have held that he was not justified in revoking the grant of administration unless fraud was shown. In my opinion that is not the law, and therefore his decision ought to be reversed. One or two points were raised in the course of the case on which it is not necessary to give a decision.
